TO THE RIGHT HOnorable sir Henrie Sidneie knight, lord deputie generall of Ireland, lord president of Wales, knight of the most noble order of the garter, and one of hir maiesties priuie councill within hir realme of England.

Taking in hand (right honorable) to gather the particular histories of diuerse countries and nations, to ioine with a cos-mographie, which one Reginald Wolfe late printer to the queenes maiestie meant to publish in our English toong: when I came to consider of the histories of Ireland, I found my self so vnprouided of helps, to set downe anie particular discourse therof, that I was in despaire to enterprise to write anie thing at all concerning that realme, otherwise than incidentlie as fell to purpose to touch the same in the historie of England. At length yet as maister Wolfes vse was, to impart to me all such helps as he might at anie hand procure for my furtherance, in the collections of the other histories, wherewith I speciallie dealt; his hap was to light also vpon a copie of two bookes of the Irish histories, compiled by one Edmund Campion, fellow sometime of S. Iohn Baptists college in Oxford, verie well penned certeinlie, but so breefe, as it were to be wished, that occasion had serued him to haue vsed more leasure, and thereby to haue deliuered to vs a larger discourse of the same histories: for as he himselve confesseth, he had not past ten weekes space to gather his matter: a verie short time doubtlesse for such a peece of worke. But how breefe so euer I found him, at the persuation of maister Wolfe, vpon the hauing of that copie, I resolved to make shift to frame a speciall historie of Ireland, in like maner as I had doone of other regions, following Campions order, and setting downe his owne words, except in places where I had matter to enlarge that (out of other authors) which he had written in breefe. And this I haue thought good to signifie, the rather for that I esteeme it good dealing in no wise to defraud him of his due deserued praise.

But now after I had continued the historie, and enlarged it out of Giraldus Cambrensis, Flatsburie, Henrie of Marleburgh, and other, till the yeare 1509, in which that famous prince Henrie the eight began his reigne; some of those that were to bestow the charges of the impression, procured a learned gentleman maister Richard Stanihurst, to continue it from thence forward as he saw occasion, being furnished with matter to enlarge the worke, whereof for those latter times I found my selfe vtterlie void, more than that which Campion had deliuered. What I haue doone heerein, your honors discretion shall easilie conceiue. For the imperfection sith it is the first that hath beene set forth in print, I craue most humble pardon of your good lordship, beseeching you rather to respect my good will than the perfectnesse of the worke, which (the wants considered) for the orderlie furnishing thereof, is not to be looked for in the skilfull, much lesse in me the meanest of all, and least able to performe it. Hauing presented the right honourable the earle of Leicester with the historie of Scotland, to whom (as I haue heard) Campion made dedication of this booke, I could not remember me to whome I might more conue-nientlie offer this my trauell in this historie of Ireland, than to your lordship, being hir maiesties lieutenant in that realme. And therefore in most humble wise I exhibit the booke to your honour, beseeching the same to beare with my bold attempt therein, and to receiue it in good part from him that wished to haue more amplie satisfied your good lordships expectation, if abilitie might haue answered good will. Thus I beseech the Lord to guide your heart in his holie waies, & to furnish you with politike prudence and skilfull knowledge to gouerne in your estate and office, so as your doings may redound to his glorie, the fuertie of hir maiesties dominion there, your owne aduancement in honour, and conse-quentlie to the sure support and peaceable quietnesse of the true and loiall subiects of that realme,

Your honors most humble to command,

A.3.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE Sir Henrie Sidneie knight, lord deputie generall of Ireland, lord president of Wales, knight of the most noble order of the garter, and one of hir maiesties priuie counsell within hir realme of England.

My verie good Lord, there haue beene diuerse of late, that with no small toile, and great commendation, haue throughlie imploied themselues, in culling and packing together the scrapings and fragments of the historie of Ireland. Among which crue, my fast friend, and inward companion, maister Edmund Campion did so learnedlie bequite himselfe, in the penning of certeine breefe notes, concerning that countrie, as certes it was greatlie to be lamented, that either his theame had not beene shorter, or else his leasure had not beene longer. For if Alexander were so rauisht with Homer his historie, that notwithstanding Thersites were a crabbed and a rugged dwarfe, being in outward feature so deformed, and in inward conditions so crooked, as he seemed to stand to no better steed, than to lead apes in hell: yet the valiant capteine, weighing how liuelie the golden poet hath set forth the ouglie dandprat in his colours, did sooner wish to be Homer his Thersites, than to be the Alexander of that doltish rithmour, which undertooke with his wooden verses to blase his famous and martiall exploits: how much more ought Ireland (being in sundrie ages seized of diuerse good and courageous Alexanders) sore to long and thirst after so rare a clarke, as maister Campion, who was so upright in conscience, so deepe in iudgement, so ripe in eloquence, as the countrie might haue beene well assured to haue had their historie trulie reported, pithilie handled, and brauelie polished.

Howbeit, although the glose of his fine abbridgement, being matcht with other mens dooings, bare a surpassing kind of excellencie: yet it was so huddled up in hast, as in respect of a Campion his absolute perfection, it seemed rather to be a worke roughlie hewed, than smoothlie planed. Vpon which ground the gentleman being willing that his so tender a suckling, hauing as yet but greene bones, should haue bene swaddled and rockt in a cradle, till in tract of time the ioints thereof were knit, and growen stronger: yet notwithstanding he was so croft in the nicke of this determination, that his historie in mitching wise wandred through sundrie hands, and being therewithall in certeine places somewhat tickle too-nigh (for maister Campion did learne it to speake) and in other places ouer spare, it twitiled more tales out of schoole, and drowned weightier matters in silence, than the author (vpon better view and longer search) would haue permitted. Thus much being by the sager sort pondered, and the perfection of the historie earnestlie desired: I, as one of the most that could doo least, was fullie resolved to enrich maister Campion his chronicle, with further additions. But weighing on the other side, that my course packthred could not haue beene sutable knit with his fine silke, and what a disgrace it were, hungerlie to botch up a rich garment, by clouting it with patches of sundrie colours, I was forthwith reclaimed from my former resolution, reckoning it for better, that my pen should walke in such wise in that craggie and balkish waie, as the truth of the matter being forprised, I would neither openlie borrow, nor priuie imbezell ought to anie great purpose from his historie. But as I was hammering that worke by stealths on the anuill, I was giuen to vnderstand by some of mine acquaintance, that others had brought our raw historie to that ripeness, as my paine therein would seeme but needlesse. Whereupon being willing to be eased of the burden, and loath also in lurching wise to forstall anie man his trauell, I was contented to leaue them thumping in the forge, and quietlie to repaire to mine vsuall and pristinat studies, taking it not to stand with good manners, like a flittering flie to fall in an other mans his dish. Howbeit the little paine I tooke therein was not so secretlie moved within my closet, but it slipt out at one chinke or other, and camed so farre abroad, as it was whispered in their eares, who before were in the historie busied. The gentlemen conceiuing a greater opinion of me, than I was well able to uphold, dealt verie effectually with me, that as well at their instance, as for the affection I bare my native countrie, I would put mine helping hand to the building and perfecting of so commendable a worke. Having breathed for a few daies on this motion, albeit I knew that my worke was plumed with downe, and at that time was not sufficientlie feathered to flie: yet I was by them weied not to beare my selfe coy, by giving my entier friends in so reasonable a request a squemish repulse. Wherefore, my singular good lord, here is laid downe to your lordship his view a brieife discourse, with a tagged historie of a ragged wealepublike. Yet as naked as at the first blush it seemeth, if it shall stand with your honor his pleasure (whom I take to be an expert lapidarie) at vacant houres to insearch it, you shall find therein stones of such estimation, as are worth to be coucht in rich and pretious collars. And in especiall your lordship, aboue all others, in that you haue the charge of that countrie, maie here be schooled, by a right line to leuell your gouernement. For in perusing this historie, you shall find vice punished, vertue rewarded, rebellion suppressed, leuitie exalted, haughtinesse disliked, courtesie beloued, briberie detested, iustice imbraced, polling officers to their perpetuall shame reprooued, and vpright gouernours to their eternall fame extolled. And trulie to my thinking, such magistrats as meane to haue a vigilant eie to their charge, cannot bestow their time better, than when they sequester themselues from the affaires of the wealepublike, to recreate and quicken their spirits by reading the chronicles that decipher the gouernement of a wealepublike. For as it is no small commendation for one to beare the dooings of manie, so it breedeth great admiration, generallie to haue all those qualities in one man harboured, for which particularlie diuerse are eternised. And who so will be addicted to the reading of histories, shall readilie find diuerse euents worthie to be remembered, and sundrie sound examples daile to be followed. Vpon which ground the learned haue, not without cause, adiudged an historie to be the marrow of reason, the creame of experience, the sap of wisdom, the pith of iudgement, the librarie of knowledge, the kernell of policie, the vnfoldresse of treacherie, the kalendar of time, the lanterne of truth, the life of memorie, the doctresse of behauiour, the register of antiquitie, the trumpet of chivalrie. And that our Irish historie being diligentlie heeded, yeeldeth all these commodities, I trust the indifferent reader, vpon the vntwining thereof, will not denie. But if anie man his stomach shall be found so tenderlie niced, or so deintilie spiced, as that he maie not, for sooth, digest the grosse draffe of so base a countrie, I doubt not, but your lordship, who is thoroughlie acquainted with the woorthinesse of the Island, will be soone perswaded to leaue such quaint and licentious repastours, to feed on their costlie and delicate woodcocks, & willinglie to accept the louing present of your heartie welwiller. The gift is small, the giuer his good will is great, I stand in good hope, that the greatnesse of the one will counterpoise the smalnesse of the other. Wherefore that I maie the sooner vnbroide the pelfish trash that is wrapt within this treatise, I shall craue your lordship to lend me either your eares in hearing, or your eyes in reading the tenor of the discourse following.

A TREATISE CON-

teining a plaine and perfect description of Ireland, with an Introduction to the better vnderstanding of the histories appertaining to that Iland:

compiled by Richard Stanihurst.

The names of Ireland, with the compasse of the same, also what shires or counties it containeth, the diuision or partition of the land, and of the language of the people.

The first chapter.

The more part aswel of Cosmo-graphers, as Chronographers,
do wish on accord to affirm, that the nation of Ireland (the utter-most wea-sterne Ile known) is halfe as big as Brittainia. Which I take to be true, if the word Brittainia so farre displate the signification, that it comprisse England, Wales, and Scotland.

To which opinion Giraldus Cambrensis relieth, saying, that Brittainia containeth in length eight hundred miles, and two hundred in breadth. Ireland he taketh to be in length from the mounteins called Tozach (the author of Polydronicon termeth them Brendane his hilles) to saint Columbe his Iland eight daies iourneie; rating of long Irish miles fortie miles to the daie: and in breadth from Dublin to saint Patrike his hilles and the sea of Connaght four daies iourneie, according to the foriniet rate: So as by Cambrensis his surueie, who was a curious inseacher therof, Ireland is three hundred & twentie miles long of Irish miles, and one hundred and three score miles broad. And accounting three hundred and twentie Irish miles to amount to foure hundred Engliss miles, which may well be reckoned according to their iudgements that haue travelled in the Irish territories: Ireland will be found halfe as big as Brittainia. Girald. Cambrensis auoucheth, saying, that Ireland is as big as Wales and Scotland. Ireland hath on the east, England, withui one daies sailing; on the south east it hath France; Wit-taine on the south, distant three daies sailing; on the west the maine ocean sea.

Concluding the name Ibernia, hills, topographers are not yet agreed from whence it is deduced. Some write it Hibernia corruptlie, and suppose that the stranger finding it in an od end of the world, foolish and moistie, toke it at the first for a verie cold coun-trie, and thereof named it Hibernia, as to saie, the Winter land. But this error being vpon short experience reformed, it could not be that the name should haue liued long, especiallie the first impositors surui-uing the triall, and able to alter the first nomination.

Others bring a ghesse, that it should be named of Irlamale. But because I read nothing of them in ante probable historie, I purpose not to build vpon that conecture.

Most crediblie it is holden, that the Hispaniards (the founders of the Irish) for deuotion towards Hispaime, called then Iberia of Iberius the sonne of Iuball, and the rather, for that themselves had dwelled beside the famous riuer Iberus, named the land Iberia (for so Leland and manie foren chronicles write it) or Ibernia, adding the letter (n) for distence sake. And from Ibernia proceedeth Iberland, or Iuerland; from Iuerland, by contraction Ireland: for somuch as in corruption of common talke we find that (u) with his vocale is easlie lost and suggested; so we saie ere for euer, nere for neuer, shole for thouell, ore for ouer, ene for euen, dile for diuell. At the same time it was also named Scotia, in reue-rence of Scotach the wife of Cathelus, ancient captaine of those Iberians that fitted from Hispaime into Ireland: & the said Scotach was old grandame to Iberus: and Vermon after the Scottish chro-cles, who in ante tyme had their countreim deriued from the Irish, and not from the Britons.
The name Scotia is of late yeares so vsuallie taken for that part of Brittain that comprisseth Scotland, that diuerse ancient Irish authors are holden to be borne in Scotland; whereas in verie deed their native soile is Ireland. As the famous scholemann Io-hannes Duns Scotus, other wise named Doct of subtilis, for his subtil quiddities in scholasticall controuersies, was an Irish man borne, and yet is taken for a Scot.

Some hold opinion that he was borne in Man-mon, a market towne five miles distant from Wellsford. Others auouch, and that more trulie, that he was borne in Downe, an old ancient citie in the north of Ireland, and thereof they ghesse him to be named: Dunsensis, and by contraction Duns, which teaching is so trifull and common in all scholes, that who so furpasseth others either in cauilking, or erie, or subtil philosophie, is forthwith nicknamed a Duns. Wherefore as Scotland is named Scotia mil-whence it

nor, so Ireland is termed Scotia maior, as the head from whence the name of Scotia minor took his of-spring. The Irish also were named of the foresaid Gathelus, or Gaudellus, Gaudell. In their Irish rithmes, they tearme Ireland verie often Banno. I cannot diuine what reason should lead their makers thereto, vntlesse it be the river in the countie of Wickeford, named the Banno, where the Britons vpon the conquest first arrived. The place otherwise is called Bagganbun, according to the old ancient rithme: 10

At the creeke of Bagganbun, Ireland was loft and wun.

For the remembrance of which river so notoriously famosed, it carrieth great likelihood, that the name should be to the whole realme generallie ascribed.
Sundrie Latine authors write Ireland Inuerna, or thers luerna, diuerse Ijerna. Claudius nameth it Iberna. The diuersitie of which names grow, for that in their time the true and certaine name was not knowne, so that they were contented to take it as they found it, which matter is handled by Hermolaus Barbarus.

There are some of the ruder sort so quaint in seu-ring the name Irish and Ireland, as that they would be named Ireland men, but in no wise Irishmen.
But certes, in my fantasie such curious distinctions may be verie aptlie resembled to the foolish butcher; that offered to haue sold his mutton for fiftene grots, and yet would not take a crowne. Who so will grate vpon such nice diuersities, in respect that he is ashamed of his countie; trulle (in mine opinion) his countie mate be ashamed of him. Ireland is diuided into foure regions, Leinster, east: Connaught, west: Ulster, north: Mounster, south: and into a fift plot, defalked from euerie fourth part, and yet mea-ring on each part, called thereof Mædia, Mæth, comprising as well east Mæth, as west Mæth. Leinster butteth vpon England, Ulster vpon the Scottish Ilands: which face with Hebriades scattered be-twene both the realms, wherein at this daie the Irish Scot, successor of the elder Scythian, bid, or bid-thanke dwelleth. Of these five, where they are framable to ciuillite, & answer the wits of the princes courts, he sundred into shires or counties in this maner. In Leinster lieth the countie of Dublin, Kildare, Wickesford or Wickesford, Catherlagh, Kilkem-nie, the countie of Leice & Mphalie, called the kings and quenes countie: these two latelie so named by parlement, in the reignes of Philip and Marie, hauing thire townes accordant, Philips towne, and Marie bourgh. Connaught hath the countie Clare; Ulster the countie of Louth, Doune, Antrim, one moitie of the towne of Droghedagh (for the rest is in Mæth) and Carregfergus. In Mounster lieth the counties of Waterford, Limerike, Corke, the countie palantine of Tipperarie, Kerie, & the crosse of Tipperarie. Mounster was of old time diuided into east Mounster, Mounster, west Mounster, Desmond, south Mounster, Conmound. The occasion why Ireland was parted into these five principall regions grew of this. There arrived in Ireland five brethren, that were valiant & martiall gentlemen; to wit, Gaudell, Conandus, Sagandus, otherwise named Gangandus, Rutheragus or Rutheranus, & Slanius. These five perceiving that the countie was not sufficient-lie peopled, were agreed (as it were) to cast lots, and to share the whole realme betwene themselves. The four elder brethren seuering the countie into foure parts, and being loth to vse their yongest brother like an outcast or stepsonne, condescended that each of them shoud of their owne portion allot to Slanius a paring or parcell of their inheritance.
Which being as heartlie received of Slanius, as it was bountifullie granted by them, he settled himselfe therein, and of that partition it took the appellation of Mædia, Mæth. The foure parts met at a certaine stone at Mæth, nere the castell of Kilaire, as an indifferent meare to seuer the foure regions.

But although Slanius in the beginning had the least parcell, yet in short space he stood so well to his tacklings, and ineroched so far vpon his neighbours, that he obtained the whole monarchie of Ireland. At which time he did not suppress in oblivion his inheritance of Mæth; but did enlarge it, and decreed it shoud be a countie appendant to the monarch, his diet or table. And albeit the confines thereof were by Slanius stretched, yet it containeth not so much land as anie of the other foure parts comprehendeth; but rather by indifferent spruete, the halfe deale, whereof also it is not vnknelie named Mæth. For whereas in the time of Slanius, each of the foure parts compriseth two and thirtie cantreds, Mæth containeth but sixtene cantreds. A cantred is named so much land as containeth an hundred townships.
This Slanius is intomed at an hill in Mæth, which of him is named Slane. There hath bene in ancient time one Calfride Geneuile, lord of the libertie of Mæth. This noble man became a frier preacher, and decessed in the yeare of our Lord 1314, the twentith of October, and was intomed in the abbey of the Blacke friers at Trim.

There is also another diuision of Ireland, into the English pale, and Irishrye. For when Ireland was subdued by the English, diuerse of the conquerors planted themselves nere to Dublin, and the confines thereto adjoining, and so as it were inclosing and impaling themselves within certaine lists and territories, they ceased auaite the Irish; inso much as that countie became mere English, and thereof it was termed the English pale: which in ancient time stretched from Dundalke to Catherlagh or Kilkemie. But now what for the slacknesse of mar-chours, and ineroching of the Irish enimie, the scope of the English pale is greatlie impaired, & is crampered and coucht into an od corner of the countie named Fingall, with a parcell of the king his land, Mæth, the countie of Kildare and Louth; which parts are applied chieflie with good husbandrie, and taken for the richest and ciuilist soles in Ireland.
But Fingall especiallie from time to time hath bin so addicted to all the points of husbandrie, as that they are nicknamed by their neighbours, for their continuall dandgerie, Colonnies, of the Latine word Coloni, whereinto the clipt English word clowne seemeth to be answerable.

The word Fingall countenailleth in English the race or sept of the English or strangers, for that they were soles seized of that part of the Iland, griping with their talants so firmelie that warne nest, that from the conquest to this daie, the Irish enimie could neuer rouse them from thence. The inhabitants of the English pale have bene in old time so much addicted to their ciuillite, and so farre sequenred from barbarous sauagenesse, as their onlie mother tongue was English. And tralle, so long as these impaired dwellers did lunder themselves as well in land as in language from the Irish; rudenesse was daie by daie in the countie supplanted; ciuillite in-grafted, good lawes established, iustitie obserued, & wellon suppressed; and in fine, the countie of a yong England was like to that in Ireland. But when their posteritie became not altogether so warie in keeping, as their ancestors were valiant in conquering, the Irish language was free dennized in the English pale: this canker took such deepe root, as the bodie that before was whole and sound, was by little and little festered, and in maner whole putr-fied. And not onlie this parcell of Ireland grew to that chaulitie, but also Ulster and the greater part of Pouncker, as by the sequels of the Irish historie shall plainly appeere. But of all other places, Weisford with the territorie bated and perclosed within the river called the Bill, was so quite estranged from Irishie, as if a traveller of the Irish (which was rare in those daies) had pitcht his foot within the Bill and spoken Irish, the Weisfordians would command him forthwith to turne the other end of his tong and speake English, or els bring his trouchman with him. But in our daies they have so acquainted themselves with the Irish, as they have made a mingle mangle or gallimaufrey of both the languages, and have in such medle or checkerwise so crabbedlie jumbled them both together, as commonlie the inhabitants of the meaner sort speake neither good English nor good Irish.

There was of late daies one of the pères of England sent to Weisford as commissioner, to decide the controversies of that countrie; and hearing in affable wise the rude complaints of the countrie clowns, he conceived here & there sometime a word, other whiles a sentence. The noble man being verie glad, that upon his first coming to Ireland, he understood so manie words, told one of his familiar friends, that he stood in verie great hope to become shortly a well spoken man in the Irish, supposing that the blunt people had pratted Irish, all the while they tangled English. Howbeit to this daie, the dogs of the old ancient Chancer English are kept as well there as in Fingall, as they terme a spider, an attercop, a wisp, a wad, a lumpe of bread, a pocket, or a pucket, a sillibucke, a coppous, a faggot, a bleafe, or a blaze, for the short burning of it (as I judge) a physician, a leach, a gap, a shard, a base court or quazangle, a bawen, or rather (as I do suppose) a barton, the household or folks, meanie, sharpe, kéene, estrange, uncouth, easie, æth or eefe, a dunghill, a mizen. As for the word bater, that in English purporeth a lane, bearing to an high waie, I take it for a mere Irish word that crept into the English, through the daillie intercourse of the English and Irish inhabitants. And whereas commonlie in all countries the women speake most neatie and perillie, which Tullie in his third booke De oratore, speaking in the person of Crassus seemed to have observed: yet notwithstanding in Ireland it falleth out contrarie. For the women have in their English tong an harsh & brode kind of pronuntiation, with bittering their words so peevishlie and faintlie, as though they were halfe sicke, and readie to call for a posset. And most commonlie in words of two syllables they give the last the accent: as they saie, markeat, balkeat, goscoupe, pulloot, Robart, P. clafe, &c: which doubles doth disbeautifie their English above measure. And if they could be weaned from that corrupt custome, there is none that could dislike of their English.

Here percase some snappish carper will take me at rebound, and snufflinglie snib me for debasing the Irish language; but trulie, whosoever shall be found so overthwartlie bent, he takes the matter farre awrie. For as my skill is verie simple therein, so I would be loth to disuells my rashnes, in giuing light veridit in anie thing to me unknowne: but onelie my short discourse tendeth to this drift, that it is not expedient that the Irish tong should be so universallie gagled in the English pale: because that by pprove and experience we see, that the pale was neuer in more flourishing estate than when it was wholie English, and neuer in worse plight than since it hath enfranchised the Irish. But some will saie, that I shew my selfe herein as scrupolous as some losing gamblers seeme superstitious, when they plaie themselues drie, they gogle with their eles hither and thither, and if they can prie out anie one that giueth them the gaze, they stand lumping and lowering, fretting and fuming, for that they imagine that all their euill lucke proceeded of him: and yet if the stander by depart, the loser may be found as drie shaven as he was before. And euen so it fareth with you, because you see all things run to ruine in the English pale, by reason of great enormities in the countrie, either openlie praissed, or couertlie winked at; you glasse your eie on that which standeth next you, & by beating Jacke for Will, you impute the fault to that which perhaps would little further the weale publike if it were exiled. Now trulie you shoot verie néere the marke. But if I may craue your patience till time you see me shoot my bolt, I hope you will not denie, but that as néere the picke as you are, and as verie an hagler as I am, yet the scantling shall be mine. First therefore take this with you, that a conquest dwaleth, or at the least wile ought to draw to it three things, to wit, law, apparell, and language. For where the countrie is subdued, there the inhabitants ought to be ruled by the same law that the conqueror is gouerned, to weare the same fashion of attire therewith the victor is bested, and speake the same language that the vanquisher parleth. And if anie of these three lacke, doubtlesse the conquest limpeth. Now whereas Ireland hath bin by lawfull conquest brought vnder the subiection of England, not onelie in king Henrie the second his reigne, but also as well before as after (as by the discourse of the Irish historie shall euidentlie be declared) and the conquest hath bene so absolute and perfect, that all Leinster, Meth, Ulster, the more part of Connagh and Pouncker, all the ciuities and burroughs in Ireland haue bene wholie Englished, and with English conquerors inhabited, is it decent (thinke you) that their owne ancient native tong should be shrowded in obliuion, and suffer the enemies language, as it were a tetter or ringworme, to harbor it selfe within the lawes of English conquerors? No trulie.

And now that I haue fallen into this discourse, it will not be farre amisse to stand some what roundlie vpon this point. It is knowne, and by the historie you may in part perceiue, how haue the Ulster whilom flourished. The English families were there implanted, the Irish either vtterlie expelled or wholie subdued, the laws duly executed, the reuenue great, and onelie English spoken. But what brought it to this present ruine and decay? I doubt not but you geffe before I tell you. They were inuitoned and compassed with euill neighbours. Neighbourhood bred acquaintance, acquaintance wasted in the Irish tong, the Irish hooked with it attire, attire haled rudenesse, rudenesse ingendred ignorance, ignorance brought contempt of lawes, the contempt of lawes bred rebellion, rebellion raked thereto warres, and so consequentlie the bitter decaye and desolation of that woorthie countrie. If these thinke, when first they began to chap, had bene diligentlie by the dwellers stopped; hir maiestie at this daie, to hir great charges, should not haue bene occasioned to dam vp with manie thousand pounds, yea and with the woorthie carcases of valiant soldiers, the gaps of that rebellious northerne countrie.

Now put the case that the Irish tong were as sacred as the Hebrew, as learned as the Greeke, as fluent as the Latine, as amorous as the Italian, as courteous as the Spanish, as courtlike as the French; yet trulie (I know not which waie it falleth out) I see not but it may be verie well spared in the English pale. And if reason will not lead you to thinke thinke it, tralie experience must force you to grant it.

In old time, when the Romans were first acquainted with the Greeke tong, as it is commonlie the nature of man to be delighted with newfangle waies: so he was accounted no gallant among the Romans, that could not prattle and chat Greeke. Marcus Cicero father to Tullie, being at that time kept in yeares, perceiving his countrymen to become changelings, in being bilwise and polmad, and to sucke with the Greeke the conditions of the Grecians, as to be in words talkative, in behaviour light, in conditions quaint, in manners haughtie, in promises unstedfast, in oaths rash, in bargains wavering (which were reckoned for Greeklissh properties in those daies) the old gentleman not so much respecting the neatnesse of the language, as the naughtie fruit it brought with it; said, that his countrymen the Romans resembled the bondslaves of Siria; for the more perfect they were in the Greeke, the worse they were in their manners and life. If this gentleman had bene now living, and had seen what alteration hath happened in Ireland, through the intercourse of languages, he would (I dare saie) breake patience, and would demand whie the English pale is more given to learne the Irish, than the Irishman is willing to learne English: we must imbrace their language, and they detest ours. One demanded merilie whie Oneille that last waie would not frame himselfe to speake English? What (quoth the other) in a rage, thinkest thou that it standeth with Oneille his honor to wryth his mouth in clattering English? and yet forsooth we must gag our selves in gibblishing Irish? But I dwell too long in to apparant a matter. As all the chiefties & tolongs in Ireland, with Fingall, the king his land, Meth, the countie of Kildare, Louth, Meisford, speake to this daie English (whereby the simplicitie of some is to be derided, that iudge the inhabitants of the English pale, vpon their first repaire into England, to learne their English in three or foure daies, as though they had bought at Chester a grotes worth of English, and so packt by the rest to be carried after them to London) even so in all other places their native language is Irish.

I find it solemnilie aduouched, as well in some of the Irish pamphlets as in Girald. Camb. that Gathelus or Gaidelus, & after him Simon Brecke, deuised the Irish language out of all other tongs then extant in the world. And thereof (saith Cambrensis) it is called Gathelus, partlie of Gaidelus the first founder, and partlie for that it is compounded of all languages. But considering the course of interchanging and blending of speeches togither, not by inuention of art, but by vse of talkie, I am rather led to beleue (seeing Ireland was inhabited within one yeare after the diuision of tongs) that Bastolenus a branch thither the same kind of speech, some of the 72 that to this familie befell at the desolation of Babel. Unto whom succeeded the Scythians, Grecians, Egyptians, Spaniards, Danes, of all which the tong must needs haue borrowed part, but especiallie retaining the Accs of Spanish then spoken in Granada, as from their mightiest ancestors. Since then to Henrie Fitzempresse the conqueror no such inuasion happened them, as whereby they might be giuen to infect their native language, vnouched in manner for the space of seuentene hundred yeares after the arrivall of Iberius. It seemeth to borrow of the Spanish the common phrase, Comestato, that is, How do you? or how fareth it with you? It fetcheth sundrie words from the Latine, as arget of Argentum, monie; falle of sax, salt; capouille of Caballus, a plough horse, or (according vnto the old English terme) a caball or caple; birreat of the old mother-ten Latine word Birettum, a bonnet. The tong is sharpe and sententious, & offereth great occasion to quicke apophthegms and proper allusions. Wherefore their common iesters and rimers, whom they terme Bards, are said to delight passinge the best that conceiue the grace and propriety of the tong. But the true Irish indeed differeth so much from that they commonlie speake, that scarce one in five hundred can either read, write, or vnderstand it. Therefore it is preferred among certaine of their poets and antiquaries. And in verie deed the language carrieth such difficultie with it, wherfor the strangeness of the phrase, and the curious featnes of the pronuntiation, that a verie few of the countrie can attaine to the perfection thereof, and much lesse a forreiner or stranger.

A gentleman of mine acquaintance reported, that he did see a woman in Rome, which was possessed with a babling spirit, that could haue chatted any language sauing the Irish; and that it was so difficult, as the verie diuell was grieved there-with. A gentleman that stood by answered, that he toke the speech to be so sacred and holie, that no damned fiend had the power to speake it; no more than they are able to saie (as the report goeth) the verse of saint John the euangelist, Et verbum caro factum est. Saie by God his mercie man (quoth the other) I stand in doubt (I tell you) whether the apostles in their copious mart of languages at Ierusalem could haue spoken Irish, if they were apposed: whereat the companie heartilie laughed. As fluent as the Irish tong is, yet it lacketh diuerse words, and borroweth them verbatim of the English. As there is no vulgar Irish word (vnlesse there be some odd terme that lurketh in any obscure shrouds or other of their storehouse) for a cote, a gowne, a dublet, an hat, a drinking cup: but one lieth they vse the same words with a little inflexion. They vse also the contracted English phrase, God morrow, that is to saie, God giue you a good morning.

I haue apposed sundrie times the expertest man that could be had in the countrie, and all they could neuer find out an equiualent Irish word for knaue. The Grecians (according to Tullie his iudgement) were in the same predicament as touching the terme Ineptus: his words are these. Ego mehercule ex omnibus Latinis verbis, huius verbi vim vel maximam semper petiti. Quem enim nos ineptum vocamus, id mihi videtur ab hoc nomine habere ductum, quod non sit aptus, idque in sermonis nostri consuetudine perlate patet. Nam quis aut tempus, quo quid postulet, non videt, aut plura loquitur, aut se ostentat, aut eorum, quibuscum est, vel dignitatis vel commodi rationem non habet, aut denique in aliquo genere aut inconcinuus aut multus est, id ineptus esse dicitur. Hoc vitio cum lata est eruditissima illa Graecorum natio. Itaque qui vim huius mali Graeci non vident, ne nomen quidem ei vitio imposuerunt. Ut enim quidam omnia, quomodo Graeci ineptum appellant, non reperiunt.

Certes I haue bene of opinion (saith Tullie) that amongst the whole crue of Latine terms the word Ineptus hath bene of greatest importance or weight. For he, whom we name Ineptus, seemeth to me to haue the etymologic or ofspring of his name here hence deriued, that he is not apt; which stretcheth far and wide in the vsuall custome of our dailie speech or communication. For he that doth not perceiue what is fitting or decent for euery season, or gableth more than he hath commission to do, or that in bragging, boasting, or peacockwise setteth himselfe forth to the gaze, by making more of the body, than the flesh is worth; or he that regardeth not the vocation and affaires of them, with whom he intermedleth: or in fine, who so is stale without grace, or ouer tedious in any matter, he is tearmed Ineptus; which is almost in English, in my phantase, as faulcie, or malapert. The famous & learned Graeke nation is generallie duffed with this fault. And for that the Grecians could not spee the enormitie thereof, they haue not so much as framed a terme thereto. For if you should ransacke the whole Graeke language, you shall not find a word to counteruaile Ineptus. Thus far Tullie. Yet Budæus would not seeme to acknowledge this barrennesse, but that the Graeke word ἀπειρολογία is equipollent to Ineptus: but that I referre to the iudgement of the learned, being verie willing to find out some other Budæus, that could fashion an Irish word for knaue, whereof this discourse of Ineptus grew. As the whole realme of Ireland is sundred into foure principall parts, as before is said, so each parcell differeth verie much in the Irish tong, euerie countrie hauing his dialect or peculiar manner in speaking the language: therefore commonlie in Ireland they ascribe a proprietie to each of the foure countries in this sort. Ulster hath the right Irish phrase, but not the true pronounciation; Munster hath the true pronounciation, but not the phrase; Leinster is deuoid of the right phrase, and true pronounciation; Connaught hath both the right phrase and true pronounciation. There is a cholerike or disdainfull interiection vied in the Irish language called Boagh, which is as much in English as twish. The Irish both in ancient time and to this daie commonlie vse it, and therefore the English conquerors called them Irish poghes, or pogh apocrypha. Which taunting terme is at this daie verie wrongfullie ascribed to them of the English pale. The English interiection, Fough, which is vied in loathing a ranke or strong saour, seemeth to be sib to the other.

Of the nature of the soile, and other incidents.

The soile is low and waterish, including diuerse little Islands, inuironed with lakes & marish. Highest hills haue standing poles in their tops. Inhabitants especiallie new come, are subiect to distillations, rheumes and fluxes. For remedie whereof, they vse an ordinarie drinke of Aqua vite, being so qualified in the making, that it drieth more, and also inflameth lesse than other hot confections doe. One Theoricus wrote a proper treatise of Aqua vite, wherein he praiseth it vnto the ninth degree. He distinguisheth thre sorts thereof, Simplex, Composita, and Perfectissima. He declareth the simples and ingredients thereto belonging. He teacheth it to be taken as well before meat as after. It drieth vp the breaking out of hands, and killeth the flesh wormes, if you wash your hands therewith. It scoweth all scurfe & scalds from the head, being therewith dailie washt before meales. Being moderately taken (saith he) it sloweth age, it strengtheneth youth, it helpeth digestion, it cutteth regimine, it abandoneth melancholic, it reliseth the heart, it lighteneth the mind, it quickeneth the spirits, it cureth the hydropisie, it healeth the strangurie, it pounceth the stone, it expelleth grauell, it puffeth awaie all ventositie, it keepeth and preserveth the head from whirling, the eies from dazeling, the tong from lisping, the mouth from massing, the teeth from chattering, and the throte from rattling: it keepeth the weasan from stinking, the stomach from wambling, and the heart from swelling, the bellie from writhing, the guts from rumbling, the hands from shivering, & the sinewes from shanking, the veines from crumpling, the bones from aking, & the marrow from soaking. Vltadius also ascribeth thereto a singular praise, and would haue it to burne being kindled, which he taketh to be a token to know the godnesse thereof. And trulie it is a soueraigne liquour, if it be orderlie taken.

The aire is verie holesome, not generallie so cleare and subtil as that of England. The weather is more temperat, being not so warme in summer, nor cold in winter, as it is in England and Flanders. The countrie is flozed with bees, contrarie to the opinion of some writers, who both in this and other errors, touching this countrie, may easilie be excused, as those that wrote by heare saie. No vineyards, yet grapes grow there as in England. They lacke the Robucke, as Polychronicon writeth. They also lacke the bird called the pie. Holweitt in the English pale to this day, they vse to tearme a die confener, a willie pie. Giraldus Cambrensis in his time complaineth, that Ireland had excess of wood, & verie little champaigne ground; but now the English pale is too naked: turffe is their most sell and seacole. No venomous creeping beast is brought forth, or nourished, or can liue in Ireland, being brought or sent. And therefore the spider of Ireland is well knowne not to be venomous, onelie because a frog was found lieng in the meadowes of Waterford somewhat before the conquest, they construed it to import their ouerthrow.

Bede writeth, that serpents conued into Ireland did presentlie die, being touched with the smell of the land, that whatsoever came from Ireland was then of soueraigne vertue against poison. He exemplifieth in certeine men, stung of adders, who drank in water the scrapings of bores that had bene of Ireland, and were cured. Generallie it is obserued, the further west, the lesse annoiance of pestilent creatures. The want whereof is to Ireland so peculiar, that whereas it laie long in question, to whether realme, Britaine or Ireland, the Ile of Man should appertene: the said controuersie was decided, that for so much as venomous beasts were knowne to breed therein, it could not be a naturall part of Ireland. And contrariwise, the Orkades are adiudged to be appendant to Ireland, because those Islands, neither breed nor foster any venomous worme, as Hector Boetius auoucheth. Giraldus Cambrensis writeth that he heard certeine merchants affirme, that when they had vnladen their ships in Ireland they found by hap some toads vnder their ballast. And they had no sooner cast them on the shore, than they would puffe and swell vnmensurable, & shortly after turning vp their bellies, they would burst in sunder. And not onelie the earth and dust of Ireland, but also the verie thongs of Irish leather haue the verie same force and vertue. I haue scene it, saith Cambrensis, experimented, that a toad being encompassed with a thong of Irish leather, and creeping thitherward, endeavouring to haue skipt ouer it, suddenly reculed backe, as though it had bene rapt in the head: whereupon it began to sprall to the other side. But at length perceiuing that the thong did embaie it of all parts, it began to thrille, and as it were to dig the earth, where finding an hole, it sunke awaie in the presence of sundrie persons.

It happened also in my time, saith Giraldus Cambrensis, that in the north of England a knot of pouncers toke a nap in the fields: as one of them late snoozing with his mouth gaping, as though he should haue haue caught flies, it happened that a snake or adder slipt into his mouth, and glided downe into his belly, where harboing it selfe, it began to roame vp and downe and to feed on the yong man his entrails. The patient being soze distracted and aboue measure tormented with the biting pangis of this greivous ghest, incessantlie prayed to God, that if it stood with his gracious will, either wholie to bereaue him of his life, or else of his unspeakable mercie to ease him of his paine. The worme would neuer cease from gnawing the patient his carcase, but when he had taken his repast, and his meat was no longer digested, than it would giue a fresh onset in boing his guts. Diuerse remedies were sought, and medicines, pilgrimages to saints, but all could not preuaile. Being at length schooled by the graue aduise of some sage and expert father, that willed him to make his speedie repaire to Ireland, would tract no time, but busked himselfe ouer sea, and arriued in Ireland. He did no longer drinke of the water of that Iland, and taken of the bittels of Ireland, but forthwith he kild the snake, auoided it downe ward, and so being lottie and liuelie he returned into England. This far Giraldus Cambrensis.

There be some that more question, whether the want of venomous wormes be to be imputed to the proprietie of the soile, or to be ascribed to the prayers of saint Patrike, who conuerted that Iland. The greater part father it on saint Patrike, especiallie such as write his life aswell apart, as in the legend of Irish saints. Giraldus Cambrensis disaffirmeth flatlie that opinion, and taketh it to be a secret or hidden proprietie naturallie vnto the soile, from whom Polydronicon doth not swarue. For my part as I am wedded to neither of both the opinions, so I would haue bene easilie perswaded, being neither hot nor cold in the matter, to rest as a lukewarme neuter, in omitting the one and the other vnkand, were it not that one maister Alan Cope, or some other that masketh vnder his visours, more slanderouslie than pithille had busied himselfe therein. Wherefore, sith I may with better warrant defend my native countrie, than he or his betters may reproue it, especiallie where his slanderous reports are underpropt with him selfe surmises: I purpose vnder maister Cope his correction to cope and buckle with him herein: and before he beare the ball to the goale, to trip him if I may in the way. And because (gentle reader) I mind to make thee an indifferent vmpire in this controuersie, for the better vnderstanding of the matter, I will late downe maister Cope his words, in such wise as they are imprinted in his booke. First therefore thou must vnderstand, that his booke is made in dialog wise, a kind of writing as it is vsed, so commended of the learned. Sententia ex finitua s.
cap. 35.

I will begin (saith Irenæus) with saint Paule. You know that in Melita (which at this daie is called Malta) saint Paule slung into the fire a viper that stucke or did cleaue to his hand. In that Iland scorpions which are elsewhere deadlie or venomous, are become through the gift of saint Paule (as it is supposed) harmlesse.

Tush (quoth Critobulus) that may be percase incident to the nature of the soile.

Paule then (replieth Irenæus) you are in a wrong bor. For the Ilanders (as saint Luke mentioneth) shewed, that a parentuello was brought thither, and because he was not swallowed in the gulfs of the sea, the gods being in their iustian fumes, sent serpents to slay him. And they looked for nothing sooner than to see him euen at a twinkling to perish. But when they perceived him to be so farre distant from death, as that he sustained no harme, ne felt any paine, the people therewith amazed, said he far surpassed mans estate, & that he was a god inuested in man his shape.

You haue reason (answereth Critobulus) you haue hit the naile on the head.

Yea but I praye you clip not my tale (saith Irenæus) but take me with you. Stones are culled in the caue or den wherein saint Paule is said to haue baited or sojourned, which stones in maner in all Europe are soueraine medicines to cure the bitings and stings of scorpions and serpents. Furthermore, they that are borne the five and twentieth of Iannarie (which daie is named the conuersion of S. Paule) in that part soener of the world they are borne, they feare not or grudge not at snakes: yea, that which is more to be admired, the stings of poisoned wormes are healed by the verie spittle of this Iannarie brood. Which thing hath bene of late published by a well lettered man Thomas Fazellus, to haue bene curiously noted of him, as well by profe and experience, as by sure and substantiall examples, if I take not the matter amisse.

Then commeth in Critobulus, whome maister Cope maketh (I will not saie the vice or biecorner) but the pleasant conceipted gentleman of this enterlude, and fetcheth a long leape (for I am sure he could not lumpe so farre) from Malta to Ireland, and frameth his tale in this sort. By the faith of my bodie sir, here is stufte woorth the noting. And now I call to mind, that I haue read and often heard, that the like benefit hath bene imparted to Ireland, through the prayers of saint Patrike the apostle of the said Iland, that is to saie, that Ireland breedeth no venomous worme. And thereupon percase some are accustomed to saie, that there is no poisoned or venomous is taken to haue bene said of most men for their brutish and sauage maners.

To this (saith Irenaus) I am come to vnderstand by the report of diuerse, and also by Bede, that no poisoned or venemous thing is bred in that realme: in so much that the verie earth of that countrie being brought into other realmes, killeth all venemous and poisoned worms. But let the matter fall out which waie it will; I ascribe that propertie not to saint Patrike, but to the nature of the soile, because it hath been knowne long before saint Patrike was boine, that Ireland was indued with that propertie, which is elsewhere easie to be found. Whitherto spasse Cope.

In this discourse (gentle reader) thou seest that spasse Cope handleth two principall points, the propertie of spalta, and the nature of Ireland in destroying venemous worms, the one he ascribeth to the blessed apostle saint Paule, the other he will not in anie wise impute to saint Patrike. Touching the first, as I haue no occasion to intermeddle there, in, so I purpose not for the quarell I haue to the person, to disprove his opinion so farre as it standeth with truth. Wherefore that God that of his bountifull goodnesse gaue the grace to Moses, to turne Aarons rod into a serpent, to turne the riuer into blood, and to worke diuerse other effects that are mentioned in the scripture; to Josue, to staie the sun; to Elias to raise the dead child; to Peter to make the lame go; to heale Cneaz; to reuiue Tabitha; yea with his vertie shadow to cure the sicke; and the God that gaue to that Paule, of whose matter Cope speaketh, his gracious gift to make the lame go; to quicken and raise the deceased; and for his sake to salue his fellow passengers: it is not to be denied, but that God would impart his goodnes to anie region, euen the sooner that any of his blessed seruants would harborough there. And as I doubt not but Simon the tanners house was nothing the worse for lodging so happie a guest as Peter: so am sure spalta was farre the better for harborough so blessed a traveller or passenger as Paule. Which S. Luke letteth not to tell, declaring that all they which were sicke in the Island, flocked to Paule, and were cured; and also that the patient that was father to Publius, in whose house they were three daies verie courteously interteined, was by S. Paule healed. Which cure as well of that patient, as of the residue of the Islanders, did not onlie extend to their bodies, but chieflie & especiallie to their soules, according to the opinion of the learned diuines. For as our saul or Iesus Christ was neuer thought to cure anie ones bodie, but he would also heale his soule: so it must be thought of his apostles, in whose steps both in life and miracles they traced. And therefore the learned hold opinion, that S. Paule being in spalta expelled from diuerse of their soules the old serpent that deceived our progenitors Adam and Eue; for which God is to be magnified and glorified. Thus much I thought good here to insert, as a clause not wholly swaruing from that we treat of, and also that I would be found press and readie, as farre as my simple skill stretcheth, to vnderstand anie opinion that tendeth to the honor and glorie of God.

Whobest for so much as spasse Cope hath so strictlie dealt with Ireland, as with a countrie nothing appertaining to this matter, I trust he will pardon me, to be somewhat bold with him, touching the historie of spalta, that as his negligence shall be in this one disallowed, so his iudgement shall be in the other reuerfed. First therefore where he writeth, that the inhabitants of spalta clamabant, that is, cried, or shawted, it was not so. The Greeke text runneth, οἱ ἀλλήλους, Dicebant ad inuicem, that is to saie, They muttered one to an other. And saint Luke paraphraseth his meaning after. For when they perceiued that the viper did not amole Paule, then saith saint Luke, Conuertentes se, dicebant eum esse deum; They turning the one towards the other, whispored or muttered that Paule was a god. Now put the case they cried, as spasse Cope saith, is it like that Paule was so busie in making of a fire, or that his cares did wander so farre off, as that he could not heare them? And if he heard them, thinke you that he would haue bene whist, in hearing God so farre blasphemed, as that he would suffer himselfe to be described? so trulie. He would haue taken on, as he and Barnabas did at Lissris, where the inhabitants named them gods, Barnabas to be Jupiter, and Paule, for that he was well spoken, to be Mercurie. For when the apostles heard of their idolatrie, renouncing their clothes, they rush into the throng, crying and speaking, that they were mortall men, &c. In which place S. Luke putteth an expresse difference as it were of set purpose, betwene both the words, Clamantes & dicentes. spasse Cope addeth further, Delatum est paricidam, and yet the Greeke hath πόντος φόνεως; Omnino interfectori, or as the vulgar text is, Utique homicida est homo hic. So that they take him to be but a manquello, yet spasse Cope maketh him a parricide, which is worse. For although euerie parricide be a manquello, yet E conuerso, euerie manquello is not a parricide.

spasse Cope proceedeth further, Irati dy. serpentes, qui eum rollerent, immisit: The gods being angrie sent serpents to dispatch Paule. And yet forsooth, all these serpents were but one viper, as is plainelie exprest in the text, vlesse spasse Cope would teach saint Luke to tell his tale after the finest fashion, least the apostle should haue bene thought to haue fitoned. As a parson his spell, wherein mention is made of them that Christ fed in the desert, or wilderness. (quothe the parson) what a Christ was that, that with fine barlie loaves, and fine fishes fed fine hundred persons. The clirke hearing his master to grate ouer long on that point, for he did often iterate that sentence, stole by to the pulpit, and plucking the parson by his gowne, whispored in his eare that Christ fed fine thousand. Hold thee contented thou foolish fellow (quothe the parson) if I should tell mine hearers of so great a number, I should but discredit the gospeller, and they would not beleue me. So it fareth with spasse Cope. Wellike he mistrusted, that if he had said, that one viper could haue slaine Paule, the reader would haue suspected the vntruth of the matter: because it carrieth great likelihood with it, that one man could withstand one viper: and therefore to saue saint Luke his credit, he increaseth the number by putting the plurall for the singular. Whereas therefore it standeth with spasse Cope his pleasure, to flourish in his rhetoricall figure named, Veritatis superlatio, in terming muttering, shawting, a manquello, a parricide, one viper, serpents: he must be bozne withall, if in the heat of his figure he step a little abozie in the remnant of his discourse. For thus he saith.

And thereupon it is reported percase by some men, that there is nothing venemous or poisoned in Ireland, but the men and women. Which is taken to haue bene spoken by most men for their brutish and sauage maners. Here (good reader) thou must vnderstand that spasse Cope putteth the text doونه and the glose. The text is, There is nothing in Ireland venemous but the inhabitants. The glose is, This is said to haue been spoken for their brutish and sauage conditions. Now well harpt by saint Lankfield. Here is a glose, I undertake you, suitable to the text. But Saint Paule heard not the inhabitants of spalta.

Act. 14. vers. 12, 13, 14.

spasse Cope his rhetorique.

The description of Ireland.

let vs see, how cunninglie M. Cope bequitheth himselfe. First he obserueth not Decorum personæ, secondlie he followeth not Decorum dialogi, thirdlie he sheweth herein little diuinitie. Touching the first point, who knoweth not, that these iapes and gibes are onelie fit for ruffians, vices, swashbucklers & tospots. And trulie they befit a diuine as well, as for an asse to twang quipassa on a harpe or gitterne, or for an ape to striske trenchmoeze in a paire of buskins and a doublet. The heathen misliked in an orator squiritlie, what should be thought then of a diuine, whome saint Paule would haue to be sober, modest, graue, and wise? Unlesse M. Cope leaning to the letter of saint Paule his words would beare vs in hand, that saint Paule would haue modestie to rest onelie in bishops. We are commanded in the old and new testament, to loue our neighbors as our selues. Which doth imple, that we ought not to slander our neighbors.

And shall a diuine then speake vncharitable, not onelie of one, but of an whole realme, and not onelie speake but also write, yea and that in the language that is vniuersallie spoken, thoroughout the greater part of the world, vpon no sure ground, but onelie vpon heare saie, weicng not what the prophet writeth, Perdes omnes qui loquuntur mendaciâ, Thou shalt destroye all them that speake vntruths: And were it that anie such slim slim flirts were soothed by anie person of credit; yet (as me seemeth) it would stand more with the grauitie of a diuine, that such childish quips, and scoresfull talvnts should sooner by his meanes charitable be whistled, than thorough his procurement carpinglie published. I will stand no longer on this point, but onelie craue M. Cope to resort to the fist of M. Critabulus, and there peruse Christ his verdict touching slanderous tongues. To come to the second part, in which he obserueth not Decorum dialogi, thou shalt vnderstand (good reader) that Critabulus, or Critabulus, whome M. Cope maketh his bagpipe to belch out his rancour, is a Germane borne, as M. Cope saith, who seemeth to be Critabulus his godfather. Now let anie one, that is acquainted with the manners of Germans, iudge, if it be decent, that one of them should scoffe and scoone the conditions and fashions of other countries. I will not speake by heare saie, as M. Cope doth, but by clesight. I could neuer espie nor probablie haue I heard it reported, no not of the mere sauage Irish, such quaffing, such swilling, such bolling, such gulling, such brutish drunkennesse, such sursetting, such vomitting, as I haue seene some Germans do. In god soth it is knowne, and for my part I haue seene it being beyond the seas, that in their carowling and cup friendship, they threaten such kindnesse on their companions, that least their felowes should mistrust them with double dealing, they will not sticke to shew them the bottome of their stomachs; & to the end they should take the better view thereof, they will place it now and then in their neighbors bosome.

Thus when they haue cast their gorges, they clap on their thumbe hats, and run like bedlem barretors into the streets with their naked flatbets, and there they keepe such a stinking sturre with hacking of stons, with beuwing of blocks, with thwitting of stocks, with striking of stalles, with thumping at doores, that it would make a horse breake his halter, to see so drunken a pageant. In fine, this qualitie is so naturallie ingrafted in the greater part of them, that a famous diuine did not sticke of late to saie openly in his lecture, that drunkennesse in that countrie man, was either Peccatum originale or Accidens inseparabile. I write not this (I take God to record) to the reproch or slander of that countrie (being loth to commit the selfe same fault that I reprehend in anie other) but onelie my meaning is to settle before the reader his eyes the absurditie of M. Cope, in framing poore Critabulus to flout Ireland, considering that if he cast his eye homeward, he shall find as filthy puddle in his owne countrie, as in other realms. And therefore this quip saie as vnseemelie in his mouth, as for an whoze to reprehend bitchenie, or for an vsurer to condemne simonie. For as there is nothing lesse to be tollerated, than for anie one to haue an other to account for his life, that can yeld no account of his owne: so there is nothing that ought to mowzell by anie one from rebuking other nations, than to see the misdeancor of his owne native countrie. I would wish M. Critabulus or M. Cope, if it shall please him to make by the master, with indifference to weie the estate of Ireland, and so without parcialitie to frame his iudgement.

Ireland, and especiallie the ruder part is not stored with such learned men as Germanie is. If they had found preachers, and sincere liuers, that by the embalming of their carian soules with the sweet and sacred flowers of holie writ, would instruct them in the feare of God, in oberseng their prince, in obseruing the lawes, in vnderpropping in ech man his vocation the weale publike; I doubt not, but within two or three ages M. Critabulus his heires should heare so good a report run of the reformation of Ireland, as it would be reckoned as ciuill as the best part of Germanie. Let the soile be as fertile and bette as anie would wish, yet if the husbandman will not manure it, sometime plow and care it, sometime harrow it, sometime till it, sometime marle it, sometime delue it, sometime dig it, and sow it with god and sound coine, it will bring forth weeds, bindcoine, cockle, darnell, bzambles, bziers, and sundrie wild shots. So it fareth with the rude inhabitants of Ireland, they lacke vniuersities, they want instructors, they are destitute of teachers, they are without preachers, they are deuoid of all such necessities as apperteine to the training vp of youth: and notwithstanding all these wants, if anie would be so forwardlie set, as to require them, to vse such ciuilitie, as other regions, that are sufficientlie furnished with the like helps, he might be accounted as vnrasonable, as he that would force a creeple that lacketh both his legs to run, or one to pipe or whistle a galliard that wanteth his vpper lip.

But such is the corrupt nature of vs worldings, and me thinketh such vaine humors are not bitterlie dried vp in our sage and mortified diuines. We are most commonlie giuen rather to talvnt that which is amisse, than to praise that which is good; and rather we follow the spider in soking the poison, than in imitating the bee by sucking the honie. Now that it appeareth, that it was not sitting for the author being a diuine, to write so vncharitable, nor for M. Critabulus being a Germane to carpe other countries so snappishlie: let vs see what wholesome diuinitie hath bene here vttered, and how well the finewes of M. Critabulus his argument shall be found to hang together, when the anatomie thereof by peccemeale shall be examined. I call to mind (quoth M. Critabulus) that I haue read and often heard, that the like benefit hath bene granted to Ireland though the prayers of S. Patrike. M. Critabulus read & heard that by the prayers of S. Patrike, Ireland hath no venemous worme: Ergo some hold opinton, that the poison resteth onlie in the people. Truly this argument hangeth together by verie strange gimbolds. And I dare say, M. Cope neuer learned this kind of reasoning in the famous college of Pagdalene in Drford, what so euer M. Critabulus did in Germanie. But let vs put the logike apart, & scan the singular point of diuinitie. I would gladlie lerne in what part of scripture or in what ancient father M. Critabulus read or heard (for most of his learning hath bene, as it seemeth, purchased by heare-saie) that ante holie prelat, that came of mere charitie to conuert a countrie from night to light, from rudenesse to knowledge, from infidelitie to christianitie, from vice to vertue, from the diuell to God (which doth imple an expectall zeale in saluing their soules) would purge the soile of all venomous woymes, & leaue the soules that haue moze need to be wooeded, wholie infected with the contagion of vice and sinne. Whereby insuech that the place is better than the inhabitants, and so consequentlie the saluing of the apachabees must be falsified: Non propter locum gentem, sed propter gentem locum Deus elegit: God did not chose the people for the place, but he elected the place in respect of the people. Our sauour Iesus Christ dispossessioning the patient of the legion of diuels, permitted them to enter into an heard of hogs. Critabulus would haue Christs saints do the contrarie, to dispossele the hogs, and to leaue the men possessed with diuels. For so he reporteth saint Patrike to haue done, by riding the land of all poisoned woymes, & leauing the rancour to lurke in the people. Trulie if the matter stood so farre out of ioiut, I doubt not, but the Islanders might haue come as lawfullie to him, as the Gergesens came ingratefullie to Christ, requiring him to depart their countrie. For such a scoffing prelat, his come had bene better than his companie, sith his abode would tend rather to the peruertering, than the conuerting of their Island.

Hitherto thou hast heard (gentle reader) how gallantlie Critabulus hath played his part: now shall I desire thee to vied how sagellie Ireneus claspeth vp all the whole controuerfie. He saith it is the nature of the soile, not to breed ante venomous woyme, and that was incident thereto before saint Patrike was borne. How proue you that sir: Pleaseth you to skew your eie towards the margent, and there shall you find the five and thirtith chapter of Solinus solemnlie quoted. Touching this matter, there is nothing in Solinus but this: Illic anguis nullus, auis rara. In Ireland is no snake, and seloome a bird, & yet birds are as commonlie there as in anie other countrie. But I would gladlie vnderstand how this authoritie of Solinus furthereth M. Ireneus his opinion. Ireland bred no snake before saint Patrike was borne: Ergo it ingendzed no toad, no adder, no frog, noz anie other diuulent woyme. As if a man would reason thus: Before saint Patrike his time there was no horsemill in Ireland: Ergo before his time there was no milhorse. Certes he that would wind vp his conclusion so fondlie, might be thought to haue as much wit as a rosted hore. His authoritie of Solinus is so far from vpholding Ireneus his assertion, as that it plainelie seemeth quite to ouerthrow it, & as it were in his owne turne, it giueth him a fall.

For the cause whie saint Patrike was moued to expell all the venomous woymes out of Ireland, might probable haue bene coniectured, to haue proceeded of this; that he perceiuing the land to breed no snakes, therof was occasioned, for the furthering of christian faith, to expell other kind of woymes that lurked there before his comming, as toades, adders, blind woymes, frogs, &c. Here perchase M. Cope may blench me, in replieng that Anguis may be construed generallie for all kind of vermine, and so I might be taken tardie in building my discourse vpon a misconstruction.

In good sooth to omit what strange and absurd signification Anguis should beare, by notifieng a poisoned spider and such like, and in mine opinion further from the purpose, than the father that dissuading his sonne from plaieng on fundate, fortified his reason with the old said saw, Non est bonum ludere cum sanctis. It is not good, quoth he, to plaie on fundates or holie daies. Is it (thinke you) felonie or treason, to bring the credit of Solinus in question, for mistaking Anguis as well as Auis? For as he was grosslie decciued in the one, in writing that birds were rare in Ireland; so might he haue straid as likelie in the other, by disburdening Ireland of all venomous woymes, because the Island wanted in his time but one or two kinds, as a snake and a toad. Where a man buildeth vpon euerie twatling and pralling rumor, and his eie is not his iudge, he may be sure, that such slieng tales will catch manie feathers before they come at him that is as far distant from their nests, as Solinus was from Ireland when he wrote his pamphlet. The profe thereof as it is daillie tried, so not manie yeares past hath bene verie prettie beressed. There was a gentleman of mine acquaintance that met his enemie in the fields, where they both vpon a trifling quarell fought so frendlie, as they had more need to haue bene graped together with cables, than parted by indifferent sticklers. Howbeit, because the gentleman was neuer before flesht, and yet nothing at all that daie, for each of their blowes did commonlie light on the meadow where they fought, a friend of his reported well of him to an other, saying, that he was like in time to proue a proper man of his hands, for the well handling of his weapon in his late combat. Wherevpon some after, the other doubling the gentleman his praise, gaue notice to an other, that such a gentleman (naming him) fought valiantlie such a daie in such a place. Immediatlie vpon this in a shire or two off, it was noised that the partie praised, fought with two at once in such a place, naming the meadow. At length it was bruted, that he fought foure severall daies; and I am well assured that was the first fraie that euer he made, and I thinke it will be the last, vnlesse he be forced manure his heart to the contrarie.

Not long after it happened, that a gentleman and I trauelled abroad the countrie of set purpose to disport our selues, and so to retorne afresh to our books, where entering in communication with a blunt countrie lob (yet such an one as toke his halfe pence to be good siluer) that knew the foresaid champion. My companion and I made wise, as though we were not acquainted with him, or euer heard of the combat: Now in good faith gentleman (quoth he) you would do verie well to enter in acquaintance with him; for ouer this, that he is a gentleman abundantlie endued with singular good qualities, he is become of late so valiant a cutter, as he maketh blading his daillie breakfast. By saint Marie, quoth my companion, that is verie cold roste, and if his breakfasts be no better than a peece of cold proun, I little weigli how seloome I take a repast in his companie at anie such ordinarie. Paie, my meaning is (quoth the other) that he useth to fight fresh and fast, euerie morning, in so much that of late, I dare bide by it, he fought eight daies in one weeke. At which words I for my part coulde not restraine from laughing, seeing how demurelie the fellow kept his countenance, and how that he spake Bona fide. Wherevpon I shaped him an answer and said, that I neuer heard of anie that fought eight daies in one weeke, but onelie in old time, when five quarters made vp the yeare.

The fellow perceiuing that he ouershot himselfe, replied: Sir, you take me verie short, as long and as verie a lowbie as you imagine to make me: my meaning is, that he fought eight severall times in one weeke. Eight times (quoth my companion) then belike he fought once aboue commons. For you told vs right now, that he made his fraie his morning breakfast, and whereas there are but seauen daies in the weeke, & he fought (as you report) eight times, and you know that eight maketh one aboue seauen, and seauen maketh six and one vnder eight; either you must confesse that he fought out his breakfast, dinner, beuer or supper; or else you must grant that there be eight daies in one weeke, or at the least two breakfasts in one daie: and that I am sure you will confesse to be as great an absurditie as the other. ¹⁰ Paie (quoth the clowne) and you intrap me with such subtiltie, you shall dine, sup and breake your fast alone for me, and therewithall departed. Whereby may be gathered, that if he had bin soothed vp, & his tongue let to run at libertie vncontrolld, like a bolue that runneth in a smooth allie without ante rub, he would haue brought himselfe to that baie, as he would not sticke to saie that his friend had fought eight daies in one houre. Wherefore as this pudding his pizke grew at length by report to an huge post, so the want of one venemous woorme in Ireland, being bured in ²⁰ foreign realmes, might haue bene so thwitted and mangled in the cariage before it came to Solinus his cares, as he might haue bene informed, that the countrie was denoid of all venemous woormes, whereas indeed there lacked but one kind.

Like as God of his iustice punisheth a countrie that is hardhearted, with outward woormes: so of his mercie they are remoued from a realme that is pliant to follow his lawes and precepts. As when Pharaos would not listen to God his threats denounced him by the preachers of God, Moses and Aaron, Egypt was punished with frogs and diuerse kind of flies, as is exprest at full in holie writ: and againe vpon Pharaos his feined promises (the secrets of whose hollow heart God perfectlie knew) at the instance of Moses, these plagues were appeased, and the vermine quite ertingished: so I praise you, is it so absurd a position to hold, that saint Patrike finding the Irish priest to embrace the gospell, as he did in verie deed, might stand so highlie in God his fauor, as though his earnest petition made to God, the poisoned woormes should be abandoned? This is not so rare a thing vpon the implanting of christian faith in anie region, but rather a propertie incident thereto, according to Christ his promise: Signa autem eos, qui crediderint, haec sequentur: In nomine meo demonia ejicient: linguis loquentur nouis: serpentes tollent: & si mortiferum quid biberint, non eis nocet: super egros manus imponent, & bene habebunt. And these tokens shall follow them that beleue; In my name shall they cast out diuels, they shall speake with new tongues, they shall dye awaie serpents, and if they drinke anie deadlie thing it shall not hurt them: they shall laie hands on the sicke, and they shall be cured. Wherefore, sith it is so euidentlie warranted by scripture, that in the name of Iesus, serpents may be druen awaie, if Ireland be found through anie such means to be denoid of poisoned woormes, we are to ascribe the glorie hereof to God, according to the saleng of the prophet; A domino factum est istud, & est mirabile in oculis nostris, Quod bath bene donec by God, and it seemeth wonderfull in our eyes.

Thus farre (gentle reader) inroaching vpon thy patience, I haue imploied my trauell in defending my native countrie, against such as labour to distaine it with their slanderous scoffes. Touching the principall question, whether S. Patrike did expell poisoned woormes out of Ireland, or whether it be the nature of the soile, as I said in the entrie of this discourse; so I saie againe, that I weigh not two chips which waite the wind bloweth, because I see no inconuenience that may insue either of the affirmatiue or negatiue opinion. And therefore if M. Cope had dealt as modestlie as Cambrensis, the author of Pelichronicon or others, that stood to the demall, he would haue gene scotfree with his complices, and haue made in mounterbankwise the most he could of his wares. But for that he would needs see further in a millstone than others, and not onelie slenderlie disproue the trinitall opinion, but scorefullie stander an whole realme, wherein he shall find his superiors in honour. His betters in parentage, his peres in learning, his mates in wisdom, his equals in courtessie, his matches in honesty: I must craue him to beare it patientlie, if by crieng him quittance, I serued him with a dish of his owne cookerie. And if for this my strect dealing with him (whereunto I was the soner led, for that as it is courtessie to mollifie wild speeches with mild answers, so I reckon it for good policie now and then to cleaue knurd knobs with crabbed wedges) he will seeme to take pepper in the nose, for anie recompense he is like to haue at mine hands, he may wipe his nose on his sleeve. And if it shall stand with his pleasure, to replie either in English or in Latine (the occasion of which is rather of him growne than by me giuen) he shall find me willing, if God spare me health, to reioine with him in so good a quarrell, either in the one language or the other: and when both tales are heard, I beseech him, for my part, that shall be druen to the wall.

Cambrensis reporteth of his owne knowledge, and I heare it auowed by credible persons, that barnacles thousands at once are noted along the shores in Ireland to hang by the beakes, about the edges of putrified timber, as ships, oares, masts, and holds, and such like, which in procelle taking linelie heat of the sunne, become waterfoules, and at their time of ripenesse either fall into the sea, or flie abroad into the aire. The same doe neuer couple in the act of generation, but are from time to time multiplied, as before is exprest.

Aneas Syluius writeth himselfe to haue pursued the like experiment in Scotland, where he learned the truth hereof to be found in the Islands Orkades. Giraldus Cambrensis gathereth hereof a partie conclusion against the Jewes in this wise following: Respice infelix Iudae, respice, vel sero, primam hominis generationem ex limo sine mare & femina. Secundamque ex mare sine femina, ob legis venerationem, diffiteri non audes. Tertiam solum ex mare scilicet & femina, quia vidualis est, dura ceruice approbas & affirmas. Quartam vero, in qua sola salus est ex femina scilicet sine mare obstinata malicia in propriam perniciem detestaris. Erubescere miser, erubescere, & saltem ad naturam recurre, quae ad argumenta fides, ad instructionem nostram noua quotidie animalia sine omni mare vel femina procreat & producit. Prima ergo generatio ex limo, & haec vltima ex ligno. Illa quidem quoniam a Domino natura tantum semel, ideo semper obstupenda processit. Istam vero non minus admirabilem, minus tamen admirandam (quia saepe fit) imitatrix natura administrat. Sic enim composita est humana natura, ut nihil, praeter inusitatum & raro contingens vel pretiosum ducat vel admirandum. Solis ortum & occasum, quo nihil in mundo pulchrius, nihil stupore dignius, quia quotidie videmus, sine omni admiratione praeterimus. Eclipsin vero solis, quia rarius accidit, totus orbis obstupescit. At idem etiam facere videtur, flatu solo, & occulta quadam inspiratione citra omnem mixturam apum ex fauo procreatio.

Marke thou wretched Jew, saith Cambrensis, marke yet at length the first creation (that is of Adam) of earth without male or female. of a woman without man, with sturdie and obstinat rancor to thine bitter destruction thou dost detest.
 Wholly therefore thou unhappie Jew, be ashamed of this thy fallie, and at the least wise haue recourse to nature, and settle his workes before thine eyes, that for the increase of faith, and to the lessening of vs, daily breath & ingendryeth new living creatures, without the coupling of male or female. Adam was created of earth, the barnacles are ingendryed of wood, because Adam was once created by him, who is Lord of nature, therefore it is continuallie admitted. But for that daime nature the counterfeite resseof the celestiall workman, oftentimes breedeth barnacles, therefore their breed is accompted more maywellas than to be marvelled, more wonderfull than wonderes. For such is the framing of man his nature, as he demeth nothing pretious or wonderfull, but such things as seldome happen. What may be thought more beautifull than the course of the sunne?
 And yet because we see it daily rise and set, we let it overslip vs as an usuall custome, without anie staring or gazing. Yet we are amazed and astonished at the eclipse, because it happeneth verie seldome. The bees that are ingendryed of the honie combe, onlie by a pisse or secret breathing without anie coupling, seme to uphold this procreation of barnacles. Whtherto Cambrensis, with whom concerning the in-gendrying of bees Iohannes de sancto Geminiano accordeth.

The inhabitants of Ireland are accustomed to moue question, whether barnacles be fish or flesh, & as yet they are not fullie resolved; but most usuallie the religious of strictest abstinence doe eat them on fish daies. Giraldus Cambrensis, and after him Polydronicon suppose, that the Irish cleargie in this point strait. For they hold of certieintie that barnacles are flesh. And if a man saie they had eaten a collop of Adam his leg, he had eaten flesh. And yet Adam was not ingendryed of male or female, but onlie created of claie, as the barnacles of wood & rotten timber. But the Irish cleargie did not so farre strait in their opinion, as Cambrensis & Polychronicon, in their disproue. For the framing of Adam and Cue was supernaturall onlie done by God, & not by the helpe of angels or anie other creature.
 For like as it surpasseth natures course to raise the dead, to lighten or insight the blind, so it stood not with the vniuersall & common linage of nature, but onlie with the supereminent power of God, to frame a man of claie, and a woman of a mans rib. But the ingendrying of barnacles is naturall, & not so won-derfull as Cambrensis maketh it. And therefore the examples are not like.

Now it should seme that in Cambrensis his time, the Irish cleargie builded their reason vpon this plot.
 What soeuer is flesh, is naturallie begotten or ingendryed of flesh; barnacles are not naturallie ingendryed of flesh, but onlie of timber and wood; barnacles therefore are not flesh, vntlesse you would haue them to be woden flesh. And if the reason be so knit it may not be disioynted by Cambrensis his example.
 As if a man should argue thus. She that is begotten of anie man, must be of force daughter to that man; Melcha was begotten of Aran; Ergo Melcha was Arans daughter. This argument is of all parts so fortified, as it seemeth of all sides to be impregnable.
 Yet a busie baine sophister cauilling on the terme (begotten) might saie, that Cue was begotten of Adam, and yet she is not Adams daughter. True it is that Adam was not Cues father, no more than Cue was Adams mother, neither by that ingendrying was there anie degree of consanguinitie sprong be-twene them. But because the word (begotten) is taken in the argument for the naturall ingendrying of man and woman, the instance giuen of Cue doth not disproue the Arior. And yet for the better vnderstanding of the question, it is to be noted that the philosophers distinguish Animalia sensitiua, that is, sensible living things, in two sorts, perfect and vnper-fect. The perfect are they that are ingendryed of seed, the vnperfect without seed. Those that are naturallie ingendryed with seed, can neuer be naturallie ingendryed without seed: albeit Auicenna verie erroneously holdeth the contrarie: as for example.

Because man is naturallie ingendryed of man and woman, no man may naturallie be ingendryed without the copulation of man and woman: yet super-naturallie it may be. As Adam was made without man and woman: Cue framed without woman: our sauour Christ begotten without man. And therfore the diuell could not haue attained him of origi-nall sinne. Contrariwise, the vnperfect may be ingendryed without seed by mire, mud, dung, carien, rotten timber, or anie other thing; and chieslie by the secret influence and insillation of the celestiall planets, as the sunne and such other. As if you put the haire of an horse taile in mire, puddle, or in a dong hill for a certeine space, it will turne to a little thin spralling worme, which I haue often seme & experimented. And they are termed vnperfect, not in respect of their owne nature, in which they are perfect, but in comparison of other sorts of living things.
 Among this crue must barnacles be settled. But here some will saie; Let them be perfect or vnperfect, what then? I would faine know, whether Cambrensis be in an error, or the Irish cleargie. For hitherto I see nothing, but Cambrensis his reason disproued. And it is often seme that a sound opinion may be weak-ned by a feeble reason, as we see manie fatte garments made in the making. It is true: and if anie be desirous to know my mind herein, I suppose, according to my simple iudgement, vnder the correction of both parties, that the barnacle is neither fish nor flesh, but rather a meane betwene both. As put the case it were enacted by parlement, that it were high treason to eat flesh on fridaie, and fish on sun-daie. Trulie I thinke that he that eateth barnacles both these daies, should not be within the compasse of the estatute: yet I would not wish my friend to hazard it, least the barnacle should be found in law fish or flesh, yea and perhaps fish and flesh. As when the lion king of beastes made proclamation, that all horned beastes should auoid his court, one beast having but a bunch of flesh in his forehead departed with the rest, least it had bene found in law that his bunch were an horne.

But some will peraduenture matuell, that there should be anie living thing, that were not fish nor flesh. But they haue no such cause at all. Pits, flesh wormes, bees, butterflies, caterpillers, snailles, grasshoppers, beetels, earwikes, ceremise, frogs, toads, adders, snakes, & such other, are living things, and yet they are neither fish nor flesh, nor yet red herring: as they that are trained in scholasticall points may easilie iudge. And so I thinke, that if anie were so sharpe set (the estatute aboue rehearsed, presupposed) as to eat fridaie or sundaie, he could not be therefor indicted of haulte treason; albeit I would not be his ghest, vntlesse I toke his table to be furnisht with more wholesome and licorous viands. The like question may be moued of the sell, and if it were well canuassed, it would be found at the leastwise a most case. But thus farre of barnacles.

Ireland is stozed of cowes, of excellent horses, of haukes, of fish and of foule. They are not without wolues & grethounds to hunt them, bigger of bone and lim than a colt. Their cowes as also the rest of their cattell, and commonlie at at else fouer the countrie ingendreth (except man) is much lesse in quantitie than those of England, or of other realms. Sheepe few, and those bearing course stables, whereof they spin notable rug. Their sheepe haue short and curt talle. They sheere their sheepe twise yearelie, and if they be left unshorne, they are therewith rather pained than otherwise. The countrie is verie fruitfull both of cozne and grasse. The grasse (for default of god husbandrie) suffered vncut, groweth so ranke in the north parts, that oftentimes it rotteth their cattell. Egles are well knowen to breed in Ireland, but neither so big, nor so manie as bookes tell. The hobbies are of pale caste, in running wonderfull swift, in gallop both false and full indifferent. The nag or the hackeneie is verie good for traueiling, albeit others report the contrarie. And if he be broken accordingly, you shall haue a little fit that will trauell a whole daie without anye bait. Their hobbies of seruice are called chiefe hobbies, being well broken they are of an excellent courage. They reime pallinglie, and champe vpon their bydels brauelie, commonlie they amble not but gallop and run. And these hobbies are but for skirmishes, not for traueiling, for their stomachs are such, as they disdain to be hackned. Thereof the report grew, that the Irish hobbie will not hold out in traueiling. You shall haue of the third sort a bassard or mongrell hobbie, more as tall as the hobbie of seruice, strong in traueiling, caste in ambling, and verie swift in running. Of the hobbie of seruice they make great store, as when at times of need they repose a great pece of safetie. This good Volaterane writeth to haue come from Austurea, the countrie of Hispanie, betwene Gallicia and Portugall, whereof they were named Asturcones, a name now properlie applied to the Hispanish genet.

Dublin the beautie and eye of Ireland, hath bene named by Ptolome, in ancient time, Eblana. Some terme it Dublinia, others Dublinia, manie write it Dublinum, authors of better skill name it Dublinium. The Irish call it, Baile er Cleagh, that is, a towne planted vpon hurdels. For the common opinion is, that the plot vpon which the ciuitie is builded, hath bene a marish ground; and for that by the art or inuention of the first founder, the water could not be voided, he was forced to fassen the quakemire with hurdels, and vpon them to build the citie. I heard of some that came of building of houses to this foundation: and other hold opinion that if a cart or waine run with a round and maine pale through a street called the high street, the houses on each side shall be percerued to shake. This citie was builded, or rather the buildings thereof enlarged, about the yeare of our Lord 1155. For about this time there arriued in Ireland three noble Castrellings that were brethren, Auellanus, Sitaracus, and Puozus. Auellanus being the eldest brother builded Dublin, Sitaracus Waterford, and Puozus Limerike. Of the founder Auellanus, Dublin was named Auellana, and after by corruption of speach Eblana. This citie, as it is not in antiquitie inferiour to anye citie in Ireland, so in pleasant situation, in gorgious buildings, in the multitude of people, in martiall chivalrie, in obedience and loialtie, in the abundance of wealth, in largeness of hospitalite, in maners and civillitie it is superiour to all other citie and townes in that realme. And therefore it is commonlie called the 3rd rith or yong London. The seat of this citie is of all sides pleasant, comfortable, and wholesome. If you would traueise hills, they are not far off. If champion ground, it lieth of all parts. If you be delited with fresh water, the famous river called the Liffie, named of Ptolome Lybnum, runneth fast by. If you will take the view of the sea, it is at hand. The onlie fault of this citie is, that it is lesse frequented of merchant estrangers, because of the bare haven. Their charter is large. King Henrie the fourth gaue this citie the sword, in the yeare of our Lord 1409, and was ruled by a maior and two bailiffes, which were changed into shiriffes by a charter granted by Edward the first, in the yeare of our Lord 1547. In which yeare John Kians and Robert Kians, two worthypfull gentlemen, were colleagues in that office, & there of they are named the last bailiffes & first shiriffes that haue bene in Dublin. It appereth by the ancient seale of this citie, called Signum prepositurae, that this citie hath bene in old time gouerned by a prouost.

The hospitalitie of the maior and the shiriffes for the yeare being, is so large and bountifull, that sothlie (London forspiced) verie few such officers vnder the crowne of England keepe so great a port, none I am sure greater. The maior, ouer the number of officers that take their daile repast at his table, keepeth for his yeare in maner open house. And albeit in tearme time his house is frequented as well of the nobilitie as of other potentais of great calling: yet his ordinarie is so good, that a verie few set feasts are prouided for them. They that spend least in their maioraltie (as those of credit, yea and such as bare the office haue informed me) make an ordinarie account of five hundred pounds for their viand and diet that yeare: which is no small summe to be bestowed in housekeeping, namelie where vittels are so good cheape, and the presents of friends diuerse and sundrie.

There hath bene of late yeares a worthypfull gentleman, named Patrike Scarlesfield, that bare the office of the maioraltie in Dublin, who kept so great port in this yeare, as his hospitalitie to his fame and renowne reffecth as yet in fresh memorie. One of his expectall and entire friends entering in communication with the gentleman, his yeare being well nere expired, moued question, to what he thought his expenses all that yeare amounted? Trueth James (so his friend was named) quoth maister Scarlesfield, I take betwene me and God, when I entered into mine office, the last saint Hierome his daie (which is the morrow of Michaelmasse, on which daie the maior taketh his oth before the chiefe baron, at the archerker within the castell of Dublin) I had three barnes well stozed and thwackt with corne, and I assured my selfe, that anye one of these three had bene sufficient to haue stozed mine house with bread, ale, and beere for this yeare. And now God and god companie be thanked, I stand in doubt, whether I shall rub out my maioraltie with my third barne, which is well nigh with my yeare ended. And yet nothing smiteth me so much at the heart, as that the knot of god fellows that you see here (he ment the sergeants and officers) are readie to sit from me, and make their next yeares abode with the next maior.

And certes I am so much wedded to god fellows, as if I could mainteine mine house to my contentation, with deftraing of five hundred pounds yearelie, I would make humble sute to the citizens, to be their officer these thre yeaeres to come. Duer this, he did at the same time protest with oth, that he spent that yeaere in housekeeping twentie tuns of claret wine, ouer and aboue white wine, sacke, malmesie, muscadell, &c. And in verie deed it was not to be marvelled: for during his maiortaltie, his house was so open, as commonly from five of the clocke in the morning, to ten at night, his butterie and cellars were with one crew or other frequented. To the haunting of which ghests were the sooner allured, for that you should neuer marke him or his bedfellow (such was their burcomnesse) once frowne or wrynkle their foreheads, or bend their browes, or glowme their countenances, or make a fowle face at anie ghest, were he neuer so meane. But their interteimment was so notable, as they would sauce their bountifull & deintie faire with heartie and amiable chere. His porter or anie other officer durst not for both his eares geue the simplest man that resorted to his house Tom dym his interteimment, which is, to hale a man in by the head, and thrust him out by both the shoulders. For he was fullie resolved, that his worship and reputation could not be more diffained, than by the currish interteimment of anie ghest. To be brieve (according to the golden verses of the ancient and famous English poet Geffrie Chaucer:

An housholder, and that a great, was hee, Saint Iulian he was in his countrie.
His bread, his ale, was alwaie after one,
A better viended man was no where none.
Without bakte meat was neuer his house,
Of fish and flesh, and that so plenteouse.
It stewed in his house of meat and drinke,
Of all deinties that men could thinke.
After the sundrie seasons of the yere, So changed he his meat and his suppere.
Full manie a fat partrich had he in mew,
And manie a breme, and manie a lucc in stew.

Some of his friends, that were smudging pentic-fathers, would take him by verie roughlie for his lausling & his outrageous expences, as they tearme it. Truly my maisters (would he saie) take not the matter so hot: who so commeth to my table, and hath no need of my meat, I know he commeth for the good will he beareth me; and therefore I am beholding to thanke him for his companie: if he resort for need, how maie I bestow my goods better, than in releuing the poze? If you had perceived me so far behind hand, as that I had bene like to haue brought haddocke to paddocke, I would patientlie permit you, both largelie to controll me, and friendlie to reprove me. But so long as I cut so large thongs of mine owne leather, as that I am not yet come to my buckle, and during the time I keepe my selfe so farre adote, as that I haue as much water as my ship dralweith: I praye pardon me to be liberall in spending, sith God of his goodnesse is gracions in sending.

And in deed so it fell out. For at the end of his maiortaltie he ought no man a dotkin. What he depended was his owne: and euer after during his life, he kept so worshipie a standing house, as that hee seemed to surrender the princes sword to other maiors, and reserved the port & hospitalitie to himselfe. Not long before him was Nicholas Staniburst their maior, who was so great and good an housholder, that during his maiortaltie, the lord chancellor of the realme was his dailie and ordinarie ghest. There hath bene of late worshipfull ports kept by maister Fian, who was twise maior, maister Sedgraue, Thomas Fitz Simons, Robert Cusacke, Walter Cusacke, Nicholas Fitz Simons, James Wedlow, Christopher Jagan, and diuerse others. And not onelie their officers so farre excell in hospitalitie, but also the greater part of the ciuitie is generallie addicted to such ordinarie and standing houses, as it would make a man muse which waie they are able to beare it out, but onelie by the goodnesse of God, which is the upholder and furtherer of hospitalitie. What should I here speake of their charitable almes, dailie and hourelie extended to the needie? The poze prisoners both of the Pelwgate and the castell, with thre or foure hospitals, are chieflie, if not onelie, relieved by the citizens.

Furthermore, there are so manie other extraordinary beggers that dailie swarme there, so charitable succored, as that they make the whole ciuitie in effect their hospitall. The great expences of the citizens maie probablie be gathered by the worshipie and fairlike markets, wecklie on wednesdaie and fridaie kept in Dublin. Their shambles is so well stored with meat, and their market with corne, as not onelie in Ireland, but also in other countries you shall not see anie one shambles, or anie one market better furnished with the one or the other, than Dublin is. The citizens haue from time to time in fundie conflicts so galled the Irish, that euen to this daie, the Irish feare a ragged and tagged blacke standard that the citizens haue, almost througth tract of time worne to the hard stumps. This standard they carrie with them in hostings, being neuer displayed but when they are readie to enter into battell, and come to the shoocke. The sight of which banteth the Irish about measure.

And for the better training of their youth in martiall exploits, the citizens vse to muster foure times by the yeaere: on Blacke mondaie, which is the morrow of Easter daie, on Maie daie, saint John Baptist his eue, and saint Peter his eue. Whereof two are ascribed to the maior & shiriffes: the other two, to wit, the musters on Maie daie and saint Peter his eue, are assigned to the maior and shiriffes of the Bull ring. The maior of the Bull ring is an officer elected by the citizens, to be as it were capteine or gaudian of the batchelers and the inwedded youth of the ciuitie. And for the yeaere he hath authoritie to chastise and punish such as frequent brothelhouses, and the like vnchast places. He is tearmed the maior of the Bull ring, of an iron ring that sticketh in the corne market, to which the bulles that are pearcelie bated be vsuallie tied: which ring is had by him and his companie in so great price, as if anie citizen batcheler hap to marrie, the maior of the Bull ring and his crue conduct the bridegrome vpon his returne from church, to the market place, and there with a solemne kisse for his plimum vale, he doth homage vnto the Bull ring.

The Blacke mondaie muster spring of this occasion. Soone after Ireland was conquered by the Britons, & the greater part of Leinster pacified, diuerse townesmen of Bristow flied from thence to Dublin, and in short space the ciuitie was by them so well inhabited, as it grew to bee verie populous. Wherevpon the citizens hauing ouer great affiance in the multitude of the people, and so consequentlie being somewhat retchlesse in heading the mounteine enimie that lurked vnder their noses, were wont to come and rolle in clusers, sometime thre or foure miles from the towne. The Irish enimie speng that the citizens were accustomed to fetch such od vagaries, expectallie on the holic daies, & hauing an inkling withall by some false clatterfert or other, that a companie of them would haue ranged abroad, on mondaie in the Easter weeke towards the wood of Cullen, which is distant two miles from Dublin, they laie in skale verie well appointed, and laid in fundie places for their comming. The citizens rather minding the pleasure they should presentlie inioy, than than forecasting the hurt that might insue, flockt vnarmed out of the ciuitie to the wood, where being intercepted by them that late hounding in ambush, they were to the number of five hundred miserable slaine. Whereupon the remnant of the citizens deeming that unluckie time to be a crosse or a dismall daie, gaue it the appellation of Blacke mondaie.

The citie some after being peopled by a fresh supplye of Wiffollians, to dare the Irish enemie, agreed to banket yearelie in that place, which to this daie is obserued. For the maior and the shiriffs with the citizens repaire to the wood of Cullen, in which place the maior bestoweth a coslie dinner within a mote or a rundell, and both the shiriffs within another: where they are so well garded with the youth of the ciuitie, as the mounteine enemie dareth not attempt to snatch as much as a pastie crust from thence. Dublin hath at this daie within the citie and in the suburbs these churches that insue, of which the greater number are parioch churches, onelie Christs church with a few oratories and chappels excepted. Christs church, otherwise named Ecclesia sancta trinitatis, a cathedrall church, the ancientest that I can find recorded of all the churches now standing in Dublin. I take it to haue bene builded, if not in Auellanus his time, yet some after by the Danes. The building of which was both repaired & enlarged by Critius prince of Dublin, at the earnest request of Donat the bishop, and some after the conquest it hath bene much beautified by Robert Fitz Stephans and Strangbow the erle of Penbroke, who with his sonne is in the bodie of the church intombed. The chappell that standeth in the choye, commonlie called the new chappell, was builded by Gerald Fitz Thomas earle of Kildare, in the yeare of our Lord 1510, where he is intombed.

Saint Patrikes church, a cathedrall church, indued with notable liuings, and diuerse fat benefices. It hath a chappell at the north doore which is called the paroch church. This church was founded by the famous and worshipful prelate John Commin, about the yeare of our Lord 1197. His foundation was greatlie advanced by the liberalitie of king John. There hath risen a great contention betwixt this church and Christs church for antiquitie, wherein doubtlesse S. Patrike his church ought to giue place, vntlesse they haue further matter to shew, and better reasons to build vpon than their foundations, in which this church by manie yeares is inferior to the other. Saint Nicholas, Saint Michael, Saint Werberosse, or Saint Warburgh, so called of a Cheshire virgine. The citizens of Chester founded this church, with two chappels thereto annexed; the one called our ladies chappell, the other S. Martins chappell. His feast is kept the third of february. This church with a great part of the citie was burned in the yeare 1301: but againe by the parochians reedified. Saint John the euangelist, Saint Audeon, which is corruptlie called Saint Owen, or Dwen. His feast is solemnized the fourteenth of August. The paroch of this church is accounted the best in Dublin, for that the greater number of the aldermen and the workshops of the citie are demurant within that paroch.

Saint Tullochke now prophaned. In this church in old time, the familie of the Fitz Simons was for the moze part buried. The paroch was meared from the Crane castell, to the fish shambles, called the Cockhill, with Dzelson his innes, & the lane thereto adioining, which scope is now vntied to Saint John his paroch. S. Katharine, S. Michan or Mighan, Saint James; his feast is celebrated the five and twentieth of Iulie, on which daie in ancient time was there a worthise faire kept at Dublin, continuing six daies, vnto which resorted diuers merchants, as well from England, as from France and Flanders. And they afforded their wares so dogdrap, in respect of the citie merchants, that the countrie was yeare by yeare sufficientlie forced by strangers: and the citie merchants not offering their wares, but to such as had not readie chinkes, and the re vpon forced to run on the score, were verie much impoverished. Wherefore partlie thorough the canuassing of the towne merchants, and partlie by the winking of the rest of the citizens, being woon vpon manie gate glosed promises, by plaieng hopepe to beare themselves ouerlie in the matter, that famous mart was suppress, and all forren saile wholie abandoned. Yet for a memorisall of this notable faire, a few cottages, booths, and alepoles are pitched at Saint James his gate. Saint Michael of Poules, alias Paules, Saint Brigide, Saint Kenin, Saint Peter Demonte, or vpon the hill, appendant to Saint Patrikes church. Saint Stephan; this was erected for an hospitall for poore, lame, and impotent lazers, where they abide to this daie, although not in such chaff and sincere wise, as the founders will was vpon the erection thereof. The maior with his brethren on Saint Stephan his daie (which is one of their station daies) repaireth thither, and there doth offer. Saint Andrew now prophaned.

Both the gates nere the White friers, Saint Owen his gate, Hogs gate, Dammes gate, Poule gate, alias Paules gate, Petogate, a goale or prison, Wline tauerne gate, Saint Audeon his gate, hard by the church going downe towards the Cocke street. The reason why this gate, and the Wline tauerne gate were builded, proceeded of this. In the yeare 1315, Edward Bruce a Scot, & brother to Robert Bruce king of Scots arrived in the north of Ireland. From whence he marched on forwards with his armie, vntill he came as far as Castleknocke. The citizens of Dublin being soe amazed at the sudden & Scarborough approach of so puissant an enemie, burned all the houses in Saint Thomas his street, lest he should vpon his repaire to Dublin haue ante succour in the suburbs. The maior (named Robert Pottingham) and communalitie being in this distresse, razed downe an abbete of the frier preachers, called Saint Sauour his monastrie, and brought the stones thereof to these places, where the gates now stand; and all along that wale did cast a wall for the better fortifying of the ciuitie, mistrusting that the wals that went along both the ketes, should not haue bene of sufficient force to outhold the enemie. The Scots hauing intelligence of the fortifying of Dublin, and reckoning it a folie to laie siege to so impregnable a ciuitie, marched toward a place not far from Dublin, called the Salmon leape, where pitching their tents for foure daies, they remoued towards the Paas. But when the ciuitie was past this danger, king Edward the second gaue strict commandement to the citizens to build the abbeie they razed; saieing, that although lawes were squatted in warre, yet notwithstanding they ought to be reuiued in peace. Gurmund his gate, hard by the Cucull, or Cockolds post. Some suppose, that one Gurmundus builded this gate; and thereof to take the name. Others indge, that the Irish assaulting the ciuitie, were discomfited by the earle of Desmond, then by god hap sojourniing at Dublin. And because he issued out at that gate, to the end the balliant exploit and famous conquest of so worthise a potentate should be ingrailed in perpetuall memorie, the gate bare the name of Desmond his gate, The bridge gate, Saint Nicholas his gate, Saint Patrike his gate, Wungan his gate, the Petostreet gate, Saint Thomas his gate, Saint James his gate.

than forecasting the hurt that might insue, flockt unarmed out of the ciuitie to the wood, there being intercepted by them that laie howing in ambush, they were to the number of five hundred miserable slaine. Whereupon the remnant of the citizens determining that unluckie time to be a crosse or a dismall daie, gaue it the appellation of Blaque mondaie.

The citie soon after being peopled by a fresh supplie of Bisskollians, to dare the Irish enimie, agreed to banket yearelie in that place, which to this daie is obserued. For the maiors and the shiriffs with the citizens repaire to the wood of Cullen, in which place the maior bestoweth a coslie dinner within a mote or a rundell, and both the shiriffs within another: where they are so well garded with the youth of the ciuitie, as the mountaine enimie dareth not attempt to snatch as much as a passie crust from thence. Dublin hath at this daie within the citie and in the suburbs these churches that insue, of which the greater number are parioch churches, onelie Christs church with a few oratories and chapels excepted. Christs church, otherwise named Ecclesia sancta trinitatis, a cathedrall church, the ancientest that I can find recorded of all the churches now standing in Dublin. I take it to haue bene builded, if not in Auellanus his time, yet soon after by the Danes. The building of which was both repaired & enlarged by Critius prince of Dublin, at the earnest request of Donat the bishop, and soon after the conquest it hath bene much beautified by Robert Fitz Stephans and Strangbow the erle of Penbroke, who with his sonne is in the bodie of the church intombed. The chappell that standeth in the choro, commonlie called the new chappell, was builded by Gerald Fitz Thomas earle of Bilsdare, in the yeare of our Lord 1510, where he is intombed.

Saint Patrikes church, a cathedrall church, indued with notable liuings, and diuerse fat benefices. It hath a chappell at the north doore which is called the paroch church. This church was founded by the famous and worshipful prelate John Commin, about the yeare of our Lord 1197. This foundation was greatlie advanced by the liberalitie of king John. There hath risen a great contention betwixt this church and Christs church for antiquitie, wherein doubtlesse S. Patrike his church ought to giue place, butlesse they haue further matter to shew, and better reasons to build vpon than their foundations, in which this church by manie yeares is inferior to the other. Saint Nicholas, Saint Michael, Saint Werberosse, or Saint Warburgh, so called of a Cheshire virgine. The citizens of Chester founded this church, with two chapels thereto annexed; the one called our ladies chappell, the other S. Martins chappell. His feast is kept the third of Februarie. This church with a great part of the citie was burned in the yeare 1301: but againe by the parochians reedified. Saint John the euangelist, Saint Audeon, which is corruptlie called Saint Owen, or Owen. His feast is solemnized the fourteenth of August. The paroch of this church is accounted the best in Dublin, for that the greater number of the aldermen and the workshops of the citie are demurant within that paroch.

Saint Tulloche now prophaned. In this church in old time, the familie of the Fitz Simons was for the moze part buried. The paroch was meared from the Crane castell, to the Ash Hammles, called the Cockhill, with Derscon his innes, & the lane thereto adioining, which scope is now vntied to Saint John his paroch. S. Katharine, S. Michan or Mighan, Saint James; his feast is celebrated the five and twentieth of Iulie, on which daie in ancient time was there a worshipful faire kept at Dublin, continuing six daies, vnto which resorted diuers merchants, as well from England, as from France and Flanders. And they afforded their wares so dogcheape, in respect of the citie merchants, that the countrie was yeare by yeare sufficientlie storied by strangers; and the citie merchants not uttering their wares, but to such as had not readie chinkes, and the rebyon forced to run on the scoze, were verie much impouerished. Wherefore partlie thorough the canualling of the towne merchants, and partlie by the winking of the rest of the citizens, being won vpon manie gate glosed promises, by plaieng bopape to breare themselves ouerlie in the matter, that famous mart was suppress, and all forren saile wholie abandoned. Yet for a memorisall of this notable faire, a few cottages, booths, and alepoles are pitched at Saint James his gate. Saint Michael of Poules, alias Paules, Saint Brigide, Saint Benin, Saint Peter Demonte, or vpon the hill, appendant to Saint Patrikes church. Saint Stephan; this was erected for an hospitall for poore, lame, and impotent lazers, where they abide to this daie, although not in such chast and sincere wise, as the founders will was vpon the erection thereof. The maiors with his brethren on Saint Stephan his daie (which is one of their station daies) repaireth thither, and there doth offer. Saint Andrew now prophaned.

Both the gates nere the White friers, Saint Owen his gate, Hogs gate, Dammes gate, Poule gate, alias Paules gate, Petwgate, a goale or prison, Wine tauerne gate, Saint Audeon his gate, hard by the church going downe towards the Cockhill street. The maiors (named Robert Pottingham) and communalitie being in this distresse, razed downe an abbete of the frier preachers, called Saint Sautour his monastrie, and brought the stones thereof to these places, where the gates now stand; and all along that wale did cast a wall for the better fortifying of the ciuitie, mistrusting that the wals that went along both the heies, should not haue bene of sufficient force to withold the enimie. The Scots hauing intelligence of the fortifying of Dublin, and reckoning it a folie to laie siege to so impregnable a ciuitie, marched toward a place not far from Dublin, called the Salmon leape, where pitching their tents for foure daies, they remoued towards the Paas. But when the ciuitie was past this danger, king Edward the second gaue strict commandement to the citizens to build the abbete they razed; saieng, that although lawes were quatred in warre, yet notwithstanding they ought to be reuiued in peace. The Damines street, the Castle street, stretching to the pillorie, Saint Werberosses street, Saint John his street, alias fishamble street, Skinners row reaching from the pillorie to the tolehall, or to the high croffe. The High street bearing to the high pipe. This pipe was builded in the yeare 1308, by a worthie citizen named John Decer, being then mayor of Dublin. He builded not long before that time the bridge hard by Saint Wolffians, that reacheth over the Liffie. The Newgate street, from the Newgate to Saint Audoen his church. Saint Nicholas his street, the Wine sauene street, the Cooke street, the Bridge street. This street with the greater part of the keie was burnt in the yeare 1304. The Woodkete, the Merchant keie, Dismantowne, so called of certeine Casterlings or Normans, properlie the Danes that were called Dismanni, they planted themselves hard by the water side nere Dublin, and discomfited at Clontarke in a skirmish diuerse of the Irish. The names of the Irish captains thaine were Brian Borrough, Diagh macke Bzen, Ladie Okellie, Dolfin Abherdegan, Gille Barramede. These were Irish potentates, and before their discomfiture they ruled the coast. They were interred at Kilmaine ouer against the great croffe. There arriued a fresh supplie of Casterlings at Dublin in the yeare 1095, and settled themselves on the other side of the citie, which of them to this daie is called Dismantowne, that is, the towne of the Dismannes, whereof there ariseth great likelihood to haue bene a separat towne from the citie, being parted from Dublin by the Liffie, as Southwoke is seuered from London by Thames. Saint Thomas his street; this street was burnt by mishap in the yeare 1343. The New buildings, the New street, Saint Francis his street, the Rowme, Saint Patrike his street, the backside of Saint Sepulchres, Saint Iuuen his street, the Poule, or Paulmillstreet, Saint Brigids street, the Sheepe street, alias the Ship street. For diuerse are of opinion, that the sea had passage that waie, and thereof to be called the Ship street.

This as it seemeth not wholie impossible, considering that the sea floweth and ebbeth hard by it: so it carrieth a more colour of truth with it, because there haue bene found there certeine iron rings fastned to the towne wall, to hold and grapple botes withall. Saint Werberosses lane, vp to Saint Nicholas his street, now inclosed, Saint Michaelell his lane, beginning at Saint Michaelell his pipe, Christchurch lane, Saint John his lane, Ram lane, alias the Scholehouse lane, Saint Audoen his lane, Bevers lane. This lane is steep & slipperie, in which otherwhyles, they that make more hast, than good speed, clinke their bums to the stones. And therefore the ruder sort, whether it be through corruption of speech, or for that they giue it a nickname, commonlie terme it, not so homelie, as trullie, Kisse arlle lane. Mochelell lane, alias Backelane, on the southside of the fishamble, the Cooke street lane, Frapper lane, Siglottes hill, Marie lane, Saint Tullocke his lane, Scarlet lane, alias Flouds lane, Saint Pulchers lane, Saint Kenin his lane, the White friers lane, Saint Stephan his lane, Hogs lane, the Sea lane, Saint George his lane, where in old time were builded diuerse old and ancient monuments. And as an insarcher of antiquities may (by the view there to be taken) coniecture, the better part of the suburbs of Dublin should seeme to haue stretched that waie. But the inhabitants being dailie and hourelie molested and preided by their prouling mountaine neighbors, were forced to suffer their buildings fall in decay, and embayed themselves with in the citie walls.

Among other monuments, there is a place in that lane called now Collets innes, which in old time was the Escacar or Erchecker. Which should imple that the princes court would not haue bene kept there, vntill the place had bene taken to be cocksure. But in fine it fell out contrarie. For the baron sitting there solemnlie, and as it seemed, retchleslie: the Irish espieng the oportunitie, rushed into the court in plumps, where surprizing the vnweaponed multitude, they committed horrible slaughters by sparing none that came vnder their dint; and withall, as far as their Scarborough leasure could serue them, they ranfacke the prince his thesaure, vpon which mishap the erchecker was from thence removed. There hath bene also in that lane a chappell dedicated to saint George, likelie to haue bene founded by some worthie knight of the garter. The man with his brethren was accustomed with great triumphs and pageants percelle on saint George his feast to repaire to that chappell, and there to offer. This chappell hath bene of late razed, and the stones therof by consent of the assemble turned to a common ouen, conuerting the ancient monument of a dountie, aduenturous, and holie knight, to the celestake swoeping of a pulloafe baker. The great bridge going to Dismantowne, saint Nicholas his bridge, the Poule gate bridge, repared by Nicholas Saintburst about the yeare one thousand five hundred fortie & foure, the Castell bridge, S. James his bridge.

The castell of Dublin was builded by Henrie Loundres (sometime archbishop of Dublin, and lord iustice of Ireland) about the yeare of our Lord one thousand two hundred and twentie. This castell hath beside the gate house foure goodlie and substantiall towers, of which one of them is named Bermingham his tower, whether it were that one of the Berminghams did enlarge the building thereof, or else that he was long in duresse in that tower. This castell hath bene of late much beautified with sundrie and gorgeous buildings in the time of sir Henrie Sidneie, sometimes lord deputie of Ireland. In the commendation of which buildings an especiall wellwiller of his lordships penned these verses:

*Gesta libri referunt multorum clara virorum, Laudis & in chartis stigmata fixa manent.
Verum Sidnei laudes haec saxa loquuntur, Nec iacet in solis gloria tanta libri.
Si libri pereant, homines remanere valebunt, Si pereant homines, ligna manere queunt.
Lignaque si pereant, non ergo saxa peribunt, Saxaque si pereant tempore, tempus erit.
Si pereat tempus, minime consumitur aenum, Quod cum principio sed sine fine manet.
Dum libri florent, homines dum viuere possunt, Dum quoque cum lignis saxa manere valent, Dum remanet tempus, dum denique permanet aenum, Lana tua, Sidnei, digna perire nequit.*

There standeth nere the castell ouer against a voidrome called Preston his innes, a tower named Flouds tower. It toke the name of la Beale Floud, haue bene a castle of pleasure for the kings to recreate themselves therein. Which was not unlike, considering that a meaner tower might serue such single soule kings as were at those daies in Ireland. There is a village hard by Dublin, called of the said la Beale, chappell Floud.

Saint Pulchers, the archbishop of Dublin his house, as well pleasantlie sited, as gorgeouslie builded. Some hold opinion, that the beautifuller part of this house was of set purpose fired by an archbishop, to the end the gouernors (which for the more part laie there) should not haue so good liking to the house: not far disagreeing from the policie that I heard a noble man tell he ofed, who hauing a surpassing good horse, and such a one as ouer ran in a set race other choise horses, did bobtaile him vpon his returne to the stable, lest anie of his friends casting a fantasie to the beast, should craue him. Saint Stephens graine, Hogging graine, the Steine, Mmantowne graine. In the further end of this field is there a hole commonlie termed Scaldbrothers hole, a labyrinth reaching two large miles vnder the earth. This hole was in old time frequented by a notorious thiefe named Scaldbrother, wherein he would hide all the bag and baggage that he could pilfer. The varlet was so swift on foot, as he hath oftentimes outrun the swiftest and lustiest young men in all Mmantowne, mangre their heads, bearing a pot or a pan of theirs on his shoulders to his den. And now and then, in derision of such as pursued him, he would take his course vnder the gallows, which standeth verie nigh his caue (a fit signe for such an inne) and so being shrowded within his lodge, he reckoned himselfe cocksure, none being found at that time so hardie as would aduenture to intangle himselfe within so intricat a maze. But as the pitcher that goeth often to the water, cometh at length home broken: so this lustie youth would not surcease from open catching, forcible snatching, and priuie polling, till time he was by certeine gaping grooms that late in wait for him, intercepted, fleeing toward his couch, hauing vpon his apprehension no more wrong done him, than that he was not sooner hanged on that gallows, through which in his youth and solitie he was wont to run. Where standeth in Mmantowne graine an hillocke, named little John his shot. The occasion proceeded of this.

In the yere one thousand one hundred fourscore and nine, there ranged three robbers and outlaws in England, among which Robert Hood and little John were chiefe, of all theues doubtlesse the most courteous. Robert Hood being betrayed at a nurrie in Scotland called Wicklies, the remnant of the crue was scattered, and euerie man forced to shift for himselfe. Wherevpon little John was faine to flee the realme by sailing into Ireland, where he sojourned for a few daies at Dublin. The citizens being done to understand the wandering outcast to be an excellent archer, requested him hartlie to trie how far he could shot at random: who yielding to their behest, stood on the bridge of Dublin, and shot to that mole hill, leaving behind him a monument, rather by his posteritie to be wondered, than possible by anie man lining to be counterfoied. But as the repaire of so notorious a champion to anie countrie would soone be published, so his abode could not be long concealed: and therefore to eschew the danger of lawes, he fled into Scotland, where he died at a towne or village called Morauie. Gerardus Mercator in his cosmographie affirmeth, that in the same towne the bones of an huge and mightie man are kept, which was called little John, among which bones, the hucklebone or hipbone was of such largenesse, as witnesseth Hector Boetius, that he thrust his arme through the hole thereof. And the same bone being suted to the other parts of his bodie, did argue the man to haue bene fourteene foot long, which was a pretie length for a little John. Whereby appeareth that he was called little John ironically, like as we terme him an honest man whom we take for a knaue in graine.

Here to the citie of Dublin are the foure ancient manors annexed to the crowne, which are named to this daie, the Kings land; to wit, Newcastle, Passaggard, Ceshire, and Crumlin. The manor of Crumlin payeth a greater cheefe rent to the prince than anie of the other three, which proceeded of this. The seneschall being offended with the tenants for their misdemeanors, took them by verie sharple in the court, and with rough and minatorie speeches began to menace them. The lobbish and desperat clobertousnesse, taking the matter in dudgeon, made no more words, but knockt their seneschall on the forehead, and left him there sprawling on the ground for dead. For which detestable murder their rent was inhanced, and they paie at this daie nine pence an acre, which is double to anie of the other three manors.

Waterford was founded by Sitaracus (as is aforesaid) in the yere one hundred fiftie and five. Ptolome nameth it Danapia, but whie he appropriateth that name to this citie, neither doth he declare, nor I ghesse. This citie is properlie builded, and verie well compact, somewhat close by reason of their thicke buildings and narrow streets. The haue is passing good, by which the citizens through the intercourse of forren traffike in short space attaine to a bundance of wealth. The soile about it is not all of the best, by reason of which the aire is not verie subtil, yea nathelesse the sharpnesse of their wittes seemeth to be nothing rebated or duld by reason of the grossenesse of the aire. For in good sooth the townemen, and namelic students are pregnant in conceiuing, quicke in taking, and sure in keeping. The citizens are verie hardie and warie in all their publicke affaires, slow in the determining of matters of weight, louing to looke yer they leape. In choosing their magistrate, they respect not onlie his riches, but also they weigh his experience. And therefore they elect for their maior neither a rich man that is young, nor an old man that is poore. They are cheerefull in the intertainment of strangers, hartie one to another, nothing giuen to factions. They loue no idle benchesitters, nor luskish sailors: for young and old are wholie addicted to thysling, the men commonlie to traffike, the women to spinning and carding. As they distill the best Aquavita, so they spin the choicest rug in Ireland. A friend of mine being of late demurrant in London, and the weather by reason of an hard hoare frost being somewhat nipping, repaired to Paris garden, clad in one of these Waterford rugs. The mastiffs had no sooner espyed him, but deming he had bene a beare, would faine haue baited him. And were it not that the dogs were partlie muled, and partlie chained, he doubtet not, but that he should haue bene well tugged in this Irish rug; wherevpon he solemnilie vowed neuer to see beare baiting in anie such weed. The citie of Waterford hath continued to the crowne of England so loiall, that it is not found registred since the conquest to haue bene diffained with the smallest spot, or dulked with the least freckle of treason; notwithstanding the sundrie assaults of traitorous attempts: and therefore the cities armes are deckt with this golden word, Intella manet: a polle as well to be hartlie followed, as greatlie admired of all true and loiall townes.

Limerike called in Latine Limericum was builded by Ruons, as is before mentioned, about the yere one hundred fiftie and five. This citie coasteth on the sea hard vpon the riuer Sennan, whereby are most notable seuered Pounder and Connaght: the Irish name this citie Lounneagh, and thereof in English it is named Limerike. The towne is planted in an Island, which plot in old time, before the building of the citie was stored with grasse. During which time it happened, that one of the Irish potentates, raising warre against another of his parts, incamped

The seneschall being offended with the tenants for their misdemeanors, took them by verie sharple in the court, and with rough and minatorie speeches began to menace them. The lobbish and desperat clouertousnesse, taking the matter in budgeon, made no moze words, but knockt their seneschall on the forehead, and left him there sprawling on the ground for dead. For which detestable murder their rent was inhaused, and they paie at this daie nine pence an acre, which is double to anie of the other three manors.

Waterford was founded by Sitaracus (as is aforesaid) in the yere one hundred fiftie and five. Ptolome nameth it Panapia, but whie he appropriateth that name to this citie, neither doth he declare, nor I ghesse. This citie is properlie builded, and verie well compact, somewhat close by reason of their thicke buildings and narrow streets. The haue is passing good, by which the citizens through the intercourse of forren traffike in short space attaine to a bundance of wealth. The soile about it is not all of the best, by reason of which the aire is not verie subtil, yea nathelesse the sharpnesse of their wittes seemeth to be nothing rebated or duld by reason of the grossenesse of the aire. For in good sooth the townemen, and namelic students are pregnant in conceiuing, quicke in taking, and sure in keeping. The citizens are verie hardie and warie in all their publicke affaires, slow in the determining of matters of weight, loning to looke per they leape. In choosing their magistrate, they respect not onlie his riches, but also they weigh his experience. And therefore they elect for their maior neither a rich man that is young, nor an old man that is poore. They are chierfull in the intertainment of strangers, hartie one to another, nothing giuen to factions. They loue no idle bench, whistlers, nor luscious satyrs: for young and old are wholie addicted to thysing, the men commonlie to traffike, the women to spinning and carding. As they distill the best Aqua vite, so they spin the choicest rug in Ireland. A friend of mine being of late demurrant in London, and the weather by reason of an hard hoare frost being somewhat nipping, repaired to Paris garden, clad in one of these Waterford rugs. The massifs had no sooner espied him, but determining he had bene a beare, would faine haue baited him. And were it not that the dogs were partlie myled, and partlie chained, he doubtet not, but that he should haue bene well tugd in this Irish rug; wherevpon he solemnlie bowed neuer to see beare baiting in anie such weed. The citie of Waterford hath continued to the crowne of England so loiall, that it is not found registred since the conquest to haue bene distained with the smallest spot, or dulsed with the least freckle of treason; notwithstanding the sundrie assaults of traitorous attempts: and therefore the cities armes are deckt with this golden word, Intesta manet: a polle as well to be hartlie followed, as greatlie admired of all true and loiall townes.

Limerike called in Latine Limericum was builded by Ruorius, as is before mentioned, about the yere one hundred fiftie and five. This citie coasteth on the sea hard vpon the riuer Sennan, whereby are most notable seuered Houndster and Connaght: the Irish name this citie Lounneagh, and thereof in English it is named Limerike. The towne is planted in an Island, which plot in old time, before the building of the citie was stowed with grasse. During which time it happened, that one of the Irish potentates, raising warre against another of his peers, incamped incamped in that Ile, having so great a troope of hoysemen, as the hoxses ate up the grasse in foure and twentie houres. Whereupon for the notorious number of hoxses, the place is called Loun ne augh; that is, the hoxse bare, or a place made bare or eaten up by hoxses. The verie maine sea is thre scoze miles distant from the towne, and yet the riuer is so navigable, as a ship of two hundred tuns may saile to the keie of the citie. The riuer is termed in Irish Shaune amne, that is, the old riuer; for Shaune is old, & amne is a riuer, deduced of the Latine word Amnis. The building of Limericke is sumptuous and substantiall.

Corke, in Latine Coracium, or Corracium, the fourth citie of Ireland happie planted on the sea. Their hauon is an haven rosall. On the land side they are incombed with euill neighbors, the Irish outlaws, that they are faine to watch their gates houlie, to keepe them shut at seruice times, at meales from sun to sun, nor suffer anie stranger to enter the citie with his weapon, but the same to leaue at a lodge appointed. They walke out at seasons for recreation with power of men furnished. They trust not the coun-trie adjoining, but march in wedlocke among them, selues onellie, so that the whole citie is welnigh linked one to the other in affinitie. Drogheda, accounted the best towne in Ireland, and trille not far behind some of their cities. The one moitie of this towne is in Deth, the other planted on the further side of the water lieth in Ulster. There runneth a blind prophesie on this towne, that Kosse was, Dublin is, Drogheda shall be the best of the thre.

Kosse, an haven towne in Douniffer not far from Waterford, which seemeth to haue bene in ancient time a towne of great port. Whereof sundrie & probable coniectures are giuen, as well by the old dis-tiches that are now a mile distant from the wals of Kosse, betwene which wals and dittches the reliks of the ancient wals, gates, and towers, placed be-twene both are yet to be scene. The towne is built in a barren soile, and planted among a crue of naughtie and prolling neighbours. And in old time when it flozished, albeit the towne were sufficientlie peopled, yet as long as it was not compassed with wals, they were formed with watch & ward, to keepe it from the greedie snatching of the Irish enemies.
With whome as they were generallie molested, so the priuat consensing of one pezzant on a sudden, incensed them to inuiron their towne with strong and substantiall wals. There repaired one of the Irish to this towne on hoxsebacke, & espieng a peece of cloth on a merchants stall, took hold thereof, and bet the cloth to the lowest price he could. As the merchant and he stood dodging one with the other in cheaping the waie, the hoxseman considering that he was well mounted, and that the merchant and he had growne to a price, made wise as though he would haue drauone to his purse, to haue defraied the mo-nie. The cloth in the meane while being tucked up and placed before him, he gaue the spur to his hoxse and ran a waie with the cloth, being not imbarred from his passing pase, by reason the towne was not per-closed either with ditch or wall. The townesmen being pinched at the heart, that one rascall in such scornefull wise should giue them the stampaine, not so much welting the slenderesse of the losse, as the shamefulnesse of the soile, they put their heads togther, consulting how to prevent either the sudden ru-thing, or the post haill streng of anie such aduenturous rakehell hereafter.

In which consultation a famous Wido, a chaff widow, a politike dame, a bountifull gentlewoman, called Kosse, who representing in sinceritie of life the faintnesse of that hearbe whose name she bare, vn-folded the deuise, how anie such future mischance should be prevented: and withall opened his coffers liberallie, to haue it furthered: two good properties in a counsellor. His deuise was, that the towne should incontinentlie be inclosed with wals, & therewithall promised to discharge the charges, so that they would not sticke to find out labourers. The de-uise of this worthie matrone being wise, and the offer liberall, the townesmen agreed to follow the one, and to put their helping hands to the atchiuing of the other. The worke was begun, which thorough the multitude of hands seemed light. For the whole towne was assembled, tag and rag, cut and long taile: none exempted, but such as were bodied and impotent. Some were tasked to delue, others appointed with mattocks to dig, diuerse allotted to the unheaping of rubbish, manie bestowed to the cariage of stones, sundrie occupied in tempering of morter, the better fort busied in ouersailing the workmen, ech one according to his vocation imploied, as though the ciuitie of Carthage were afresh in building, as it is featlie verified by the golden poet Virgil, and neatlie Englished by master doctor Phaer.

The Moores with courage went to worke, some vnder burdens grones:

Some at the wals and towrs with hands were tumbling vp the stones.

Some measurd out a place to build their mansion house within:

Some lawes and officers to make in parlment did begin.

An other had an haven cast, and deepe they trench the ground,

Some other for the games and plaies a statelie place had found.

And pillers great they cut for kings, to garnish forth their wals.

And like as bees among the flours, when fresh the summer falls,

In shine of sunne applie their worke, when growne is vp their yong:

Or when their hives they gin to stop, and honie sweet is sprong,

That all their caues and cellars close with dulcet liquor fils,

Some doo outlade, some other bring the stufte with readie wils.

Sometime they ioine, and all at once doo from their mangers fet

The slothfull drones, that would consume, and nought would doo to get.

The worke it heats, the honie smells of flours and thime ywet.

But to returne from Wido of Carthage, to Kosse of Kosse, and his worke. The labourers were so manie, the worke, by reason of round and exchequer pat-ment, so well applied, the quarrie of faire marble so nere at hand (for they affirme, that out of the trenches and dittches hard by their rampiers, the stones were had: and all that plot is so stonie, that the fouedation is an hard rocke) that these wals with diuerse braue turrets were suddenlie mounted, and in manner sooner finished, than to the Irish enemies notified: which I wisse was no small cosse to them. These wals in circuit are equall to London wals. It hath thre gorgeous gates, Bishop his gate, on the east side: Algate, on the east southeast side: and Southgate, on the south part. This towne was no more famoused for these wals, than for a notable wooden bridge that stretched from the towne unto the other side of the water, which must haue bene by reasonable surteie twelue scoze, if not moze. Diuerse of the poales, logs, and stakes, with which the bridge was underpopt, sticke to this daie in the water. A man C. I. would would here suppose, that so flourishing a towne, so trimlie builded, so substantiallie walled, so well peopled, so plentiouslie with thurstie artificers stoed, would not haue fallen to anie sudden decaye.

Rosse decayed.

But as the secret and deepe iudgements of God are beiled within the couerture of his diuine maiestie, so it standeth not with the dulnesse of man his wit, to beat his braines in the curious insearching of hidden mysteries. Wherefore I, as an historian undertaking in this treatise, rather plainlie to declare what was done, than rashlie to inquire why it should be done: purpose, by Gods assistance, to accomplish, as nere as I can, my dutie in the one, leauing the other to the frivolous deciding of busie heads. This Rosse, who was the foundresse of these former rehearsed wals, had issue three sonnes (howbeit some hold opinion, that they were but hir nephues) who being bolstered out thorough the wealth of their mother, and supported by their traffike, made diuerse prosperous voyages into foren countries. But as one of the three chaymen was imploied in his traffike abroad, so the prettie poplet his wife began to be a flesh occupieng giglot at home, and by report fell so farre acquainted with a religious cloisterer of the towne, as that he gat within the lining of hir smocke. Both the parties wallowing ouerlong in the sinking puddle of adulterie, suspicion began to creape in some townermens brains: and to be hysse, it came so farre, thorough the iust iudgement of God, to light, whether it were that she was with child in hir husband his absence, or that hir lover used hir fondlie in open presence, as the presumption was not onlie vehement, but also the fact too apparent: hir vnfortunat husband had no sooner notice giuen him vpon his returne of these sorrowfull newes, than his fingers began to nibble, his teeth to grin, his eyes to tricke, his eares to dingle, his head to dazell, insomuch as his heart being scared with gelousie, and his wits instilled thorough phrensie, he became as mad as a March hare.

The pangs of gelousie.

But how heauilie soeuer hir husband toke it, dame Rosse and all hir friends (which were in effect all the townermen, for that she was their common benefactresse) were galled at their hearts, as well to heare of the enormous adulterie, as to see the bedlorn pangs of brainesicke gelousie. Whereupon diuerse of the townermen grunting and grudging at the matter, said that the fact was horrible, and that it were a deed of charitie betterlie to grub awate such wild hyubs from the towne: and if this were in anie dispensible wife raked vp in the ashes, they should no sooner trauesse the seas, than some other would kindle the like fire afresh, and so consequently dishonest their wiues, and make their husbands to become changelings, as being turned from sober mood to be hornewood, because rutting wiues make often rammissy husbands, as our prouerb doth inferre. Others soothing their fellows in these mutinies turned the priuat inturie vnto a publike quarrell, and a number of the townermen conspiring together stoeked in the dead of the night, well appointed, to the abbeye, wherein the frier was cloistered (the monument of which abbeye is yet to be scene at Rosse on the south side) where undersparring the gates, and bearing vp the dormitorie doze, they stabbed the adulterer with the rest of the couent thorough with their weapons. Where they left them goating in their blood, roaring in their cabins, and gasping vp their sitting ghosts in their couches.

The bypore was great, and they to whome the slaughter before hand was not imparted, were wonderfullie thereat astonished. But in especiall the remnant of the cleargie bare herie hollow hearts to the townemen: and how frendlie their outward countenances were, yet they would not with inward thought forget nor forgieue so horrible a murder, but were fullie resolved, whensoever oportunitie ferued the m, to sit in their skirts, by making the m soule as sorrowfull a hyrie. These three brethren not long after this bloudie exploit, sped them into some outlandish countrie to continue their trade. The religious men being done to vnderstand, as it seemed, by some of their neighbors, which foresailed them homeward, that these three brethren were readie to be imbarked, flunkt puiellie out of the towne, and refocted to the mouth of the hauen, nere a castell, named Hulke tower, which is a notable marke for pilots, in directing them which waie to sterne their ships, and to eschew the danger of the craggie rocks there on euerie side of the shoze peking. Some iudge that the said Rosse was foundresse of this tower, and of purpose did build it for the safetie of hir children, but at length it turned to their bane. For these reuengers nightlie did not misse to laie a lanterne on the top of the rocks, that were on the other side of the water. Which practise was not long by them continued, when these three passengers bearing saile with a lustie gale of wind, made right vpon the lanterne, not doubting, but it had bene the Hulke tower. But they toke their marke so farre amisse, as they were not ware, till time their ship was dashed and past against the rocks, and all the passengers ouerwhelmed in the sea.

This heauie hap was not so sorrowfull vnto the townermen, as it was gladsome to the religious, thinking that they had in part cried them acquittance, the more that they, which were drowned, were the archbrochers of their brethrens blood. Howbeit they would not crie ho here, but sent in post some of their couent to Rome, where they inhanled the slaughter of the fraternitie so heinouslie, and concealed their owne pranks so couertlie, as the pope excommenced the towne, the towne accursed the friers: so that there was such cursing and banning of all hands, and such dissentions hurle burlie raised betwene the inselues, as the estate of that flourishing towne was turned arse versie, topside the otherwaie, and from abundance of prosperitie quite exchanged to extreme penurie.

The wals stand to this date, a few streets and houses in the towne, no small parcell thereof is turned to orchards and gardens. The greater part of the towne is steepe and steaming vpward. Their church is called Christs church, in the north side thereof is placed a monument called the king of Denmarke his toome: whereby conieecture may rise, that the Danes were founders of that church. This Rosse is called Rosse Nova, or Rosse Ponti, by reason of their bydige. That which they call old Rosse, beareth cast three miles from this Rosse, into the countrie of Weifford, an ancient manour of the earle of Kilbares. There is the third Rosse on the other side of the water, called Rosse Ibarkan, so named, for that it standeth in the countrie of Kilkennie, which is diuided into three parts, into Ibircan, Ida, & Idough. Weifford a hauen towne not far from Rosse, I find no great matters thereof recozded, but onlie that it is to be had in great price of all the English posteritie, planted in Ireland, as a towne that was the first fostresse and harborresse of the English conquerors.

Kilkennie, the best vplandish towne, or (as they terme it) the properest drie town in Ireland, it is parted into the high towne, and the Irish towne. The Irish towne claimeth a corporation apart from the high towne, whereby great factions grow daily betwene the inhabitants. True it is, that the Irish towne tolowne is the ancienter, and was called the old Kilkennie, being under the bishop his becke, as they are ought to be at this present. The high towne was bulded by the English after the conquest, and had a parcell of the Irish towne thereto united, by the bishop his grant, made unto the founders upon their earnest request. In the yeare 1400, Robert Talbot a worthy gentleman, inclosed with wals the better part of this towne, by which it was greatly fortified.

This gentleman deceased in the yeare 1415. In this towne in the choise of the frier preachers, William Marshall earle marshall and earle of Denbroke was buried, who departed this life in the yeare 1231.
Richard brother to William, to whome the inheritance descended, within three yeares after deceased at Kilkennie, being wounded to death in a field gi-uen in the heath of Kildare, in the yeare 1234, the twelve of April, and was intombed with his brother, according to the old epitaph here mentioned:

Hic comes est positus Richardus vulnere fossus, Cuius sub fossa Kilkennia continet ossa.

This towne hath three churches, saint Kennes church, our ladies church, alias S. Maries church, and S. Patricks church, with the abbey of S. John. S.
Kennes church is their chiefe and cathedrall church, a worthy foundation as well for gorgeous buildings, as for notable livings. In the west end of the churchyard of late haue bene founded a grammar schole by the right honorable Pierce or Peter Butler erle of Ormond and Ossorie, and by his wife the countesse of Ormond, the ladie Margaret fitz Gerald, sister to Gerald fitz Gerald the earle of Kildare that last was. Out of which schole haue sprouted such proper impes, through the painefull diligence, and the labourfome industrie of a famous lettered man M.

Peter White (sometime fellow of Oxiall college in Oxford, and scholemaster in Kilkennie) as general-lie the whole weale publike of Ireland, and especial-lie the southerne parts of that Island are greatly thereby furthered. This gentlemen's method in training by youth was rare and singular, framing the education according to the scholars vetne. If he found him free, he would bide him like a wise Schocrates from his booke; if he perceived him to be dull, he would spur him forward; if he understood that he were the worse for beating, he would win him with rewards: finally, by interlasing studie with recreation, sorrow with mirth, paine with pleasure, sweetnesse with bitternesse, roughnesse with mildnesse, he had so good successe in schooling his pupils, as in good soth I may boldly bide by it, that in the realme of Ireland was no grammar schole so good, in England I am well assured none better. And because it was my happy hap (God and my parents be thanked) to haue bene one of his crue, I take it to stand with my dutie, sith I may not stretch mine abilitie in requiting his good turnes, yet to manifest my good will in remembryng his paines. And certes, I acknowledge my selfe so much bound and beholdyng to him and his, as for his sake I reuerence the meanest stone cemented in the wals of that famous schole.

This towne is named Kilkennie, of an holie and learned abbat called Kianicus, borne in the countie of Kilkennie, or (as it is in some bookes recorded) in Connaght. This prelat being in his suckling yeres fostered, through the prouidence of God, with the milke of a cow, and baptized and bishoped by one Luracus, thereto by Gods especiall appointment deputed, grew in tract of time to such deuotion and learning, as he was reputed of all men to be as well a mirrour of the one, as a paragon of the other: whereof he gaue sufficient coniection in his minority. For being turned to the keeping of sheepe, and his fellow shepheards, whole yelding themselves like lusty vagabunds to stouth and sluggishnesse, yet would he still find himselfe occupied in framing with osiars and twigs, little wooden churches, and in fashioning the furnitures thereto appertaining. Being kept further in yeares, he made his repaire into England, where cloistering himselfe in an abbey, wherof one named Doctus was abbat, he was whole wedded to his booke, and to deuotion: wherem he continued so painefull and diligent, as being on a certeine time penning a serious matter, and hauing not ful-lie dwtone the fourth vocall, the abbey bell tynge to assemble the couent to some spirituall exercise. To which he so hastened, as he left the letter in semicirclewise vnfinisshed, vntill he returned backe to his booke. Sone after being promoted to ecclesiasticall orders, he trauelled by the consent of his fellow monks to Rome, and in Italie he gaue such manifest pfose of his pietie, as to this daie in some parts thereof he is highly renowned.

Thomas towne, a proper towne bulded in the countie of Kilkennie, by one Thomas Fitzantonie an Englishman. The Irish thereof name it Wallie mac Andan: that is, the towne of Fitzantonie.
This gentleman had issue two daughters, the one of them was espoused to Denne, the other married to Archdeacon, or Packodo, whose heires haue at this daie the towne betwene them in coparcenarie.
But because the reader may see in what part of the countie the cities and chiefe townes stand, I take it not far amisse to place them in order as insueeth.

Cambrensis observed in his time, that when the sea doth eb at Dublin, it ebberth also at Bristow, and floweth at Milford and Wexford. At Wickloa the sea ebberth when in all other parts it commonlie floweth. Furthermore this he noted, that the river which runneth by Wickloa upon a low eb is salt, but in Arckloa the next haven towne, the river is fresh when the sea is at full. He writeth also, that not far from Arckloa standeth a rocke, and when the sea ebberth in one side thereof, it floweth in the other side as fast. Cambrensis insearcheth diuerse philosophicall reasons in finding out the cause, by obseruing the course of the moone, who is the emperesse of moisture. But those subtilties I leaue for the scholestricks.

Of the strange and woonderfull places in Ireland.

The fourth chapter.

Thinke it good to begin with S. Patrike his purgatorie, partly because it is most notoriouslie knowne, & partly the more, that some writers, as the author of Polychronicon and others that were mislead by him, seeme to make great doubt where they need not. For they ascribe the finding out of the place not to Patrike that converted the countrie, but an other Patrike an abbat, whom likewise they affirme to haue bene employed in converting the Island from heathenrie to christianitie.

But the author that brocheth this opinion, is not found to carie anie such credit with him, as that a man may certainlie affirme it, or probablie conjecture it; unless we relie to the old withered worne earthen legend, loaded with as manie lowd lies, as lewd lines. The better and the more certaine opinion is, that the other Patrike found it out, in such wise as Cambrensis reporteth. There is a poole or lake, saith he, in the parts of Ulster, that inuironneth an Island, in the one part whereof there standeth a church much lightened with the brightsome recourse of angels: the other part is ouglie and gasslie, as it were a bedden allotted to the visible assemblies of horrible and grislie bugs. This part of the Island containeth nine caues. And if anie dare be so hardie, as to take one night his lodging in anie of these ins, which hath bene experimented by some rash & harebraine aduenturers, straight these spirits claw him by the backe, and tug him so ruggedlie, and tolle him so crabbedlie, that now and then they make him more franke of his bum than of his tong; a painment correspondent to his intertainment. This place is called S. Patrike his purgatorie of the inhabitants. For when S. Patrike laboured the conuersion of the people of Ulster, by setting before their eyes in great heat of spirit, the creation of the world, the fall of our progenitors, the redemption of man by the blessed and precious blood of our sauour Iesus Christ, the certaintie of death, the immortalitie of the soule, the generall resurrection, our latter doome, the soles of heauen, the paines of hell, how that at length euery man, small and great, yong and old, rich and poore, king and heafer, potentate and pezzant must either through Gods his gracious mercie be exalted to the one, to stonish in perpetuall felicitie; or through his vnsearchable iustice tumble downe to the other, to be tormented in eternall miserie. These and the like graue and weightie sentences, wherewith he was abundantlie storied, so far sunke into their harts, as they seemed verie flexible in condescending to his behest: so that some proufe of his estrange preaching could haue bene verified. Whereupon, without further delaie, they spake to the prelat in this wise.

Sir, as we like of your preaching, so we dislike not of our libertie. You tell vs of manie gubawes and estrange dreames. You would haue vs to abandon infidelitie, to cage vp our libertie, to bydle our pleasure: for which you promise vs for our toile and labour a place to vs as vnknowne, so as yet vncreteine. Your sermon to vs of a dungeon appointed for offenders and miscredents. In deed if we could find that to be true, we would the sooner be weaned from the sweet napple of our libertie, and frame our selues pliant to the will of that God, that you reueale vnto vs. S. Patrike considering, that these seallie soules were (as all dulcarnanes for the more part are) more to be terrified from infidelitie through the paines of hell, than allured to christianitie by the soles of heauen, most hartlie besought God, so it stood with his gracious pleasure, for the honour and glorie of his diuine name, to giue out some euident or glimring token of the matter they importunallie required. Finally by the especiall direction of God, he found in the north edge of Ulster a desolate corner hemmed in round, and in the middle thereof a pit, where he reared a church, called Reglis or Reglasse. At the east end of the churchyard a doze leadeth into a closet of stone like a long ouen, which they call S. Patrike his purgatorie, for that the people resort thither euen at this daie for penance, and haue reported at their returne estrange visions of paine and blisse appearing vnto them.

The author of Polydronicon writeth that in the reigne of king Stephan, a knight named Owen pigrimaged to this purgatorie, being so appalled at the strange visions that there he saw, as that upon his returne from thence he was whole mortified, and sequestering himselfe from the world, he spent the remnant of his life in an abbey of Lenzis. Also Dyonysius a charterhouse monke recordeth a vision scene in that place by one Agneius, or Agneius, whereof who so is inquisitiue, may resort to his treatise written De quatuor nouis Simis. Iohannes Camertes holdeth opinion, which he surmiseth vpon the gesse of other, that Claudius writeth of this purgatorie. Which if it be true, the place must haue bene extant before saint Patrike, but not so famondlie knowne. The poet his verses are these following:

Est locus, extremum pandit qua Gallia litus, Oceani pratentis aquis, quo fertur Rhodis Sanguine libato populum mouisse silentium, Flebilis auditur questus, simulachra coloni Pallida, defunctisque vident migrare figuras.

Wherein Vlysses pilgrim strange

take hie to continue therein foure & twentie houres, which doing other while with ghostlie meditations, and other while a deca for the conscience of their doers, they saie they see a plaine resemblance of their owne faults and vertues, with the hozor and comfort therein belonging, the one so terrible, the other so solous, that they verelie deeme themselves for the time to haue sight of hell and heauen. The reuelations of men that went thither (S. Patrike yet liuing) are kept written within the abbete there adioining. When anie person is disposed to enter (for the doze is euer spard) he repairerth first for deuote to the archbishop, who casteth all pericles, and dissuadeth the pilgrime from the attempt, because it is knowne that diuerse entering into that caue, neuer were seene to turne backe againe. But if the partie be fullie resolu'd, he recomendeth him to the prior, who in like maner sauourable exhorteth him to chuse some other kind of penance, and not to hazard such a danger. If notwithstanding he find the partie fullie bent, he conducteth him to the church, inioyneth him to begin with praier and fast of sixtene daies, so long together as in discretion can be indured. This time expired, if yet he perseuere in his former purpose, the whole conuent accompanieth him with solemn procession & benediction to the mouth of the caue, where they let him in, and so bar vp the doze untill the next morning. And then with like ceremonies they await his returne and reduce him to the church. If he be seene no more, they fast and praie sixtene daies after. Touching the credit of these matters, I see no cause, but a christian being perswaded that there is both hell and heauen, may without banitie vpon sufficient information be resolu'd, that it might please God, at sometime, for considerations to his wisdom knowne, to reueale by miracle the vision of soies and paines eternall. But that altogether in such sort, and by such manner, and so ordinarilie, and to such persons, as the common fame doth vtter; I neither beleue nor wish to be regarded. I haue conferrd with diuerse that had gone this pilgrimage, who affirmed the order of the premisses to be true, but that they saw no sight, saue onelie fearefull dreames when they chanced to nod, and those they said were exceeding horrible. Further they added, that the fast is rated more or lesse, according to the qualitie of the penitent.

Cambrensis affirmeth, that in the north of Mounster there be two Ilands, the greater and the lesse. In the greater there neuer entereth woman or anie liuing female, but forthwith it dieth. This hath bene often proued by bitches and cats, which were brought thither to trie this conclusion, and presentlie they died. In this Iland the cocke or male birds are seene to chirpe, and perch by and do wone the twigs, but the hen or female by instinct of nature abandoneth it, as a place vterlie poisoned. This Iland were a place alone for one that were vexed with a threewife. The lesse Iland is called Insula viuentium, because none died there, ne maie die by course of nature, as Giraldus Cambrensis saith. Howbeit the dwellers when they are soze trust with schinelle, or so farre withered with age as there is no hope of life, they request to be conueied by boate to the greater Iland, where they are no sooner inchoed, than they yeld by their ghosts. For my part, I haue bene verie inquisitiue of this Iland, but I could neuer find this strange properrie fasted by anie man of credit in the whole countrie. Neither trulie would I wish anie to be so light, as to lend his credit to anie such feined gloses, as are neither berefed by experience, nor warranted by anie colourable reason. Therefore I see not why it should be termed Insula viuentium, unless it be that none dieth there, as long as he liueth.

Cambrensis telleth further, that there is a churchyard in Ulster, which no female kind maie enter. If the cocke be there, the hen dareth not follow. There is also in the west part of Connaght an Iland, placed in the sea, called Aron, to which saint Brendan had often recourse. The dead bodies need not in that Iland to be grauelled. For the aire is so pure, that the contagion of anie carrion maie not infect it. There, as Cambrensis saith, maie the sonne see his father, his grandfather, his great grandfather, &c. This Iland is enemie to mice. For none is brought thither, but either it leapeth into the sea, or else being staied it dieth presentlie. There was in Kildare an ancient monument named the Firehouse, wherein Cambrensis saith, was there continuall fire kept day and night, and yet the ashes neuer increased. I travelled of set purpose to the towne of Kildare to see this place, where I did see such a monument like a vault, which to this daie they call the Firehouse.

Touching the heath of Kildare Cambrensis writeth that it maie not be tild: and of a certaintie with in this few yeares it was tried, and found, that the cozne which was sowed did not proue. In this plaine (saith Cambrensis) stood the stones that now stand in Salisburie plaine, which were conueied from thence by the sleight of Merlin the Welsh prophet, at the request of Aurelius Ambrosius king of the Britons. There is also in the countie of Kildare a goodlie field called Mollaghamast, betwene the Moxrough and Killa. Diuers blind prophetes run of this place, that there shall be a bloudie field fought there, betwene the English inhabitants of Ireland and the Irish, and so bloudie forthwith it shall be, that a mill in a vale hard by it shall run foure and twentie houres with the streame of blood that shall poize downe from the hill. The Irish doubtlesse repose a great affiance in this balducktum dreame. In the top of this height stand mores or rundels verie formalie fashioned, where the strength of the English armie (as they say) shall be incamped.

The Earle of Suffer being lord lieutenant of Ireland, was accustomed to wish, that if anie such prophesie were to be fulfilled, it should happen in his gouernement, to the end he might be generall of the field. Not farre from Mollaghamast, within a mile of Castledermot, or Mithledermot, is there a place marked with two hillocks, which is named the Geraldine his thotow cast. The length of which in berie deed is wonderfull. The occasion proceeded of this. One of the Geraldins, who was ancestor to those that now are lords of Lackath, predeed an enemie of his. The earle of Kildare hauing intelligence thereof, suppressing affection of kinned, and moued by zeale of iustice, pursued him with a great troope of horsemen, as the other was bringing of the prede homeward. The Geraldine hauing notice giuen him, that the earle was in hot pursate, and therefore being warned by the messenger to hie him with all speed possible: the gentleman being nettled, that his kinsman would seeme to rescue the prede of his deadlie fo; and as he was in such fretting wise fring in his greafe, he brake out in these cholerike words: And doth my confine Kildare pursue me in deede? Now in god saith, whereas he seemeth to be a suppresser of his kindred, and an vpholder of my mortall enemie, I would wish him no more harme, than that this dart were as far in his bodie, as it shall sticke forthwith in the ground: and therewithall giuing the spurres to his horse, he hurled his dart so farre, as he abashed with the length thereof aswell his companie as his posteritie.

The Geraldine was not verie farre from thence, when the earle with his hand made hot foot after, and dogging still the tracke of the pcedours, he came to the place where the dart was hurled, where one pickthanke or other let the earle to understand of the Geraldine his wild speeches there deliuered. And to inhanse the heinousnesse of the offense, he shewed how farre he hurled his dart, when he wished it to be pitched in his lordship his bodie. The earle assented at the length thereof, said: Now in good sooth, my cousin in behauing himselfe so couragiously, is worthy to haue the pcedo that free. And for my part I purpose not so much to stomach his cholerike will, as to im-brace his valiant prowesse. And therewithall commanded the retreat to be blowne and reculed backe.

There is in Meethan hill called the hill of Caragh, wherein is a plaine twelue foor long, which was named the Kempe his hall: there the countrie had their meetings and folkemotes, as a place that was accounted the high palace of the monarch. The Irish hystorians hammer manie fables in this forge of Fin-mac Colle and his champions, as the French hysto-rie dole of king Arthur and the knights of the round table. But doubtlesse the place seemeth to beare the shew of an ancient and famous monument.

There is in Castlenocke a village not far from Dublin, a window not glazed nor latized, but open, and let the weather be stormie, the wind bluster bosterouslie on euerie side of the house; yet place a candle there, and it will burne as quietlie as if no pufse of wind blew. This maie be tried at this date, who so shall be willing to put it in practise. Touching the strange wells that be in Ireland, I purpose to speake little more than that which I find in Cambrensis, whose words I will English, as they are Latined in his booke. There is (saith he) a well in Dounster, with the water of which if anie be washed, he becometh forthwith hoare. I haue seene a man that had one halfe of his beard, being died with that water hoare; the other halfe unwashed was browne, remaining still in his naturall colour. Contrariwise, there is a founteine in the further edge of Ulster, and if one be bathed therewith, he shall not become hoare: in which well such as loath greie beares are accustomed to diue.
There is in Connaght a well that springeth on the top of an hill farre and distant from any sea, ebbing and flowing in foure and twentie houres, as the sea doth; and yet the place is vplandish, and the water fresh. There is another spring in the same countrie; the water of which is verie wholesome to men and doo-mer, but poison to beastes: and if a man put but the grauell of this well into his mouth, it quencheth presentlie his thirst.

There is in Ulster a standing pole thirtie thousand pases long, and fiftene thousand pases brode, out of which springeth the noble northerne riuier, called the Banne. The fishers complaine more often for bursting of their nets with the oter great lake of fish, than for anie want. In our time vpon the conquest a fish swam from this pole to the shore, in shape resembling a salmon, but in quantitie so huge, that it could not be drawne or caried whole together, but the fishmongers were forced to hacke it in gobs-bets, and so to carrie it in pecemeale throughout the countrie, making thereof a generall dole. And if the report be true, the beginning of this pole was strange. There were in old time where the pole now standeth, vicious and beastlie inhabitants. At which time was there an old said saie in euerie man his mouth, that as soone as a well there springing (which for the superstitious reuerence they bare it, was con-tinuallie covered and signed) were left open and unsigned, so soone would so much water gush out of that well, as would forthwith ouerwhelme the whole ter-ritorie. It happened at length, that an old trot came thither to fetch water, and hearing his child whine, the ran with might and maine to dandle his bable, forgetting the obseruance of the superstitious order tofore vsed. But as she was returning backe to haue conuered the spring, the land was so farre ouerflowed, as that it past his helpe: and shortly after she, his suckling, & all those that were within the whole ter-ritorie were drowned. And this seemeth to carie more likelihood with it, because the fishers in a cleare sunnie date see the sheeles and other piles plainlie and distinctlie in the water. And here would be noted, that the riuier of the Banne flowed from this head spring before this flood, but farre in lesse quantitie than it doth in our time. Hitherto Giraldus Cambrensis.

Boetius telleth a rare propertie of a pole in Ireland, & for that he maketh himselfe an euidence of the matter, he shall tell his owne tale. Ac quoniam Hibernie incidit mentio, prater infinita in ea rerum miracula, haud importunum fore existimem, si vnum, quod ob porten-tuosam nouitatem fidem omnium excedere videtur, nos ta-men verum experti sumus, adiunxerimus. Lacus in caest, circa quem amplissimo circumquaque spatio nec herba nec arbor vlla nascitur, &c. in quem si lignum infusas anni circi-ter vnius curriculo, id quod in terra fixum erit, in lapidem conuertetur; quod deinceps aqua operietur, in ferrum: reli-quum aqua exstans ligni formam naturamque seruabit. Ita coniuncta, lapis, ferrum & lignum eodem in stipite inaudita novitate conspiciuntur. But for that mention is made of Ireland, ouer and aboue the infinite number of wonders in that land, it will not be whole before the purpose, to insert one maruellous thing, which although it may seeme to some to haue no colour of truth: yet because it hath bene by vs experimented, and found out to be true, we maie the better aduouch it. There is a standing pole in that land, nere which of all sides groweth neither herbe, shrub, nor bush. If you sticke a rod or peece of timber in this pole, that which sticketh in the earth within the space of one yeare turneth to a stone; as much as is dipt in the water, is conuerted to iron; all that is aboue the water remaineth still in the pristinat and former woodden shape. So that you may see that which is strange, in one stocke or sticke, stone, iron and wood likt and knit together. Thus much Hector Boetius.

In the countrie of Bilkennie and in the borders thereto confining, they vsed a Glemme trial by a water they call Melathie. The propertie of this water is, as they say, that if a persured person drinke thereof, the water will gush out at his bellie, as though the drinker his nauill were bored with an auger. The riuier that runneth by Dublin named the Liffie hath this propertie for certeine, and I haue obserued it at sundry times. As long as it reigne, yea if it stood potwizing by dates, you shall find diuerse swallow bwokes; and the riuier will be nothing thereby increased: but within foure and twentie houres after the thowes are ceast, you shall perceiue such a sudden spring flow, as if the former raine were great; a berie few places or none at all will be found pasable. Cambrensis writeth, that in the south part of Dounster, betwene the maine sea coasting on this paine and saint Brendan his hills, there is an I-land of the vne side incompassed with a riuier abundantlie stozed with fish, & on the other part inclosed with a little bwoke. In which place saint Brendan was verie much resiant. This plot is taken to be such a sanctuare for beastes: as if anie hare, fox, stag, or other wild beast be chased nere that land by dogs, it maketh straight vpon the bwoke, and as soone as it passeth the streame, it is so cocksure, as the hunter may perceiue the beast resting on the one bankie, & the dogs queuing on the other bankie, being as it were by some invisible railles imbard from dipping their feet in the shallow ford, to pursue the

the beast chased. On the other side of this land there runneth a river stozed about measure with fresh water fish, and in especiallie with salmon. Which abundance, as Cambrensis writeth, proceeded of God, to mainteine the great hospitalitie that was kept there. And because the dwellers thereabout shall not like pinching collicles make any sale of the fish, let it be powdered as artificialie as may be, yet it will not keepe (as though it were manna) above the first night or date that it be taken. So that you must eate it within that short compass, otherwise it putrifieth and standeth to no sted.

The Salmon
leape.

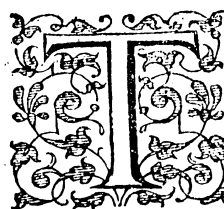

This river overfloweth a great rocke, vsuallie called the Salmon leape: for as it is commonlie the propertie of all fish to swim against the tide, as for birds to flitter against the wind; so it is naturallie giuen to the salmon to struggle against the streame, and when it approacheth nere this high rocke, it bendeth his taile to his head, and sometime taketh it in his mouth; and therewithall beareth it selfe ouer the water, and suddenlie it fetcheth such a round whiske, that at a trice it skipeth to the top of the rocke. The like salmon leape is nere Leislip, but not so high as this. There be also, as witnesseth Cambrensis, in the further part of Ulster, certeine hills nere to saint Bean his church, where cranes yearelie breed. And when they haue laied their eggs, if any purpose to ransacke their nests, let him but attempt to touch the eggs, they will shew like yong scrawling pullets without feather or downe, as though they were new hatched, and presentlie brought out of their shells. But if the partie plucke his hand from the nest, forth with they shew (whether it be by any metamorphosis, or some sugling legier de maine by dazeling the eyes) as though they were transformed into eggs. And further, saith Cambrensis, let two at one instance be at the nest, and let the one of them onelie giue the gaze, and the other attempt to take awaie the eggs, they will seeme to the looker on as eggs, and to the taker as yong red little cranets, being as bare as a bird his arse.

Armagh.

The towne of Armagh is said to be enemie to rats, and if any be brought thither, presentlie it dieth. Which the inhabitants impute to the praiers of saint Patrike. But to omit the strange places, that either by false reports are furnished, or by proofe and experience baile berefted: there are in this land such notable quarries of greie marble and touch, such store of pearle and other rich stones, such abundance of cole, such plentie of lead, iron, latin and tin, so manie rich mines furnished with all kind of metals, as nature seemed to haue framed this countrie for the Roiehouse or iewelhouse of hir chiefeest thesaure. Howbeit the hath not shewed hir selfe so bountifull a mother in powring forth such riches, as she proueth hir selfe an enuious stepdame; in that she inslitteth in the inhabitants a drouse lihernesse to withdraue them from the insearching of hir houndred and hidden iewels. Wherein the fareth like one, that to purchase the name of a sumptuous frankelen or a good blander, would bid diuerse ghests to a coslie and deintie dinner, and withall for sauing of his meat with some secret enchantment would benum them of their sirs, or with some hidden lothsomnesse would dull their stomachs, as his ghests by reason of the one are not able, or for the other not willing, by taking their repast to refresh themselves, in so much as in my phantasie it is hard to decide whether estate is the better: either for a diligent labourer to be planted in a barren or stonie soile, or for a lustily loiterer to be settled in a fertill ground; because the one will, and may not; the other may and will not though his painefull trauell reape the fruit and commoditie that the earth yeldeth.

Of the lords spirituall of Ireland, their names and dignities.

The fift chapter.

The spirituall iurisdiction is ordered into foure prouinces, whereof the primasie was euer giuen (in reuerence of saint Patrike that conuerted the countrie) to the archbishoppe of Armagh, who is called Primas totius Hibernie, and the archbishop of Dublin, Primas Hibernie. This custome was since confirmed by Eugenius the thirde, 1148, or 1152: who sent withall three other pallies of archbishops to be placed, one at Dublin, one at Cashill, & the last at Twene. To these are suffragans in right nine and twentie, and they all to the Primas of Armagh, vnder whose prouince are the bishops of Meeth and Deren, Ardach, Bilmore, Clogher, Doune, Coner, Clonknos, Kaba, Dromore. Under Dublin, whereunto Innocentius the thirde vniued Clonelagh, the bishop of Cephine, Kildare, Fernes, Doffe and Leighlin. Under Cashill, the bishop of Waterford, to whom Lismore is vniued, Corke and Clone, Kosse, Ardigh, Limerike, Enniscille, Killaloe, and Ardfert. Under Twene, Bilmore, Dfline, Anaghdoune, Clonsfert, Moxro. In this recount some difference hapneth by reason of personall and reall vniou of the sees, and for other alterations. I haue obserued in perusing of old booke the names of certeine bishops and archbishops of Dublin: and albeit I could not find a iust register or catalog of them, yet I toke it to be better to place such as I could find, than to omit the whole. Cormachus was one of the first bishops that I haue read of, but I am well assured, that there were diuerse others before his time. He flourished about the yeare 893, of this bishop Hector Boetius maketh mention. Dunanus was bishop of Dublin long after Cormachus: for Dunanus died in the yeare 1074. He was buried in Chriss church in Dublin, in the upper part of the chancell on the right hand.

Patricius was consecrated bishop of Dublin in Paule his church at London by the archbishop of Canturburie Lanfrancus or Lanfrancus. The reason of this consecration was, for that as yet the metropolitans of Ireland receiued not their pall. A pall is an indowment appropriated to archbishops, made of white like the breadth of a stole, but it is of another fashion. And where you shall espie the armes of any archbishop blazed, there you may perceiue the pall set out in white, with a great mante blacke crosses vpon it. An archbishop within three moneths after his consecration or confirmation ought to demand his pall, otherwise he may be removed; neither ought he to name himselfe archbishop before the receipt, neither may he before summon or call a council, make chrysme, dedicate churches, giue orders, or consecrate bishops. He may not weare his pall with out the church, neither in other prouinces; albeit in another prouince he may be in his pontificalibus, so that pontificalia differeth from the pall. Furthermore, an archbishop may not lend his pall vnto another, but it ought to be interred with him. But to returne to Patricius, his time was but short, for some after as he was crossing the seas to Dublin ward, he was drowned with his fellow passengers the same pere that he was consecrated, the ninth of October.

Donatus, of some called Bungus, succeeded Patricius, and likewise consecrated by Lanfrancus archbishop of Canturburie, at the instance of Dermacutus king of Ireland, the bishops of Ireland, the clergie and the citizens of Dublin: he deceased

S. Laurentius Othohille. This prelat was first abbat of S. Benins in Glindelagh, and after he was solemnlie consecrated and installed in Chriss church at Dublin by Gelactus the pimat of Armagh, and not by Canturburie, as the bishops of Dublin were before the pall given them. He died in Normandie, and was buried in our ladie church of Angie in the yere one thousand one hundred and foure score, the fourteenth of November.

Johan Cummin an Englishman succeded Laurence. This famous prelat being cloistered by in the abbete of Cusham in Worcester shire was highly renowned of all men, as well for his deepe learning, as for the integritie of his life. The clergie of Dublin being given to understand of so worthie a clerke, became humble petitioners to the king his maiestie Henrie the second, that through his means such an unvaluable treasure should be installed in Laurence his dignitie. The king bowing to their earnest sute agreed he should be consecrated their archbishop; which was an happie houre for that countrie. For besides the great trauell he endured in conveying his flocke in Chrissian religion, he was founder of S. Patrike his church in Dublin, as is before specified. He decessed in the yere one thousand two hundred and twelve, and was intombed in the quere of Chriss church.

Henrie Londres succeded Cummin. This man was nicknamed Scorchbill, or Scorchbillein thorough this occasion. Being settled in his see, he gaue commandement to all his tenants to make their appearance before him at a date appointed: and for that he was raw as yet in his revenues, he toke it to stand best with their ease and quietnes, and his commoditie, that ech of them should shew their evidences, whereby he might learne, by what tenure they held of him. His tenants mistrusting no fluttish dealing, but construing all to be meant for the best, delivered their evidences to their landlord, who did scantlie well peruse them when he siong them all in the fire. The poore tenants espiong this subtil pranke to be verie unfitting for a bishop, could not bide their tongs, but brake out on a sudden: Thou an archbishop? Haie, thou art a scorchbillein. But it could not be gessed to what end this fact of his tended; for notwithstanding this, the tenants inioied their lands, vnlesse he did it because they should be tenants at will, and so to stand to his deuotion. This prelat doubtlesse was politike, and well lettered, and for his wisdom and learning he was elected lord iustice of Ireland. He was the founder of the castell of Dublin, as is before mentioned. He decessed in the yere one thousand two hundred twentie & five, and lieth buried in Chriss church. Wherby appeareth that Mathaeus Parisiensis did ouerthot himselfe, in writing one Hu or Hugo to be archbishop of Dublin in the yere one thousand two hundred and thirtie, whereas Londres at that time was in the see, as from his consecration to his death may be gathered, being the space of thirtie yeres.

Johan Stamford succeded Londres, but not immediatlie, and was consecrated in the yere one thousand two hundred foure score and five. This man, vpon the death of Stephan Fulborne archbishop of Lunc, was made lord iustice of Ireland in the yere one thousand two hundred foure score and seauen. And sone after being in England he was sent from Edward the first as ambassador to the French king, and vpon his returne he decessed in England, & sone after was buried in saint Patrike his church at Dublin.

Willielmo Hothom is placed by some antiquaries to be archbishop of Dublin much about this time, but whether the man haue bene installed in this see at all or no, I am not able to affirme, nor to denie: but certeine it is that the date is mistaken, for vpon Johan Stamford his death, Richard Flerings was consecrated archbishop of Dublin, betwene whome and the lord Edmund Butler there arose a great controuersie in law, touching the manner of Hothwood with the appurtenances. Which man; the lord Butler recovered by an arbitrement or composition taken betwene them in the king his bench at Dublin. This prelat departed this life in the yere one thousand thre hundred and six.

Richard de Hauerings was successor vnto Flerings, who after that he had continued welnere the space of five yeres in the see, was soze appalled by reason of an estrange and wonderfull dreame. For on a certeine night he imagined that he had seene an vglie monster standing on his breast, who to his thinking was more weightie than the whole world, in so much as being as he thought in maner squiled or prest to death with the heft of this huge monster, he would haue departed with the whole substance of the world, if he were thereof possessed, to be disburdened of so heauie a load. Vpon which wish he suddenly awoke. And as he beat his braines in diuining what this dreame should import, he bethought himselfe of the flocke committed to his charge, how that he gathered their sinces pearelie, by receiuing the revenues and perquisits of the bishoplike, and yet suffered his flocke to starue for lacke of preaching and teaching. Wherefore being for his former slacknesse soze wounded in conscience, he trauelled with all speed to Rome, where he resigned by his bishoplike, a burthen too heauie for his wraike shoulders, and being vpon his resignation competentlie benefited, he bestowed the remanant of his life vpon deuotion.

1311.

Johan Lech nephew to Hauerings, vpon the resignation was consecrated archbishop. This prelat was at contention with the pimat of Armagh, for their iurisdiccions: insomuch as he did imbarre the pimat from hauing his crosse bozne before him within the prouince of Leinster, which was contrary to the canon law, that admitteth the crosse to beare the crosse before his archbishop in an other prouince. This man decessed in the yere one thousand thre hundred and thirtie.

Alexander Bigenor was next Lech consecrated archbishop with the whole consent as well of the chapter of Chriss church as of S. Patrike. Howbeit vpon the death of Lech there arose a schisme & division betwene Walter Thorneburie lord chancellor of Ireland and Bigenor; then tresuroz of the same countrie. The cancellor to further his election determined to haue posted to Rome, but in the wafe he was drowned with the number of 156 passengers. Bigenor staing in Ireland, with lesse aduenture and better speed, with the consent of both the chapters was elected archbishop. And in the yere 1317 there came bulls from Rome to confirme the former election. At which time the archbishop and the earle of Ulster were in England. This prelat sone after returned lord iustice of Ireland, and sone after he had landed at Daghill, he went to Dublin, where as well for his spirituall iurisdiction, as his temporall promotion he was receiued with procession and great solemnitie.

John de saint Paule was consecrated archbishop upon Bigenor his death. He deceased in the yeare one thousand three hundred sixtie and two. Thomas Annot succeeded John, and died in the yeare one thousand three hundred seuentie & six. Robert Wikeford succeeded Thomas, and died in the yeare one thousand three hundred and nintie. Robert Maldebie succeeded Wikeford, this prelat was first an Augustine frier, and a great preacher, and accounted a vertuous and sincere liuer. He deceased in the yeare one thousand three hundred nintie and seauen. Richard Porthalis was remooued from an other see and chosen archbishop of Dublin, who likewise deceased the same yeare he was elected. Thomas Craulic an Englishman succeeded him the same yeare, and came into Ireland in the companie of the duke of Surreie. This archbishop was chosen lord iustice of Ireland in the yeare one thousand foure hundred and thirtene. In whose gouernement the English

During which time the archbishop being lord iustice, went in procession with the whole clergie in Trisfelbermot, or Castle dermot, a towne adioining to Kilkia, praiering for the prosperous successe of the subjects that went to skirmish with the enimie. This prelat was of stature tall, well featured, and of a sanguine complexion, decking his outward comeliness with inward qualities. For he was so liberall to the rich, so charitable to the poore, so deepe a clerke, so profound a doctor, so found a preacher, so vertuous a liuer, and so great a builder, as he was not without good cause accounted the phenix of his time. In dailie talke as he was thort, so he was sweet. Hard in promising, bountifull in performing. In the yeare one thousand foure hundred and seuentene, he sailed into England, and ended his life at Faringdon, and was buried in New college at Oxford. In the yeare one thousand foure hundred thirtie & nine, there hath bene one Richard archbishop of Dublin, and lord iustice of Ireland, before whome a parlement was holden at Dublin, in the eighteenth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first. In the yeare one thousand foure hundred and sixtie, Walter was archbishop of Dublin, & deputie to Jasper duke of Bedford, lieutenant of Ireland.

The bishops of Kildare.

I found in an ancient register the names of certeine bishops of Kildare, that were in that see since the time of saint Brigids; the names of whome I thought here to insert. Lonie was bishop in saint Brigids time, which was about the yeare of our Lord foure hundred fortie and eight; the rest doe here follow:

2 Anoz.	14 Robert.
3 Conste.	15 Bonifacius.
4 Donatus.	16 Padogge.
5 Danid.	17 William.
6 Pagnus.	18 Calstride.

There hath bene a worthie prelat, canon in the cathedrall church of Kildare, named Maurice Iake, who among the rest of his charitable deeds, builded the bridge of Kilkollen, and the next yeare following he builded in like maner the bridge of Leighlin, to the great and dailie commoditie of all such as are occasioned to trauell in those quarters.

The sixt chapter.

10 Gerald Fitzgerald, earle of Kildare. This house was of the nobilitie of Florence, came from thence into Normandie, and so with the ancient earle Strangbow his kinsman, whose armes he geth, into Wales, nere of blood to Rice ap Griffun, prince of Wales by Desfa the mother of Maurice Fitzgerald & Robert Fitzstephans, with the said earle Maurice Fitzgerald removed into Ireland, in the yeare one thousand one hundred sixtie and nine. The familie is verie properlie toucht in a sonnet of Surreties, made upon the earle of Kildares sister, now countesse of Lincolne. From Tuscan came my ladies worthie race, Faire Florence was sometime hir ancient seat:
The western Ile whose pleasant shore doth face Wild Cambers clifles, did giue hir liuelie heat, Postred she was with milke of Irish brest, 30 Hir fire an earle, hir dame of princes blood, From tender yeares in Britaine she dooth rest With kings child, where she tastes costlie food.
Hunsdon did first present hir to mine eie, Bright is hir hew, and Geraldine she hight, Hampton me taught to with hir first for mine:
And Windsor, alas, dooth chase me from hir sight; Hir beautie of kind, hir vertues from above, Happie is he, that can obtaine hir loue.

The corrupt orthographie that diuerse vse in writing this name, doth incorporat it to houses there to linked in no kinred, and consequentlie blemisheth diuerse worthie exploits atchued as well in England and Ireland, as in forren countries and dominions. Some write Gerold, sundrie Gerald, diuerse verie corruptlie Gerrot, others Gerard. But the true orthographie is Girald, as maie appeare both by Giraldus Cambrensis, and the Italian authors that make mention of the familie. As for Gerrot it differeth flat from Girald: yet there be some in Ireland, that name and write themselves Gerrots, notwithstanding they be Giraldins, whereof diuerse gentlemen are in Ireth. But there is a sept of the Gerrots in Ireland, and they seme forsooth by threatening kindnesse and kindred of the true Giraldins, to fetch their petit degrées from their ancestors, but they are so nere of blood one to the other, that two bushels of beanes would scantlie count their degrées. An other reason why diuerse estrange houses haue bene shuffled in among this familie, was, for that sundrie gentlemen at the christening of their children, would haue them named Giralds, and yet their surnames were of other houses, and if after it happened that Girald had issue Thomas, John, Robert, or such like, then would they beare the surname of Girald, as Thomas Fitzgiralb: and thus taking the name of their ancestors for their surname, within two or three descents they shoue themselves among the kindred of the Giraldins. This is a generall fault in Ireland and Wales, and a great confusion and extinguishtment of houses.

This noble and ancient familie of the Giraldins, haue in sundrie ages flourishd in the most renowned countries of Europe. Marring Fitzgiralb was one in great credit with king John. I find an other Giraldine raldine Archiepiscopus Bredegalenſis, who flourished in king Henrie the third his time. There was an other Giralbine patriarch of Jerusalem, in the yere one thousand two hundred twentie and nine, as witnesſeth Mattheus Parisienſis. There was one Giraldo of Werneill an excellent poet in the Italian tong: an other named Baptiſt Giraldo, was a famous citizen of Ferrara, an expert phyſician, and an exquisite philoſopher, being publike profeſſor of philoſophie in the ſaid citie, during the ſpace of ten yeares. I have ſene a worke of one Gregorius Giraldu Ferrarienſis de dijs gentium, dedicated to Hercules duke of Ferrara, a piſſhe booke and verie well penned. Alſo Syluſter Giraldu Cambrenſis hath bene one of this familie, nere of kin to ſir Maurice Fitzgiraldo. This gentleman was bozne in Wales, and thereof he is named Cambrenſis, of the word Cambria, that in old time was adapted to that part of Britannia. He was verie inward with Henrie the ſecond, conqueror of Ireland, being at that time the kings ſecretarie. And for that ſpectall affiance king Henrie repoſed in him, he was appointed to accompanie prince John the kings ſonne into Ireland, as one of his chiefeſt and diſcreteſt counſellores.

This gentleman was verie well learned, a ſol-lerable divine, a commendable philoſopher, not rude in phyſike, ſkilfull in coſmographe, a ſingular good antiquarie, an orator, in induer comparable to the beſt, in his ſtile not in thoſe daies taken for the worſt, rather eſchewing the name of a rude writer, than purchaſing the fame of an eloquent choniſter.
Among other his worke, he wrote one booke of the deſcription of Ireland, other two of the conqueſt thereof. John the abbat of ſaint Albons ſaith, that this clerke was ſomewhat ſpare in words, and liberrall in ſentences. What he meaneth by this verbiſe I know not, unleſſe he taketh the man to be ouerlauſh of his pen in ſcumpling of his aduerſaries with quipping ſawnts, which (as I geſſe) ſlowed rather from a ſtaunting oſtentation of a roſting kind of rhetorike, than from any great malice he bare any one. Howbeit, I maie not gaineſate, but as he was kind where he toke, ſo he was ſomewhat biting where he diſliked. But what his iudgement is of the Giralbins maie plainlie appeare in his chyonicle, out of which I haue culled this praife worſhipſe ſentence inſuing.

*Hoc eſt huius generis omen & hac conditio. Semper in arcontinuallie, ſaith Cambrenſis, a deſtine or fatal propertie: annexed to this houſe. In warre and mar-tiall bozles they are dandaled, they are colled, they are lulled, who but they? They rule the roſt. But when theſe martiall garboiles are appeaſed, they are either through falſe informations wrongfullie behaied, or elſe by enuious carpers ſiniſterlie ſuſpected. Howbeit, enue with all hir malicious diſſes, could neuer wholie ſupplant the fertill groue of this couragious & noble progenie. And maugre the heads of all malicious promoters, this ſept, yea even at this daie beareth, with the few ſlips there ingrafted, no ſmall ſtroke in Ireland. Who are they that ſcale the enimies ſoyt? The Giralbines; Who are they that defend their cuntry: The Giralbines. Who are they that make the enimie quake in his ſkin? The Giralbines. And who are they whome enue backbitteth? The Giralbines. If it had ſtood with the god fortune of the Giralbines, that the king with equall balance would poiſe their valure, long yer this had all Ireland bene put in quiet and peaceable ſtate.

But their ballantneſſe and power hath bene from time to time without ſufficient cauſe ſuſpected. Yt thereto Cambrenſis.

And ſoothlie, as often as I call to mind the ſaſeng of this hiſtoriographer, I may not but muſe how ſompe he hitteth the naille on the head. And who is will conferre their continuall ſucceſſe from the penning of this ſentence (which was written about 400 yeares and upward) with this age of ours, ſhall ſome perceiue, that theſe words were rather propheſies of future miſhap, than complaints of former iniuries.
At this daie let them behaue themſelues ballantlie in warre, and loiallie in peace; yet notwithstanding, ſuch ſlanders are raiſed, ſuch rumors noſſed, ſuch tales bzuted, ſuch fables twittled, ſuch vntrue reports ſwatled, ſuch malicious inuentions ſorged, that ſuch as are in authoritie cannot but of force ſuſpect them, vnleſſe they were able, like gods, to prie in the bot-tome of each mans conſcience. But who ſo wiſeth any godneſſe to that miſerable cuntry, and noble progenie, let him with all the beines of his heart beſeech God, firſt that the higher powers be ſlowe in belueing the deſpitefull reports of enuious backbiters. Secondlie, that the Giralbines beare themſelues in all their affaires ſo dutifullie, that theſe curious inferchers be not able to depaint their ſeined gloſes with any probable colours. So ſhall ſuſpicion be abandoned, ſo ſhall malicious ſlanders be ſquatted, ſo ſhall that noble houſe be truſted, and conſequentlie the battered weale-publike of Ireland reediſed. The familie is Engliſh, and it is well knowne that the Irith rather ſcare their force, than loue their perſons. And reaſon god pardie. If or the Irith bearing in mind, that the G-ralbine being thereto deputed by the prince, hath in all ages conquered their lands, abated their courages, diſcomfited their men, vanquiſhed their armies, daunted their power, ſuppreſſed their force, and made them become true and tributarie ſubiects to the croune of England: they haue god cauſe to beare that ſept but holow hearts, what they ſo euer they make in outward apperance. Thus much generallie of the Giralbines, now I purpoſe particularlie to treat of the houſe of Kilbare.

Maurice Fitzgiraldo, one of the earles progenitors, was lord iuſtice of Ireland in the yere 1242, at which time he builded the caſtell of Sligagh. This Maurice was lord of Wreconille, and being entire-lie ſeized of the whole cuntry, he gaue the one moitie thereof to Cormocke mac Dermot, mac Korie. I read the Giralbine baron of Dphalie, in the yere 1270. I haue ſene it regiſſred, that there died a Giralbine the fourth earle of Kilbare, in the yere 1287. But I take that kalendar to beare a falſe date.
Wherefore the truth & certaintie is, that John Fitzgiraldo, ſonne to Thomas Fitzgiraldo, was the firſt earle of Kilbare, and was created earle vpon this occaſion.

In the yere 1290, and in the eighteenth yere of Edward the firſt, William Meſcie was made lord iuſtice of Ireland. This man being either negligent or rati in the gouernment of the cuntry, emboldned the Irith enimie to indamage the kings ſubiects more eſſionies than they were accuſtomed to do.
Theſe enormities being for the ſpace of ſoure yeares tolerated, the ſubiects miſliking of the ſlackneſſe of lord iustice, as he was glad to the hart root. Some after, as the nobles in open assemble were ryping up by peccinle the seuerall harms their tenants suffered, the lord iustice willing to disburden himselfe of the crime, began with mistie kind of speeches to laie the whole fault on the lord John Fitzgiralde shoulders, saieing in parable wise, that he was a great occasion of these disorders, in that he bare himselfe in priuat quarrels as fierce as a lion, but in these publicke injuries he was as meeke as a lambe. The baron of Dhalie spelling and putting these syllables together, spake in this wise.

These accusations by the lord Fitzgiralde.

The lord Fitzgiralde answer.

My lord, I am hartlie sozie that among all this noble assemble, you make me your onelie marke whereto to shoot your bolt. And trulie were my deserts so heinous as I suppose you would wish them to be, you would not labour to cloud your talke with such darke riddles, as at this present you haue done; but with plaine & flat English, your lordship would not sticke to impeach of felonie or treason. For as mine ancestors with spending of their blood in their souereignes quarell aspired to this type of honour, in which at this date (God and my king be thanked) I stand: so your lordship taking the higher waie to the wood, by charging me with treason, would gladlie trip so roundlie on my top, that by shedding of my blood, and by catching my lands into your clouches, that butt so nere vpon your manors of Kildare and Rathfingian, as I dare saie they are an eie-soze vnto you, you might make my maister your sonne a proper gentleman.

A gentleman? quoth the lord iustice: Thou bald baron, I tell thee the Mesclies were gentlemen before the Giraldines were barons of Dhalie, yea and before that Welsh bankrupt thine ancestour (he meant sir Maurice Fitzgiralde) fettered his nest in Leinster. And whereas thou takest the matter so farre in snuffe, I will teach thee thy lyripups after an other fashyon than to be thus malepertlie cocking and biling with me that am thy gouernour. Wherefore, albeit thy taunts are such as they might force the patientest philosopher that is, to be choikt with choler: yet I would haue thee ponder my speeches, as though I deliuered them in my most sober and quiet mood. I saie to the face of thee, and I will anow what I say vnto thee, that thou art a supporter of theues, a bolsterer of the kings enemies, an upholder of traitors, a murderer of subiects, a firebrand of dissention, a ranke theefe, an arrant traitor: and before I eate these wordes, I will make thee eate a peece of my blade.

The baron bysiding with might and maine his choler, bare himselfe as cold in countenance, as the lord iustice was hot in wordes, and replied in this wise. My lord I am verie glad, that at length you vntorapped your selfe out of that net, wherein all this while you masked. As for mine ancestour, whome you terme a bankrupt, how rich or how poore he was vpon his repairs to Ireland, I purpose not at this time to debate. Yet thus much I may boldlie saie, that he came hither as a bier, not as a begger. He bought the enemies land by spending his blood: but you lurking like a spider in his coptweb to intrap flies, endeuor to beg subiects liuings wrongfullie, by despoiling them of their innocent liues. And whereas you charge me with malepertnes, in that I presume to chop loglike with you being gouernour, by answering your knappish Quid, with a knappish Quo, I wold wish you to vnderstand, now, that you put me in mind of the distinction, that I as a subiect honour your roiall authoritie, but as a noble man I despise your drughill gentilitie. Lastlie, whereas you charge me with the odious termes of traitor, murderer, and the like, and there withall you wish me to resolue my selfe, that you rest vpon reason, not vpon rage: if these wordes proceed from your lordship, as from a magistrate, I am a subiect, to be tried by order of law, and am sozie that the gouernour, who ought by vertue of his publicke authoritie to be my iudge, is by reason of priuat malice become mine accuser.

But if you utter these speeches as a priuat person, then I John Fitzgiralde, baron of Dhalie, doe tell thee William Mesclie, a single sole gentleman, that I am no traitor, no felon; and that thou art the onelie buttresse, by which the kings enemies are supported, the meane and instrument by which his maiesties subiects are daillie spoiled. Wherefore I as a loiall subiect saie traitor to thy teeth, and that shalt thou well vnderstand when we both shall be brought to the reherfall of these matters before our betters. Howbeit, during the time you beate office, I am resolved to giue you the mastrie in wordes, and to suffer you like a bzalling cur to barkie, but when I see my time I will be sure to bite.

These biting speeches passing to and fro, great factions on both sides were raised, with high and mightie wordes, and deepe othes; till time either part appeased his owne. The baron of Dhalie not sleeping nor slacking his matter, quadded with all hast into England, where he was no soner inshored, than Mesclie, after he had substituted William Haie in his roome, was imbarked, making as hot foot after the baron as he could. The king and his counsell vnderstanding the occasion of their sudden arrivals, to the end the truth should be brought to light, appointed a set date for the deciding of their controuersie, and that each of them should speake for himselfe what he could. Wherevpon Mesclie being commanded to begin, spake to this effect.

The lord Fitzgiralde raide poiteth into England.

Mesclie followeth.

My dread souereigne, as I must acknowledge my selfe somewhat agreed, to be intangled in so intricate a matter, so I am as glad as hart can thinke that so weightie a controuersie is brought to the deciding of so vpright an vmpire. And whereas it stood with your maiesties pleasure, with the aduise of this your honourable counsell, that I, as vniworthie, should haue the gouernment of your realme of Ireland; and during my time, your maiesties subiects, haue bene, I may not denie it, diuerslie annoied, for my discharge, as I saie in Ireland: so I anow here in England, that he knealeth here before your highnesse (pointing to the baron of Dhalie) that is the root and crop of all these enozmities. For it is well knowne, that he beareth that stroke with the Irish, as if he once but froone at them, they dare not be so hardie as once to peake out of their cabbins. And whereas his force doth greatlie amaze them, thinke you but his countenance doth wonderfullie incourage them: To the furtherance of which, it is apparantlie knowne, and it shall be proued, that he hath not onelie in hucker mucker, by sundrie messages imboldened your maiesties enemies, to spoile your subiects, but also by his personall pzenence, in secret meetings, he gaue them such courage, as neither the roialtie of your highnesse, nor the authoritie of your deputie, neither the force of your lawes, nor the strength of your puissant armie, was able to quench the flame of these hurlic burlies, that through his traitorous drifts were inkindled. These and the like enozmities through his priate packing with rebels being daillie committed, to bying me your maiesties gouernour in the hatred of the people, his adherents both secretlie muttered, and openlie exclaimed against me and my gouernment, as though the rebusse of all these harmes had wholie lien in mine hands.

Mesclie's oration.

1290 Mesclie lord iustice.

The description of Ireland.

"bett I took it to be expedient, to point with my finger to the verie sinke or headspring of all the treasons, that by secret conspiracies were pretended and practised against your maiestie and your subiects, yet notwithstanding hauing more regard to modestie, than to the defects of the baron of Dphalie, I did but glasse at his packing in such secret sort, as none or a verie few of the companie could gesse, whome with my mistie speeches I did touch. And as commonlie the gald horse doth sonest kicke, so this gentleman being prickt, as it should seme with the sting of his guiltie conscience, brake out on a sudden, and forgetting his allegiance to your highnesse, and his dutie to me your deputie, he took me vp so roughlie, as though I had bene rather his underling than his gouernour. The summe of which despitefull speeches I refer to the testimonie of the honorable audience where they were deliuered. As for his manifold treasons, I am ashamed to rehearse such things as he did not sticke to commit. And if it shall stand with your maiesties pleasure, to adiourne the triall for a few daies, I will charge him with such apparent crimes, as were his face made of brasse, he shall not be able to denie anie one article that shall be looked against him. When Mescie had ended, the baron of Dphalie prest himselfe somewhat forward, and in this wise spake.

rators oration.

"Most puissant prince and my dread souereigne, were master Mescie his mouth so fast a measure, as what he spake, should be holden for gospel, this had bene no fit place for so arrant a traitor, as he with his feigned glossing would gladlie proue me to be. But sith it pleased your maiestie, with so indifferent balance to ponder both our tales, I am thoroughlie perswaded, that my loiall innocencie shall be able, to ouerpoise his forged treacherie. Your maiestie hath heard manie words to small purpose. And as his complaint hitherto hath bene generallie huddled vp, so mine answer thereto may not particularlie be framed. Whereas therefore he termeth me a supporter of theues, a packer with rebels, a conspirator with traitors, if I should but with a bare word denie the premisses, all his gale glose of glittering speeches would suddenlie fade awaie. Yea, but he craueth respit for the booking of his articles. Trulie so he hath need. For loitering and lingring is the onlie waie he may deuise to cloke his feigning and forging. Wherein he sheweth himselfe as craftie, as the philosopher was accounted wise that promised a tyrant vpon menacing wordes, to schoule his asse in philosophie, so he had seven yeares respit; because that in that space he was perswaded, that either the tyrant, the asse, or he would die. In likewise master Mescie, vpon respit granted him, would hang in hope, that either the life of your maiestie (which God forbid) should be shortned; or that I, in tract of time, would be dissatoured; or that he by one subtill pzanke or other should be of this heauie load disburdened.

"But if I haue bene as manie yeares a malefactor as he aduoucheth, how happeneth it, that his tongue was tied before this late dissention begun? Whie did he not from time to time aduertise the counsell of my treasons? Whereas now it may be probable confectured, that he was egd to this seruice rather for the hatred he beareth me, than for anie loue he oweth your rotall maiestie. Touching the words I spake in Ireland, I purpose not, for ought I heard as yet, to eat them in England. And when I shall be cald to testifie such speeches as I deliuered there, I will not be found so raw in my matter, as to lose my errant in the carriage, as master Mescie hath done, or to crane further respit for the registering of his manifold treasons. As for my secret meetings with Irish rebels, where I perswaded master Mescie, that you were able to proue them, I would be found willing to acknowledge them. For if my conscience were so deepelie stong, as you pretend, I would take it for better policie, by acknowledging my trespasses, to appeale to my king his mercie, than by denieng my faults, to stand to the rigor of his iustice.

"And as for meetings, I had neuer so manie in woods with rebels, as you master Mescie, haue had in your chamber with colwes. For it hath bene manifestlie apparented, that when the baron of Dphalie, and the best of the nobilitie of Ireland haue bene imbarde from entering your chamber, an Irish colw should haue at all times accesse vnto you. No, master Mescie: a colw, an horse, an haube, and a siluer cup haue bene the occasion of your slacknesse. When the subiects were presided, you would be content to winke at their miserie, so that your mouth were stoppt with barbarie. And when you had gathered your crums sufficientlie togither, you held it for a pretie policie (and yet it was but a bare thift) to charge the nobilitie with such packing, as you dailie did practise. But you must not thinke that we are babes, or that with anie such stale deuise, or grosse sugling trickes, you may so easilie duske or dazell our eyes. Can anie man that is but slenderlie witte, so far be caried, as to beleue, that master Mescie, being the kings deputie in Ireland, hauing his maiesties treasure, hauing the nobilitie at his becke, the kings armie at his commandement; but that, if he were disposed to besturre himselfe, he were able to ferret out such harchbrech brats as swarme in the English pale? If he said he could not, we must smile at his simplicitie; if he could and would not, how may he colour his dissolaltie?

"Yea, but I beare such stroke with the Irish, as that vpon anie priuat quarrell I am able to annoie them. What then? Because the baron of Dphalie can reuenge his priuat iniuries without the assistance of the deputie; therefore the deputie may not banquish weake and naked rebels without the furtherance of the baron of Dphalie: whereas the contrary ought to be inferd, that if a priuat person can tame the Irish, what may then the publike magistrat doe, that hath the princes paie? But in deed it is hard to take hares with fores. You must not thinke, master Mescie, that you were sent gouernour into Ireland to dandle your frills, to pen your selfe vp within a towne or citie to glue rebels the gaze, to pill the subiects, to animat traitors, to fill your coffers, to make your selfe by marrying true men, to gather the birds whilst other beat the bushes, and after to impeach the nobilitie of such treasons, as you onelie haue committed.

"But for so much as our mutuall complaints stand vpon the one his yea, and the other his naie, and that you would be taken for a champion, & I am knowne to be no coward: let vs, in Gods name, leaue lieng for barlets, berding for ruffians, facing for crackers, chatting for swatlers, scolding for callets, boking for scriueners, pleading for laywers, and let vs trie with the dint of sword, as become martiall men to doe our mutuall quarels. Wherefore to iustifie that I am a true subiect, and that thou Mescie art an arch traitor to God & to my king, here in the presence of his highnesse, and in the hearing of this honorable assemble, I challenge the combat. Whereat all the auditorie shouted.

"Now in god faith, quoth Mescie, with a right god will. Whereupon both the parties being dismiss vntill the kings pleasure were further knowne, it was agreed at length by the counsell, that the fittest triall should haue bene by battell. Wherefore the parties being as well thereof aduertised, as the date by the king appointed, no small prouision was made for the eager

The baron returned to Ireland with the gratulation of all his friends, and was created earle of Kildare, in the ninth yeare of Edward the second his reigne, the fourteenth of Hiate. He deceased at Loughbire (a village nere to Mainoth) in the yeare 1316, and was buried at Kildare, so that he was earle but one yeare. The house of Kildare among diuerse gifts, wherewith God hath abundantlie indued it, is for one singular point greatlie to be admired, that notwithstanding the seuerall assaults of diuerse enemies in sundrie ages, yet this earle that now lieth is the tenth earle of Kildare, to whome from John the first earle, there hath alwaies continued a lineall descent from father to son: which trueth in mine opinion is a great blessing of God. And for as much as this earle now liuing as his ancestors before him, haue bene shrewdly shoued at by his euill willers, saieing that he is able, but not willing to profit his countrie: the posie that is framed for him, signifieng his mind, runneth in this wise:

Quid posim, iactant: quid vellem, sine recusant:

Sir Thomas Butler earle of Desmond and Deserie. The Butlers were ancient English gentlemen, and worthy seruitors in all ages. Theobald Butler lord of Carricke and John Cogan were lord iustices of Ireland. This Butler died in the castle of Arkelow, in the yeare 1285. His lord Theobald Butler the younger, and son to the elder Theobald, was sent for by Edward the first, to serue against the Scots. This noble man deceased at Turue, and his bodie was conueighed to Weneie, a towne in the countie of Limerike. Sir Edmund Butler a wise and valiant noble man was dubbed knight at London by Edward the second.

This man being appointed lieutenant of Ireland, upon the repaire of John Mogan (who before was lord iustice) to England, besieged the Obyenies in Glindalozie: and were it not that they submitted themselves to the king and the lieutenants mercie, they had not bene onelic for a season vanquished, but also utterly by him extirped. This noble man was in his gouernement such an encourager and furtherer of seruitors, as that he dubb on saint Michael the archangels daie thirtie knights in the castle of Dublin. He was a scourge vnto the Scots that invaded Ireland, when he was lieutenant. He discomfited Omourgh a notorious rebell, neare a towne named Balie leshan. After diuerse victorious exploits by him atchieued, he sailed into England, and so to Hispanie in pilgrimage to saint James. Upon his returne to England, he deceased at London, and his bodie being conueied into Ireland was intombed at Balligauran.

James Butler earle of Desmond was lord iustice of Ireland, in the yeare 1359. The lord Butler and vicount Charles was dubb knight by Henrie the first in England, in the yeare 1425, at which time sir James Butler, sir John Butler, sir Rafe Butler, were in like manner knighted. James Butler, who married the earle of Herefords daughter, was preferred to the earldome of Desmond in the first yeare of Edward the third, which fell vpon the heirs generall, lastlie vpon sir Thomas Butler earle of Wiltshire, after whome it reuered to Pierce Butler, whome a little before king Henrie the eight had created erle of Ossioie. I read Butler earle of Tipperarie in the yeare 1300. The Latine historie calleth him Dominum de pincerna, the English le Butler. Whereby it appeareth, he had some such honour about the prince. His verie name is Wecket, who was aduanced by Henrie the seconds eldest sonne, lord Butler, in recompense of the death of Thomas of Canturberie their kinsman. His eldest sonne is the lord Butler and vicount Charles. For the earle now liuing these two verses (in the remembrance of him) are made:

Magnus animi, maiorq; patris, sed natus utroq;

Corporis aut animi non bonitate minor.

Gerald fitz Gerald earle of Desmond. Maurice Desmond.

fitz Thomas a Geraldine, was created earle of Desmond the same yeare, soone after that Butler became earle of Desmond. His eldest sonne is lord fitz Gerald of Desmond. The erle now liuing, thus speaketh:

Eussitandem, iactatus fluctibus alii,

Et precor in portu sit mea tuta ratis.

Sir Richard Bourke earle of Glenrickard, a branch of the English familie de Burgo. The Bourkes haue bene ancient noble men before their comming to Ireland: and in old time they haue bene earles of Ulster. His eldest sonne is lord Bourke baron of Enikelline. His verse is this:

Quam mihi maiorum fama bona gesta dederunt, Hanc mihi natorum barbara facta negant.

Connogher Obzen earle of Lomond: the name of earle ginen to Murragh Obzen for feareme of life, and after to Donogh Obzen, in the first yeare of the reigne of Edward the first, now confirmed to the heirs males, his eldest sonne is baron of Zbracca. Upon the erle now liuing this fantasie was deuised:

Non decet externos, sine causa, quare reges,

Cum licet in tuta viuere pace domi.

Mac Cartie Poze earle of Clencare, created in the yeare 1565. Vicount Barrie. Vicount Roch. Poze. son Vicount of Wozmanslowne: wherinto is lately annexed the baronie of Latone, &c. One of their ancestors sir Robert Presson, then chiefe baron of the exchequer, was dubbed knight in the field, by Lionell duke of Clarence. This gentleman married in wedlocke with Margaret Birmingham ladie of Carbyie, who deceased in the yeare 1361. After whose death sir Robert Presson was seized of the said lordship in the right of his wife, and being molested by rebels, placed a garison in the castle, whereby the subjects were greatlie eased, and the rebels greatlie annoied.

There hath bene another sir Robert Presson of this house, great grandfather to the vicount now liuing. This gentleman was deputie to Richard, second son to Edward the fourth, in the first yeare of the reigne of his father: and after likewise in the reigne of Henrie the seventh, he was deputie to Jasper duke of Bedford, erle of Penbrooke, & lieutenant of Ireland: and at the same time was he appointed by the king generall receiver of his reuenue in Ireland. How wiselie this noble man behaued himselfe in peace, and how valiantlie he requit himselfe in warre, sundrie of king Henrie the seventh his letters to him being deputie, addrested, do manifestlie witnesse. There was a parlement holden before him at Drogheda, which was repealed in the tenth yeare of Henrie the seventh. Sir Christopher Presson was dubbed knight in the field by Edmund earle of March, lord deputie of Ireland. William Presson was lord iustice of Ireland in Henrie the eight his reigne. The house is ancient, planted in Lancashire.

and from thence departed into Ireland, being to this date seized of a manour in Lancashire, named of the house Preston. The vicount now living speaketh in this wise, as it were present in person, and saith:

Si quantum vellem, tantum me posse putarem, Nota esset patrie mens mea firma mea.

Baltinglasse.

Cusface alias Potwar, vicount of Baltinglasse, lord of Kilkullen to him and his heires males, the foure and thirtieth yeare of Henrie the eight. The ancestor Robert de Potwar was sent into Ireland with commission, and his ofspring hath ressed there since the yeare 1175. Potwar alias Cusface is written baron of Downe in the yeare 1317. The vicounts poeie now living is this that followeth:

Cum bonus ipse manes, an non laus magna putatur, Prudenter cuius posse placere viro?

Mountgaret.

Sir Richard Butler vicount Mountgaret to him and his heires males in the first yeare of Edward the first. Vicount Dece. Lord Bermingham baron of Athenrie, now degenerate and become mere Irish, against whom his ancestors served valiantlie in the yeare 1300. John Bermingham was lord of Athenrie Anno 1316. John Bermingham baron of Ardigh, called in Latine de alio Dei, in the yeare 1318. Mac Maurice, alias Fitzgerald, baron of Kerrie. L. Courcie, not verie Irish; the ancient descent of the Courcies planted in Ireland with the conquest. Fleming baron of Slane. Simon Fleming was baron of Slane, 1370. The L. now living thus speaketh:

Slanius inuictus princeps mihi nomen adaptat, In bello clarum nomen & omen habens.

Blunket.

Blunket baron of Killine, his familie came in with the Danes, whereof they haue as yet speciall monuments. Sir Christopher Blunket lord of Killine, was lord lieutenant of Ireland, which title is to be seene at this day in Killine, grauen on his tombe. The baron that now liueth, thus frameth his poeie:

Cruent viuentem maiorum gesta meorum, Talia me nequeunt vana cadente mori.

Deluin.

Rugent baron of Deluin, an ancient house. Sir Gilbert de Rogent, or Rugent, came into Ireland, with sir Hugh de Lacie, one of the first and valiant conquerors of the countrie. This Gilbert matched with Rosa de Lacie, sister to Hugh de Lacie. He had giuen him upon the conquest the baronies of foure, and of Deluine by the said sir Hugh, of whose brother Richard de Capella, the house of Deluin is descended. In a conuenance past from sir Gilbert to his brother Richard, these words are inserted: Dedi & concessi fratri meo Richardo de Capella totum conquestum meum in Hibernia, & terram quam dedit mihi dominus meus Hugo de Laci, qui vocatur Deluin, & totam terram meam in Anglia. The baron now living & louing his countrie thus speaketh:

In patria natus, patrie prodesse laboro, Viribus in castris, consilijs domi.

Howth.

S. Laurence, baron of Howth, signifieng the disposition of his mind, he speaketh in this wise:

*Si redamas, re labos, si spernis, sperno. Quid ergo?
Non licet absq. tui viuere posse bonis?*

Dunfanie.

Blunket baron of Dunfanie. Upon the baron now living, this deuise was framed as you see:

Gratia quod dederat, si non fortuna negabit, Dux tam preclaro stemmate dignus eris.

Trimlestowne.

Barnetwall baron of Trimlestowne. They came from litle Brittain, where they are at this day a great surname. Upon their first arriuall, they wan great possessions at Weirhaue, where at length by conspiacie of the Irish they were all slaine, except one young man, who then studied the common lawes in England, who returning, dwelt at Drunnagh besides Dublin, where his heires to this date are settled. This house as well for antiquitie, as for the number of worshipfull gentlemen that be of the surname, beareth no small stroke in the English pale of Ireland: howbeit of late it hath bene greatlie maimed thozough the decease of three worshipthe and famous Barnetwalls. The first was Robert Barnetwall L. of Trimlestowne that last was, a rare noble man, and indued with sundrie good gifts, who hauing wholie wedded himselfe to the reformation of his miserable countrie, was resolved for the whetting of his wit, which nathelasse was pregnant and quicke, by a short trade and method he toke in his studie, to haue sipp up the verie sap of the common law, and upon this determination sailing into England, sickened shortly after at a worshipfull marrones house at Cornuberie, named Margaret Tiler, where he was to the great græse of all his countrie pearled with death, when the weale publike had most need of his life. The second Barnetwall that deceased was M. Marcus Barnetwall of Donbroa, whose credit and authority had it bene correspondent to his valure and abilitie, he would (I doubt not) haue bene accounted and knowne for as od a gentleman (none disparied) as ante in the English pale of Ireland.

The third of the surname that departed this life, was sir Christopher Barnetwall knight, the lanterne and light as well of his house, as of that part of Ireland where he dwelt: who being sufficientlie furnished as well with the knowlege of the Latine tong, as of the common lawes of England, was zealouslie bent to the reformation of his countrie. A depe and a wise gentleman, spare of speech, and therewithall pitie, wholie addicted to grauitie, being in anie pleasant conceipt rather giuen to snimper than smile, verie vpright in dealing, measuring all his affaires with the safetie of conscience, as true as Steele, close and secret, fast to his friend, stout in a good quarell, a great householder, sparing without pinching, spending without wasting, of nature mild, rather choosng to please, where he might harme, than willing to harme where he might pleasure. He sickened the thre and twentieth of Iulie of an hot burning ague, and ended his life at his house of Caruie the first of August, to the great losse as well of his friends as of his countrie, upon whose death a sonne in law of his framed this epitaph consisting of sixtene verses.

*Leta tibi, sed mesta tuis mors accidit ista, Regna dat alta tibi, damna dat ampla tuis.
Letus es in caelis vltro sine fine triumphans, Mæstus at in terris diues inopsque in cet.
Nam sapiente caret diues, qui parva gubernet, Nec, qui det misero munera, pauper habet.
Te gener ipse caret, vidua, te rustica turba, Atque urbana cohors, te (ocer alma) caret.
Non est digna viro talis re publica tanto, Nam sanctus sedes non nisi sancta decet.
Mira loquor, sed vera loquor, non ficta reuoluo, Si maiora loquar, nil nisi vera loquar.
Mortuus es? Nobis hoc crimina nostra dederunt.
Mortuus es? Virtus hoc tibi sacra dedit.
Viuus es in caelo, dedit hoc tibi gratia Christi, Viuus ut in mundo sis, tibi fama dabit.*

For the lord of Trimlestowne now living, describing a name of fame after death, this was deuised.

Quod mihi vita dedit, fratri Mors sua negauit, Quod dederat fratri, det mihi fama precor.

Edward Butler baron of Donboin, giuen to Edmund Butler esquier, and his heires males, in the thre and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight. For the baron now living, these verses are made.

Dum sequitur natus summi vestigia patris, Filius optato tramite cuncta geret.

Sir Barnabie Fitzpatricke baron of Upper Osserie, giuen to Barnabie Mac Cullopatrike and his heires males, in the thre and thirtieth yeare of Henrie the eight. Donat Clonnagh apachgula strikes strike was a pærelesse warriour in the peare 1219.

Sir Barnabie Fitzpatrick, now lord of vpper M serie, was knighted by the duke of Massfolke at the siege of Leith in Scotland: in the begining of Q.
Elizabeths reigne, for whom these verses are made:

Principis in gremio summi nutritus & altus, Hæsit ab illustri regia dona schola.

Plunket, baron of Louth, to sir Christopher Plunket and his heires males, in the 33 yeare of H. Henrie the eight. This baronie was an erldome pertaining to the Berminghams, in the yeare 1316, & soner. For the baron now liuing, this was deuised:

Nobilis, ingenuus, firmis quoque firmus amicis, Nubila seu celum luxue serena regat.

Onelle, baron of Dungauon, to whom the earle dome of Eron was intailed by gift of king Henrie the eight. Potwar, baron of Curraghmore. Mac Sartan, lord Desert, his ancestozs were lords in the time of Lionell duke of Clarence, earle of Ulster, in the yeare 1360: now verie wild Irish. Purragh Obzene, baron of Aniskohne, to him and his heires males, in the five and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight. There are besides these noble men, certeine gentlemen of worship, commonlie called baronets, whom the ruder sort doth register among the nobilitie, by terming them corruptlie barons; whereas in verie deed they are to be named neither barons, nor baronets, but banretts. He is properlie called a banret, whose father was no carpet knight, but dubbed in the field under the banner or ensigne. And because it is not vsuall for ante to be a knight by birth, the eldest sonne of such a knight with his heires, is named a bannerret, or a banret.
Such are they that here insue. Scutleger, ban-ret of Flemarge, makere Irish. Den, banret of Bozmannstowne, waring Irish. Fitzgiralde, ban-ret of Burnedchurch. Welleste, banret of Pozragh, Yusefe, banret of Galtrim. Saint Wige-bell, banret of Scrine. And Pangle, banret of the Panan. English gentlemen of longest continuance in Ireland are those, which at this day either in great pouertie or perill doe keepe their properties of their ancestozs lands in Ulster, being then companions to Courcie, the conqueror and earle of that part. These are the Saurages, Jordans, Fitz Hol-mons, Chamberleins, Russels, Bensons, Andleies, Whites, Fitz Arslutes, now degenerat and called in Irish Mac Phahon, the Beares sonne.

Andronicus, whome Marianus Scotus termeth Barbofus, because of his long beard, a learned man, greatlie in old time renowned in Ireland.
But for as much as in his age the countrie was not flored with such as imployed their labors in gathering together the sayings and doings of sage persons, the discontinuance of his same is rather to be imputed to the ignorance of the time, than to the want of his deserts. He flouri-

James Archer a student of diuinitie. Argobastus, the second bishop of Argentine, successor to the ho-lie prelat saint Amand, bozne in Ireland, a learned and deuout clerke: who leaving his countrie and liuing in heremit wise, in certeine solitarie places of France, instructed the people of that realme in the feare of God, and the knowlege of the scriptures.

In his preaching he was noted to haue so singlar a grace, and so prosperous successe, that such as were by anie worlddie misadventure afflicted, vpon the hearing of his godlie sermons would subcentlie be comforted. The French king Dagobertus, aduertised of his learning and vertue, caused him to be sent for, vsing him as his chiefe counsellor in all his weightie affaires; and after aduanced him to be bishop of Argentine: he wrote a booke of homilies.
He decessed in the yeare 658: & was buried hard by a gibbet nere the citie, pitcht on the top of an hill called saint Michaels hill, which was done by his owne appointment, in that he would follow the exemple of his maister Christ, who did vouchsafe to suffer without the citie of Ierusalem, where offendozs and malefactozs were executed. Barnwall.
Barnwall a preacher. Brendan an abbat bozne in Con-nagh, in his youth trained vp vnder Marcus a bishop: and being further kept in yeares, he trauelled into England, where he became a profess monke, yeare 510: she wrote a booke of hir reuelations.

Browne, sometime scholer to maister Peter White; he translated Maturinus Corderius his booke of phases into English, in the yeare 1562. James Caddell, he wrote Diuersa epigrammata. Carberie a profound ciuillan. Celsus archbishop of Armagh, bozne in Ireland, and schooled in the vniuersitie of Orford, he flourished in the yeare 1128: he wrote these bookes following. Testamentum ad ecclesias lib. 1. Constitutiones quædam lib. 1. Ad Mala-chiam epistolæ complures. Clære, bozne in Kilkenn-ie, and proceeded maister of art in Orford. John Clære, bozne in Leinster, being profess a greie frier, he bestowed his time in preaching, chieslie in the towne of Kilkennie. This man was a good antiquarie, as appeared by a chronicle he wrote, beginning at the natiuitie of Christ, and stretching to the yeare 1350: in which yeare he flourished. He wrote these bookes following. Annallium dronicon lib. 1.
De regibus Anglorum lib. 1. De custodijs provin-ciarum lib. 1. De Franciscanorum cœnobijs & eorum distinctionibus lib. 1.

Henrie Cogie doctor of diuinitie, proceeded in the vniuersitie of Dublin, in the yeare 1320. Colme, a learned and an holie monke, he flourished in the yeare 670: he wrote a booke intituled Pro focijs Quartadecimanis. Columbanus, bozne in Ulster, and trained in learning and knowledge as well in England as in France, for his learning and ver-tue, was elected to be abbat. Having trauelled di-uerse countries, at length he repaired to Italie, and there in an abbey by him founded, called Mo-nasterium Bobiense, he ended his life the twentieth of November. He left to his posteritie these bookes:

named Boetius, by reason that he was taken in his time for an exquisite antiquarie, as may appeare by the Scottish historian Hector Boetius, by whom he acknowledged himselfe to be greatly furthered. He flourished in the yeare 1230: and wrote Multarum rerum Chronicon. lib. 1. Richard Creagh borne in Limerike, a diuine, he wrote Epistolae complures. Responsiones ad casus conscientiae. De vitis sanctorum Hiberniae. Topographiam Hiberniae, with diuerse other bookes.

Henrie Crumpe borne in Ireland, and brought up in the vniuersitie of Oxford, where he grew by reason of his profound knowledge in diuinitie to no small credit. Having repaired to his native countrie, minding there to bestirre the talent wherewith God had indued him, he was suddenly apprehended by Simon bishop of Metch, and kept in durelle, by reason that he was suspected to be of no sound religion. He flourished in the yeare one thousand three hundred ninetie and two, and wrote these bookes: Determinationes scholasticarum lib. 1. Contra religiosos mendicantes lib. 1. Responsiones ad obiecta lib. 1. Edmund Curren archdeacon of old Lagglin, there hath bene an Irish bishop of the name. Patrike Cusacke a gentleman borne, and a scholar of Oxford, sometime scholemaster in Dublin, and one that with the learning that God did impart him, gaue great light to his countrie; he imployed his studies rather in the instructing of scholars, than in penning of bookes, he flourished in the yeare one thousand five hundred three score and six, and wrote in Latine Diuersa epigrammata.

Dalie scholed in the vniuersitie of Paris, having a pretie insight in scholasticall diuinitie, he made Diuersas conciones. Sir Willielme Darcie knight, a wise gentleman, he wrote a booke intituled, The decate of Ireland. Dauid Delahide, an exquisite and a profound clerke, sometime fellow of Mertton college in Oxford, verie well scene in the Latine and Greeke tongues, expert in the mathematics, a proper antiquarie, and an exact diuine, whereby I gather that his pen hath not bene lazie, but is daily breeding of such learned bookes as shall be available to his posteritie. I haue scene a proper oration of his in the praise of master Westwood being Christmasse lord in Mertton college intituled, De ligno & feno, also Schemata rhetorica in tabulam contracta. Deuror, there are two brethren of the name learned, the elder was sometimes scholemaster in Wexford.

Peter Dillon a diuine, and John Dillon likewise a student in diuinitie. Doudall, sometime prelat of Armagh, a graue, a learned, and a politike prelat, verie zealouslie affected to the reformation of his countrie, he made Diuersas conciones. Dozmer a lawyer, borne in Kosse, scholar of Oxford, he wrote in ballat roiall, The decate of Kosse. Iohannes Duns Scotus an Irishman borne, as in the forefront of this treatise I haue declared. Iohannis Iohannes Maior a Scottish chronicler would faine proue him to be a Scot. Leland on the other side saith he was borne in England. So that there shall as great contention rise of him, as in old time there rose of Homers countrie. For the Colophonians said that Homer was borne in their cite; the Cyrians claimed him to be theirs, the Salaminians adouced that he was their countryman: but the Smirniens were so fittellie bent in prouing him to be borne in their territorie, as they would at no hand take no naie in the matter, & therupon they did consecrate a church to the name of Homer. But what countryman soeuer this Scotus were, he was doubtlesse a subtil and profound clerke. The onelie fault wherewith he was disliked, was a little spice of vaine glorie, being giuen to carpe and taunt his predecessors diuines, rather for blemishing the fame of his aduersaries than for aduancing the truth of the controuersies. Whereupon great factions are growen in the scholes betwene the Thomists and Scotists; Thomas being the ring leader of the one sect, and Scotus the belweadder of the other. He was fellow of Mertton college in Oxford, and from thence he was sent for to Paris to be a professor of diuinitie. Finallie, he repaired unto 10 Cullen, where in an abbey of greie friers (of which profession he was one) he ended his life. The bookes he wrote are these: Commentarij Oxonienses lib. 4. Reportationes Parisienses lib. 4. Quodlibeta scholastica lib. 1. In Analytica posteriora lib. 2. In metaphysicam quaestiones lib. 12. De cognitione Dei lib. 1. De perfectione statuum lib. 1. Sermones de tempore lib. 1. Sermones de Sanctis lib. 1. Collationes Parisienses lib. 1. Lectura in Genesim lib. 1. De rerum principio lib. 1. Commentarij in euangelia lib. 4. In epistolas Pauli lib. plures. Quaestiones vniuersalium lib. 1. Quaestiones predicamentorum lib. 1. In Aristotelis physica lib. 8. In categorias Aristotelis lib. 1. Tetragrammata quaedam lib. 1. Commentariorum imperfectorum lib. 1.

Cusacke a doctor of diuinitie, a verie good scholemaster, he flourished in the yeare one thousand five hundred thirtie and six. Oliver or Oliver Cusacke a student of the ciuill and canon law, a good humanician, and a proper philosopher. Nicholas Cusacke a gentleman borne, surpassing birth by learning, and learning by vertue. Paucice Cusacke a student of diuinitie, one that notwithstanding he were borne to a faire living, yet did wholie sequester himselfe from the world.

Fagan a batchelor of art in Oxford, and a scholemaster in Waterford. Daniell Ferralle, a diuine and a scholemaster. Fergusius son to Fergus baron king of Ireland, the first king of Scots, whome some affirme to be borne in Denmarke, the more part suppose him to haue bene an Irish man. He flourished in the yeare of the world three thousand six hundred seuentie and eight, and before the incarnation two hundred ninetie and two, in the five and twentieth yeare of his reigne. He was by misadventure drowned nere a rocke in the north of Ireland that of him is called to this daie Carregfergus; vpon whose mishap these verses were made:

Icarus Icareis ut nomina fecerat undis, Fergusius petra sic dedit apta sua.

50 This Fergusius wrote a booke intituled, Leges politicae lib. 1. Finnanus scholar to one Pennius and Segenius, taken for a deepe diuine in his age; he flourished in the yeare six hundred firtie and one; he wrote Pro veteri paschatis ritu lib. 1. Field a physician, Thomas Field a master of art. John Fitzgiralde, commonlie named John Fitzedmund, a verie well lettered ciuillian, a wise gentleman, and a good householdier.

60 Robert Fitzgiralde alias Robert Fitzmaurice borne in the countie of Kildare. Dauid Fitzgiralde, usuallie called Dauid Duffe, borne in Kerie, a ciuillian, a maker in Irish, not ignorant of musike, skilfull in physike, a good & generall craftsman much like to Hippias, surpassing all men in the multitude of crafts, who comming on a time to Pisa to the great triumph called Olympicum, wore nothing but such as was of his owne making; his shoes, his pattens, his cloke, his cote, the ring that he did weare, with a signet therein verie perfectlie wrought, were all made by him. He played excellentlie on all kind of instruments, and song thereto his owne verses, which no man could amend. In all parts of logicke, rhetorike, and philosophie he vanquished all men, and was vanquished of none.

Richard Fitzcrafe, primat of Armagh, scholar in the vniuersitie of Oxford to Baconthorpe a good philosopher, & no ignorant diuine: an enimie to friers, namelie such as went begging from doore to doore, whereby he purchased the hatred of all religious persons. He was by Edward the third his means made archdeacon of Lichfield, after created primat of Armagh, being cited before pope Clement the first, for reprimond the begging friers. In the heat of the said contention he deceased in Italie, whose bones were caried into Ireland, and buried at Dondalke, where he was boine. He wrote these bookes insuing: De paupertate seruatoris lib. 7. Contra fratres mendicantes lib. 16. In extravagantem Ioannis 23 lib. 1. Determinationes ad eundem lib. 1. Contra suum archidiaconum lib. 1. Propositiones ad papam lib. 1. Contra fratrum appellationem lib. 1. Sermones ad crucem Pauli lib. 1. Sermones coram pontifice lib. 1. De statu vniuersalis ecclesie lib. 1. Lectura sententiarum lib. 4. Quastiones earundem lib. 1. Lectura theologica lib. 1. Sermones ad clerum lib. 1. Sermones de sanctis lib. 1. Marie laudes Auenioni lib. 1. Illustrationes euangeliorum lib. 4. De passione dominica lib. 1. De peccato ignorantie lib. 1. De iure spirituali lib. 1. De vascijs Iudeorum lib. 1. Propositionum suarum lib. 1. Epistolarum ad diuersos lib. 1. Dialogorum plurimum librum vnum.

Walter Fitzsimons, archbishop of Dublin, lord iustice and lord chancellor of Ireland at one time, a famous clerke, and eruditelie learned both in philosophy and diuinitie: being in companie with king Henrie the seuenth, and hearing an oration that was made in his praise, the king demerited him, what fault he found most in the oration: Trulie (quoth he) if it like your highnesse, no fault, sauing onelie that the orator flattered your maiestie ouermuch. Now in good faith, our father of Dublin (quoth the king) we minded to find the same fault our selues. Thomas Fitzsimons, a verie proper diuine: he wrote in English a treatise of the church. Leonard Fitzsimons, a deepe and pithie clerke, well scene in the Greeke and Latine tong, sometime fellow of Trinitie college in Oxford, perfect in the mathematicals, and a painefull student in diuinitie: he hath a brother that was trained vp in learning in Cambridge now beneficed in Trim. Michael Fitzsimons, scholemaster in Dublin, a proper student, and a diligent man in his profession, he wrote Orationem in aduentum comitis Essexie Dublinum, Epitaphion in mortem Iacobi Stanihursti, Diuersa epigrammata.

Philip Plattisburie, a worthe gentleman, and a diligent antiquarie, he wrote in the Latine tong, at the request of the right honourable Girald Fitzgiralde erle of Kildare, Diuersas chronicas: he flourished in the yeare one thousand five hundred and seauenteene, & deceased at his towne named Johnstowne nere the spaas. Thomas Fleming: there is a Fleming now liuing, of whome I heare great report to be an absolute diuine, and a professor thereof. Foillanus a learned monke, he travelled into France, where thorough the liberalitie of an holie virgine, named Gertrude, he founded an abbete called Monasterium Fossense, where at length he suffered martyrdom. Fursaus peregrinus, so called, because he was boine in Ireland, and did bestow his yeares as an estranger in France, where he founded an abbete named Cœnobium Latinacense: he wrote certene pamphlets, that by tract of time are perished, he flourished in the yeare six hundred and fiftie, and was buried in his owne monasterie.

Robert Garvie, fellow of Quall college in Oxford, a student of both the lawes, a man well spoken as well in the English as in the Latine. Robert Gogan. Gogan a preacher. William Hardit a doctor of diuinitie, proceeded in the vniuersitie of Dublin, in the yeare one thousand three hundred and twentie. Hic- kite, physicians, the father and his sonne. Hugo de Hibernia, so called, because his surname is not knowne, he was a greie frier, and a great traveller, he flourished in the yeare one thousand three hundred and fiftie, he wrote Limerarium quoddam lib. 1. Oliver Huseie, a professor of the arts in Dowait. Derbie Hurle, a scullian, and a commendable philosopher: he wrote In Aristotelis physica. Robert Joffe, boine in Lilkennie, a good humanician. Kaulphus Kellis a monke, brought vp in the knowledge of the Latine tong in Kildare, in which he profited so well, that for his eloquence and wisdom he was sent to Clement the first, as the speaker or prolocutor of all his order, and also was appointed the generall aduocat or repetic vnder Petrus de Casa, master generall of the order. After he was advanced to be archbishop of Cashill, in which honour he deceased, hauing at vacant houres written In iure canonico lib. 1. Epistolarum familiarium lib. 1. Thomas Kenedie, a ciuiliian.

Kerite, he wrote in Irish Catechismum, Translationem bibliae. Cagher, a nobleman boine, in his time called Mac Murrough, he descended of that Mac Murrough that was sometime king of Leinster, he was a surpassing diuine, and for his learning and vertue was created bishop of Leighlin and abbat of Crag: he flourished in the yeare one thousand five hundred and fiftie, and was an hundred yeares old when he deceased. James King, boine in Dublin, and scholar to P. Patrike Cusacke, vnder whome being commendable trained, he repaired to the vniuersitie of Cambridge, where he deceased before he could attaine to that ripenesse of learning, whereto one of so pregnant a wit was like in time to aspire, he wrote Carmina in laudem Henrici Sidari, Diuersa epigrammata. Letz, a learned and an expert physician. Leurouse a learned diuine, sometime bishop of Kildare, and deane of Saint Patrick in Dublin. Aeneas Loughlen, or Mickleighlen, master of art, and a preacher. Thomas Long doctor of both the lawes, he proceeded at Paris, in the yeare one thousand five hundred seuentie and six in August, he is a proper philosopher, no stranger in scholasticall diuinitie, a pretie Latinist: he wrote De speciebus contra mendacem monachum, In Aristotelis physica, The- ses ex præcipuis iuris vtriusque partibus selectas Carolo Borbonio cardinali consecratas.

Peter Lombard boine in Waterford, scholar to master Peter White, hauing imployed two yeares and a halfe in the studie of philosophie at Louaine, he was chosen when he proceeded master of art, Primus vniuersitatis, by the vni forme consent of the foure principals, which preferment did happen to none in such consenting wise, in manie yeares before: he wrote Carmen heroicum in doctorum Nicholai Quemerfordi. Doobie Macchzagh, a student in diuinitie. Macgrane, a scholemaster in Dublin, he wrote carols and sundrie ballads. Malactias boine in Ulster, his life is exallie written by saint Bernard, in whose abbete he died in the yeare one thousand one hundred fortie and eight, he wrote Constitutorum communium lib. 1. Legum cœlibatus lib. 1. Nouarum traditionum lib. 1. Ad D. Barnardum epist. plures. Malactias, the minozit or greie frier, a student in the vniuersitie of Oxford, where he attended to that knowledge in diuinitie, as he was the onelie man in his time that was appointed to preach before the king and the nobilitie, a sharpe reprimor of vice, a zelous embracer of vertue, enimie to flatterie, friend to simplicitie; he flourished in the yeare D. 3. one one thousand three hundred and ten, he wrote De peccatis & remedijs, lib. 1. Conciones plures, lib. 1.

Mauricius Hybernus, of him Iohannes Cambertus, thus writeth. Annus ab his proximis excelluit, ex ea insula oriundus Mauricius, D. Francisci ordinis professus, in dialecticis, utraque philosophia, metaphysicis, ac sacra theologia plurimum eruditus. Vixit insuper dici potest, quod humanitate, quidam morum sanctimonia praeditus fuerit. Is cum annis plurimis in Patavino gymnasio bonas artes docuisset, cum summa omnium gratia, ob eius singularem eruditionem, ac candidissimos mores, a Iulio secundo pontifice maximo in Tuvanensem archiepiscopum creatus est. Quo cum relicta Italia bellis in ea secutionibus proficisceretur, non multum post, magna studiorum iactura, cum nondum quinquagesimum aetatis suae attigisset annum, mortem obiit. Erant plurima suae doctrinae in manibus monumenta, sed ea ob immaturam eius mortem edere non licuit. Quantum fuerit inter eum, dum viveret, & necessitudine vinculum, testantur sexcentae epistolae, quas plenas charitatis indicis, varijs temporibus ad me dedit. Ex (quanta verae amicitiae vis) post amici obitum, relegens soleo assidue recreari.

There did (saith Iohannes Cambertus) of late yeares one Mauricius bozne in Ireland, excell, a greie fier profect, vertic well scene in logike, expelic grounded in philosophie, both morall & naturall, learned in the metaphysiks, in diuinitie pærelesse. Scantlie mate I tell with how great courtesie & vertue he was indued. When he had professed at Padua the liberall arts manie yeares with no small renowne; he was created by Julius the second, not onelie for his profound knowledge, but also for the sinceritie of his life, archbishop of Tuen. When he was traueking thitherward, being departed fro Italie, by reason of the vppres that were there daily increasing, he ended his life to the great losse of learning, before he was full fiftie yeares old. He had sundrie works in hand, which he could not haue finished by reason of his vntimelie death. How deere and entier friends he and I were one to the other during his life, the letters he addrested me from time to time, to the number of six hundred, thwacht with loue and kindnesse, do manifestlie declare. And by perusing of them after his death (such is the force of friendship) I am greatlie comforted. Thus farre Cambertus. This Mauricius wrote Commentarios super Scotum in praedicabilia, In magistrum sententiarum lib. 4. Mauricius archbishop of Cathill, he flourished in king Johns reigne. Giraldus Cambrensis, vpon his comming into Ireland, and debasing the countrie in the hearing of this prelat, sayeng that albeit the inhabitants were want to fateng that number of their saints, yet they had no martyrs: You saie verie well sir (quoth the archbishop) indeed as rude as this countrie is or hath bene, yet the dwellers had the saints in some reuerence. But now that the gouernement of the countrie is come to your kings hands, we shall (I trust) shortly be stored with martyrs.

Obuge.

John Magran a diuine, he wrote a treatise, De possessione monasteriorum. Monie a ciuillian and a good Latinit. Dellan, sometime fellow of Allsoules college in Orford, a learned physitian. Patrike Magran a diuine. Philip Morris a scholer of Orford and after deane of S. Patriks in Dublin, he flourished in the yeare 1446, and wrote these works, Declamaciones quasdam lib. 1. Lecturas scripturarum lib. 1. Sermones ad populum, lib. 1. Contra mendicitatem validam lib. 1. Augent, baron of Deluin, scholed in the vniuersitie of Cambridge. William Augent a proper gentleman, and of a singular good wit, he wrote in the English tong diuerse sonets.

Dauid Obuge, bozne in the towne of Bildare; for his learned lectures, and subtile disputations openlie published in Orford and Treuers in Germanie, he was taken for the gem and lanterne of his countrie. In his time Giraldus Bononiensis, being maister generall of the Carmelits, was at iar with William A. Idlington, the prouinciall of all the English Carmelites. Wherevpon tenne of the wisest and learnedest Carmelits that then were resident in England, being fullie elected to resist their generall, Obuge was chosen to be the forman of all the said crew. Giraldus Bononiensis vnderstanding that he being an Irishman, was so hot in the controuersie, was egerly bent against Obuge, because he assured himselfe to haue had fauour at his hands, by reason Obuge was bozne in that countrie where the Giraldines his kinsmen were planted, and thereby on he was banished Italie. This forme in procelle of time being appealed, the outcast Carmelite was made the generall gardian of all his fraternitie in Ireland: which countrie by his continuall teaching and preaching was greatlie edified. Duer this he was so politike a counsellor, that the nobilitie and estates in causes of weight, would haue recourse to him as to an oracle. He was in philosophie an Aristotile, in eloquence a Tullie, in diuinitie an Augustine, in the ciuill law a Iustinian, in the canon a Panoimitane, he flourished in the yeare 1320, he deceased at Bildare, leauing these learned works insuing to posteritie. Sermones ad Clerum lib. 1. Epistolae 32 ad diuersos lib. 1. Propositiones disputatas lib. 1. Lectiones Treuerenses lib. 1. Regulae Iuris lib. 1. Contra Giraldum Bononiensem.

Owen Doethoe, a preacher, and a maker in Irish. Thomas Oheirnaie, deane of Cork, a learned diuine, he wrote in Latine Ad Iacobum Stanishurstum epist. plures. Thomas Oheirigh, bishop of Ross, an exquisite diuine, brought vp in Italie. Pander, a man zelouslie addicted to the reformation of his countrie, whereof he wrote a politike booke in Latine, intituled Salus populi. Patricius, who notwithstanding he be no Irishman bozne, yet I may not ouerslip him in the catalog of Irish authors, for as much as his whole works tended to the conuersion and reformation of that countrie: he was surnamed Succetas or Pagonius, an absolute diuine, adorning his deepe knowledge therein with sinceritie of life. Being sent into Ireland by the appointment of Celestinus the first, accompanied with Segetus a priest, he conuerted the Iland from idolatrie and paganism to christianitie. He wrote these bookes following. De antiquitate Aualonica lib. 1. Itinerarium confessionis lib. 1. Odorporicon Hybernica lib. 1. Historia Hybernica ex Ruano lib. 1. De tribus habitaculis lib. 1. De futura electorum vita lib. 1. Abiectoria quaedam 36 lib. 1. Ad Cereticum tyrannum epist. 1. Sermones lib. 1. Ad Aualonicos incolas epist. 1. Ad Hybernicas ecclesias epist. plures. Ad Britannos epist. plures. He deceased, being one hundred, twentie, and two yeares old, in the yeare 458, or as some suppose 491, and lieth buried in an ancient citie, in the north of Ireland, named Downe, according to the old verse, which saith:

*Hi tres in Duno tumulo tumulantur in uno,

Patricius Abbas a learned man, and much giuen to the edifying of his countriemen: he flourished in the yeare 850, and deceased at Glasconburie. Some ascribe the finding of saint Patrikes purgatorie to this abbat, not to Patrike that conuerted the countrie; but that error hath bene before sufficientlie reprobued. This abbat wrote Homilies lib. 1. Ad Hybernos epist. plures. Petrus Homericus, professor of philosophie in Naples, at which time Thomas Aquinas that after became the lanterne of scholemen, both in philosophie and diuinitie, was his scholer; being therefore as highlie renowned as Socrates is for being master to Plato; or Plato is, for having Aristotle to his scholar. This Petrus flourished in the yeare 1230, he wrote Quodlibeta theologica lib. 1. Plunket, baron of Dunlany, scholar in Kington, to Ag. Shaghens, after sent by Sir Christopher Warne wall knight, his frendlie father in law, to the universitie of Orford. Where, how well he profited in knowledge, as such as are of his acquaintance presentlie perceive, so hereafter when his woorkes shall take the aire, that now by reason of bashfull modestie, or modest bashfulness are wrongfullie imprisoned, and in manner stifled in shadowed couches, I doubt not, but by his fame and renowne in learning, shall be answerable to his desert and balure in writing.

Downell, a batchelor of divinitie, sometime chapleine in Jew college in Orford, after returning to his countrie, he was beneficed in Drogheda, from thence flitted to Louaine, where through continuall hearing of lectures and disputations, more than by his privat studie, he purchased a laudable knowledge in divinitie. Whereby he gave manifest shew of the profit that riseth of exercise and conference. Upon this occasion, one of his acquaintance was accustomed to tell him that he had all his divinitie by hearesaie. He deceased at Louaine in the yeare 1573. Nicholas Duemeford, doctor of divinitie, proceeded the thre and twentieth of October, he wrote in English a verie pithie and learned treatise, and therewithall requisitelte pend, intituled; Answers to certaine questions propounded by the citizens of Waterford; Diverse sermons. There lived latelie of the surname a graue prelat in Waterford, and properlie learned.

Kian, there lived two brethren of the surname, both scholars of Orford, the one a good civilian, the other verie well scene in the mathematicals. Richard archdeacon of saint Patriks, chancelor in the universitie of Dublin, proceeded doctor of the canon law, in the yeare one thousand thre hundred and twentie. Robert Kochford bozne in the countrie of Weiseford, a proper divine, an exact philosopher, and a verie good antiquarie. There is another Kochford that is a student of philosophie. Roth, batchelor of law, proceeded in the universitie of Orford. There hath bene another Roth vicar of S. Johns in Kilkennie prestlie learned. Iohannes de sacro bosco, bozne in Holitwood, and thereof surnamed De sacro bosco; he wrote an excellent introduction, De Sphara. Sedgrane, two brethren of the name, both students in divinitie. Shaghens fellow of Balliol college in Orford, after scholemaster in Ireland, a learned and a vertuous man. Sheine, scholar in Orford and Paris; he wrote, De Repub. Elias Sheth bozne in Kilkennie, sometime scholar of Orford, a gentleman of a passing good wit, a pleasant conceited companion, full of mirth without gall; he wrote in English diuerse sonets. Michaell Sheth bozne in Kilkennie, master of art. Skidmoz bozne in Cozke, and gardian of Poghill.

Richard Smith bozne in a towne named Rackmachneie, thre miles distant from Weiseford, surnamed Smith, of his father, who was by occupation a smith, being fouretene yeres of age he stole into Englnd, and repaired to Orford, where in tract of time he proceeded doctor of divinitie, was elected doctor of the chaire, taken in those daies for a perelesse pearle of all the diuines in Orford, as well in scholasticall as in positive divinitie. Upon the death of quene Marie he went to Louaine, where he read openly the apocalypse of saint John, with little admiration and lesse reprehension; he wrote in English against licentious fasting, or the libertie of fasting; The assertion of the sacrament of altar; A defense of the sacrifice of the masse one booke; Of unwritten verities one booke; Retractions one booke. In the Latin tongue he wrote De coelibatu sacerdotum lib. 1. De votis monasticis lib. 1. De iustificatione hominis librum vnum.

Nicholas Stanthurst, he wrote in Latine Dic-tam medicorum lib. 1: he died in the yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and foure. James Stanthurst, late recorder of Dublin, ouer his exact knowledge in the common lawes, he was a good orator, and a proper diuine. He wrote in English, being speaker in the parlements; An oration made in the beginning of a parlement holden at Dublin befoze the right honorable Thomas earle of Sussex, &c: in the third and fourth yeares of Philip and Marie; An oration made in the beginning of the parlement holden at Dublin befoze the right honorable Thomas earle of Sussex, in the second yeare of the reigne of our souereigne ladie quene Elisabeth; An oration made in the beginning of a parlement holden at Dublin befoze the right honorable Sir Henrie Sid-neie knight, &c: in the eleuenth yeare of the reigne of our souereigne ladie quene Elisabeth. He wrote in Latine, Pias orationes. Ad Corcaciensem decanum epistolae plures: he deceased at Dublin the seven and twentieth of December, being one and fiftie yeares old. Upon whose death, I as nature and dutie bound me, haue made this epitaph following:

*Vita brevis, mors sancta fuit (pater optime) visa, Vita timenda malis, mors redamanda bonis.
Vrbs est orba sopho, legum rectore tribunal, Causidicoque cliens, atque parente puer.
Plurima proferrem, sed me prohibere videtur, Pingere vera dolor, fingere falsa pudor.
Non opus est falsis, sed quae sunt vera loquenda, Non mea penna notet, buccina fama sonet.
Hoc scripsisse satis, talem quandoque parentem Est habuisse decus, sed caruisse dolor.
Filius hac dubitans, talem vix comperit vsquam, Nullus in orbe patrem, nullus in orbe parem.
Mortuus ergo pater, poteris bene virum haberi, Vivis enim mundo nomine, mente Deo.*

Walter Stanthurst, sonne to James Stanthurst, he translated into English Innocent de contemptu mundi. There flourished before anie of these a Stanthurst, that was a scholar of Orford, brother to Gennet Stanthurst, a famous and an ancient mactrone of Dublin, she lieth buried in saint Michaels church. Sutton, one of that name, is a verie good maker in English. Pattheu Talbot scholemaster, a student in Cambridge. William Talbot. John Talbot sonne to William, a master of art, he wrote in Latine, Orationem in laudem comitis Essexiae, Diuersa epigrammata. Edmund Tanner a profound diuine, he wrote Lectiones in summam D. Thomae. Tailer batchelor of art, proceeded in the universitie of Orford, he wrote in Latine Epigrammata diuersa.

Thomas Hybernus bozne in Palmerstowne nere the Paas, he proceeded doctor of divinitie in Paris, a deepe clerke and one that read much, as may easilie be gathered by his learned woorkes: he flourished in the yeare 1290, and wrote with diuerse other woorkes, these bookes insuing: Flores bibliae, Flores doctorum lib. 2. De christiana religione lib. 1. De illusionibus demonum lib. 1. De tentatione diaboli lib. 1. De remedijs vitiorum lib. 1. Laurentius Toole archbishop of Dublin. Trauerse doctor of divinitie, he flourished in the reigne of Henrie the eight. There hath bene after him a scholemaster in Dublin of that name. Tundalus Magus a knight, after he became a Charterhouse monke, much giuen to contemplation, wherein he is reported to haue seene diuerse visions of heauen and hell, and thereupon he wrote

Virgilius Solinus a noble man borne being kept in peares, he trauelled into Germanie, where being knowne for a vertuous and learned prelat, he was chosen by Otilon duke of Bauaria, to be their rec- tor or gardian of an ancient abbete, named S. Peters abbete, placed in the citie of Salisburgh, after he was created Episcopus Iuanienfis, and founded in the said towne of Salisburgh a church. In his time one Bonifacius an Englishman, being gene- rall visitour in Bauaria, rebaptized certeine, whome he suspected not to haue bene orderlie baptized. Vir- gilius detesting the fact, hauing consulted with Si- donius archbishop of Bauaria, with Ood Bonifacius in his sond attempt. The controuersie being brought before pope Zacharias, he decreed that Bonifacius held an error, and that Virgilius and Sidonius pub- lished in that point sound doctrine, as who so will read Zacharias his epistle vnto Bonifacius shall plainlie see. Virgilius deceased 784, and lieth bur- ied in his church at Salisburgh: he wrote Ad Zacha- riam Rom. pont. epist. 1.

Owen Alltaga physician, his father proceeded doctor of physike in Paris. Vltanus a lerned monke fellow to Foillanus, with whome he trauelled into France, and with continuall preaching edified the inhabitants of that realme; he floished in the yeare 640. Gilbertus Vrgilius a profess Carmelite, and a student in Orford, he floished in the yeare 1330, he wrote in two great tomes, Summam quarundam legum, De rebus theologicis lib. 1. Usher, or Usher a student in Cambridge, and a preacher. Wadding, a proper versifier, he wrote in Latine vpon the bur- ning of Paules steeple, Carmen heroicum, Diuersa epigrammata. Edward Wallsh, he floished in the yeare 1550, and wrote in English The dutie of such as fight for their countrie, The reformation of Ire- land by the word of God. James Wallsh, master of art, and student in diuinitie, he translated into Eng- lish, Giraldum Cambrensem, he wrote in Latine Epigrammata diuersa.

Richard Wallsh master of art and student in diu- nitie. There is a learned man of the name beneficed in S. Patrikes church in Dublin, student in Cam- bridge, and now a preacher. Peter Wallsh a proper youth, and one that would haue bene an ornament to his countrie, if God had spared him life, he died of a surfet at London, about the yeare 1571. There dwelleth in Waterford a lawyer of the surname, who writeth a verie proper Latine verse. Wellesleie deane of Kildare, there liueth an other learned man of the name, who is archdeacon of saint Patrikes. Peter White borne in Waterford, fellow of Duall college in Orford, the luckie schoolmaster of Mount- ner; he bestowed his time rather in the making of scholars, than in the penning of booke, and to the in- struction of youth, he wrote Epitom. in copiam E- rasmi, Epitom. figurarum rhetoricar. Annotationes in orat. pro Ardia poeta. Annotat. in orationem pro T. A. Milone. Epigrammata diuersa. John White batchelor of diuinitie borne in Clonmell, he wrote in Latine Diuersa pia epigrammata. Andrew White a good humanist, a pretie philosopher. White, of this surname there floished sundrie learned gentlemen. There liueth one White in Waterford, that maketh verie well in the English. Andrew White a toward youth, and a good versifier. William an abbat, and (as it is thought) a soothsayer, he floished in the yeare 1298, and wrote Prophetias rerum futurarum lib. 1. David Wolfe, a diuine.

Thus far (gentle reader) haue I induoured to heape vp together a catalog of such learned Irish- men, as by diligent insearch could haue bin found, Howbeit, I am to request the not to measure the ample number of the learned of that countrie by this briefe abstract: considering, that diuerse haue bene, yea and are yet liuing, of profound knowledge that to me are unknowne, and therefore in this regi- ster not recozded.

The disposition and maners of the meere Irish, commonlie called the wild Irish.

The eight chapter.

BEFORE I attempt the br- folding of the maners of the meere Irish, I thinke it ex- pedient, to forewarne the reader, not to impute anie barbarous custome that shall be here laid downe, to the ci- tizens, townesmen, and in- habitants of the English pale, in that they differ little or nothing from the ancient customes and dispositi- ons of their progenitors, the English and Welsh men, being therefore as mortallie behated of the Irish, as those that are borne in England. For the Irish man standeth so much vpon his gentilitie, that he termeth anie one of the English sept, and planted in Ireland, Bobdeagh Galteagh, that is, English churle: but if he be an Englishman borne, then he nameth him, Bobdeagh Saronnegh, that is, a Sar- on churle: so that both are churles, and he the onlie gentleman. And there vpon if the basest pezzant of them name himselfe with his superiour, he will be sure to place himselfe first, as I and Onelle, I and you, I and he, I and my master, whereas the cour- tesse of the English language is cleane contrarie.

The people are thus inclined, religious, franke, a- moxous, trefull, sufferable of infinit paines, verie glorious, manie forcerers, excellent hostemen, de- lighted with wars, great almesgiuers, passing in hospitalitie. The lewder sort, both clearkes and late men are sensuall and ouer loose in liuing. The same being vertuouslie bred vp or reformed, are such mir- rors of holinesse and austeritie, that other nations re- teine but a shadow of deuotion in comparison of them. As for abstinence and fasting, it is to them a familiar kind of chastisement. They follow the dead corpse to the graue with howling and barbarous outcries, pitifull in awarance: thereof grew, as I suppose, the prouerbe; To wepe Irish.

Crædie of praise they be, & fearefull of dishonor, and to this end they esteeme their poets, who write Irish learnedlie, and pen their sonets heroically for the which they are bountifullie rewarded; if not, they send out libels in dispraise, thereof the lords and gentlemen stand in great awe. They loue tenderlie their foster children, and bequeath to them a childes portion, whereby they nourish sure friendship: so be- neficiall euerie waie, that commonlie five hundred colwes and better, are giuen in reward to win a no- ble mans child to foster. they loue & trust their foster brethren more than their owne. The men are cleane of skin and hew, of stature tall. The women are well fauoured, cleane coloured, faire handed, big & large, suffered from their infancie to grow at will, no- thing curious of their feature and popoztion of bodie.

Their infants, they of meaner sort, are nesther swaddled nor laped in linnen, but folded by sharke naked in a blanket till they can go. Proud they are of long crisped bushes of hare which they terme glibs, and the same they nourish with all their cunning, to crop the front thereof they take it for a notable pæce of billanie. After crosses, which they tearme Chamrocks, roots and other herbs they feed upon, oteameale and butter they cram together, they drinke wheie, milke, and beefe-broth. Fleth they deuoure without bread, and that halfe raw: the rest boileth in their stomachs with Aqua vite, which they swill in after such a surfet by quarts and pottels: they let their colwes blond, which growne to a gellie, they bake and ouer-spread with butter, and so eate it in lumps. No meat they fanlie so much as porke, and the fatter the better. One of John Dnele household demanded of his fellow whether beefe were better than porke? That (quoth the other) is as intricat a question, as to aske whether thou art better than Dnele.

Their noble men, and noble mens tenants, now and then make a set feast, which they call coshering, wher-to stocke all their retainers, whom they name followers, their rithmours, their bards, their harpers that feed them with musike: and when the harper twangeth or singeth a song, all the companie must be whist, or else he chafeth like a cutpurse, by reason his harmonie is not had in better price. In their coshering they sit on straw, they are serued on straw, and lie vpon mattresses and pallets of straw.
 The antiquitie of this kind of feasting is set forth by Virgil, where Wido intertaineeth the Troian prince and his companie. They obserue diuerse degrees, according to which each man is regarded. The basest sort among them are little yong wags, called Dal-tins, these are lackies, and are seruiceable to the groomes or horseboies, who are a degree aboue the Daltins. Of the third degree is the Kerne, who is an ordinarie souldior, vsing for weapon his sword and target, and sometimes his peece, being commonlie so good markemen as they will come within a score of a great castell. Kerne signifieth (as noble men of deepe iudgement informed me) a shouer of hell, because they are taken for no better than for rakehels, or the diuels blacke gard, by reason of the stinking sturre they heape, wheresoeuer they be.

The fourth degree is a galloglashe, vsing a kind of pollax for his weapon. These men are commonlie wicelward rather by profession than by nature, grim of countenance, tall of stature, big of lim, burlie of bodie, well and stronglie timbered, chrestlie feeding on beefe, porke & butter. The fift degree is to be an horseman, which is the chiefeest next the lord and capteine.
 These horsemen, when they haue no state of their owne, gad & range from house to house like arrant knights of the round table, and they neuer dismount untill they ride into the hall, and as farre as the table.
 There is among them a brotherhood of karrowes, that proffer to plaie at cards all the yeare long, and make it their onelie occupation. They plaie awaie mantle and all to the bare skin, and then truste themselues in straw or leaves, they wait for passengers in the high waie, inuite them to game vpon the greene, and aske no more but companions to make them sport. For default of other stufte, they patone their glibs, the nailles of their fingers and toes, their dimittaries, which they leese or redeme at the courte-sic of the winner.

One office in the house of noble men is a tale-teller, who bringeth his lord asleepe with tales vaine and frivolous, wherunto the number giue sooth and credit. Without either precepts or obseruations of congruities, they speake Latine like a vulgar language, learned in their common scholes of leach-craft and law, wher at they begin children, and hold on fiftene or twentie yeares, conning by rote the aphorismes of Hippocrates, and the ciuill institutes, with a few other parings of those faculties. In their scholes they growell vpon conches of straw, their bookes at their noses, themselves lie flat prostrate, and so they chant out with a lowd voice their lessons by peccemeale, repeating two or three words thirtie or forty times together. Other lawyers they haue liable to certeine families, which after the custome of the countrie determine and iudge causes. These consider of wrongs offered and recoued among their neighbors: be it murther, felonie, or trespassse, all is remedied by composition (except the grudge of parties seeke reuenge) and the time they haue to spare from spoiling and preiding, they lightlie bestow in parling about such matters. The Breighon (so they call this kind of lawyers) sitteth on a banke, the lords and gentlemen at variance round about him, and then they proceed. To rob and spoile their enemies they deeme it none offense, nor seeke anie meanes to recouer their losse, but euen to watch them the like turne. But if neighbors & friends send their purre-ois to purloine one another, such actions are iudged by the Breighons aforesaid. They honour and reue-rence stiers and pilgrims, by suffering them to passe quietlie, and by sparing their mansions, what soeuer outrage they shew to the countrie besides them. The like fauor do they extend to their poets & rithmours.

In old time they much abused the honorable state of marriage, either in contracts vnlawfull, meeting the degrees of prohibition, or in diuorcements at pleasure, or in retaining concubines or harlots for wiles: yea euen at this daie, where the clergie is faint, they can be content to marrie for a yeare and a daie of probation; and at the yeares end, or anie time after, to retorne hir home with hir marriage gods, or as much in balure, vpon light quarels, if the gentlewoman's friends be vnable to reuegge the iniurie. In like maner maie she forsake hir husband.
 In some corner of the land they vsed a damnable superstition, leauing the right armes of their infants vndressened (as they tearme it) to the intent it might giue a more vngratious and deadlie blow. Others write that gentlemens children were baptised in milke, and the infants of poore folke in water, who had the better or rather the onelie choise. Diuerse other vaine and crecreable superstitions they obserue, that for a complet recitall would require a fenerall volume. Whereto they are the more stiffelie wedded, bicause such single preachers as they haue, reproue not in their sermons the pœuishnesse and fondnesse of these frivolous dreamers. But these and the like enozmities haue taken so deepe root in that people, as commonlie a preacher is sooner by their naughtie liues corrupted, than their naughtie liues by his preaching amended.

Again, the verie English of birth, conuerfant with the sauage sort of that people become degenerat, and as though they had tasted of Circes poisoned cup, are quite altered. Such force hath education to make or mar. God with the beams of his grace clarifie the eyes of that rude people, that at length they maie see their miserable estate: and also that such as are deputed to the gouernement thereof, bend their industrie with conscionable policie to red uce them from rudenes to knowledge, from rebellio to obedience, from trecherie to honestie, from sauagenesse to ciuillite, from idlenesse to labour, from wickednesse to goodli-nesse, whereby they maie the sooner espie their blind-nesse, acknowledge their losenes, amend their liues, frame themselves pliable to the lawes and ordinaces of hir maiestie, whome God with his gracious assistance preserve, as well to the prosperous government of hir realme of England, as to the happie reformation of hir realme of Ireland.

The first inhabitation of Ireland, by whome it vvas instructed in the faith, with the seuerall inuasions of the same, &c.

The authors preface or introduction to the sequele of the historie.

Although (vndoutedlie) the originall of all nations for the more part is so vncerteine, that who soeuer shall enter into the search thereof, further than he findeth in the holie scriptures, may seeme as it were rather to talke with men that dreame, than to gather authorities sufficient wherevpon to ground anie warranted opinion: yet for as much as the authors (whom in this Irish historie we chieflie follow) haue set downe what they haue found in the Irish antiquities, concerning the first inhabitation of this countrie of Ireland, and because the reader also may be peraduenture desirous to vnderstand the same, we haue thought good to recite what they haue written thereof, leauing the credit vnto the due consideration of the circumspect reader; and where the errors are too grosse, giuing by the way some cautions, in like sort as our authors themselues haue doone. According therefore to the order of all other nations and people that seeke to aduance the glorie of their countries, in fetching their beginning with the furthest from some one of ancient antiquitie: so likewise the Irishmen haue registred in their chronicles, that their countrie was first inhabited by one of Noahs neeces, after the manner following.

THE FIRST INHABITATION of Ireland, &c.

In the yeare of the world, 1525: the patriarch Noah began to admonish the people of vengeance for their wickednesse and detestable sins, to build his arke to forsethew his kindfolkes and friends of that uniuersall flood which was to come, wherewith the whole face of the earth should be couered with water; & that within few yeares, except they amended in time. This did he before the generall flood, one hundred & five and twentie yeares. But when euerie man seemed to neglect this wholesome admonition, one Cesara that was neere to Noah, hearing his vncles prophesie, doubted least the same should come to passe; and therefore determined with certeine his adherents to seeke adventures in some forren region, persuading his selfe, that if he might find a countrie neuer yet inhabited, and so with sin vnspotted, the generall sentence of Gods wrath should not there take effect. Whereupon rigging a nauie, he committed his selfe to the seas, sailing forth, till at length he arrived in Ireland onelie with three men, & fiftie women, hauing lost the residue of his companie by misfortune of sundrie shipwracks made in that his long & troublesome iourneie. The names of the men were these, Bithi, Laigria, and Fintan. The coast where he first set foot on land, and where also he lieth buried, is called Nauicularclitus, that is, the shipwrecking riuaige or shore. The stones wherein the monie hereof was preferred from violence of waters, haue bene scene of some (as they themselves haue reported) but how trulie I haue not to say: within fortie daies after his comming on land there, the uniuersall flood came & overflowed all that coast as well as all other parts of the world. But where as this tale betwixt it selfe too manifestlie to be a mere vntuth, if the time and other circumstances be thoughtlie examined, I will not stand longer about the prose or dispute thereof; sauing that it is sufficient (as I thinke) to bring it out of credit, to consider, how that the art of sailing was unknowne to the world before the uniuersall flood; and no part inhabited except the continent of Syria, and thereabouts. But to passe such a forged fable, with the record thereof grauen in a stone (a deuise borrowed from Iosephus, as some thinke) it shall be sufficient for the glorie of the Irish antiquitie to grant that

Ireland was discovered and peopled by some of Noahs kindred, euen with the first Islands of the world (if they will needs haue it so, as the likelihoode is great) according to that which is set forth in their histories, when about three hundred yeares after the generall flood immediatlie vpon the confusion of tongues, Japhet & his posteritie emboldened by Noahs example, aduentured to commit themselves by ship to passe the seas, & to search out the unknowne corners of the world, and so finding out diuerse Isles in these west parts of the world.

There was (saie they) in that retinue one of the same progenie named Bartolenus or Bastolenus, who encouraged with the late attempt and success of Nimrod kinsman to Ninus (then newlie intruded vpon the monarchie of Assyria) searched so far west, intending to attaine to some gouernement, where he might rule without anie partner in authoritie, till at length fortune brought him and his people vpon the coast of Ireland. Here he settled himselfe with his three sonnes Languina, Salamis, and Ruthurgus, right active and stout gentlemen, who searching the land from side to side, and from end to end, lest remembrances of their names in certeine notable places named after them; as Languinie, Stragrins, and mount Salanga, since named saint Dominicks hill, and Ruthurgus his pole. Little is remembered of Bartolenus, sauing that in short space with manie hands working at once, he rid and made plaine a great part of the countrie ouergrown with woods and thickets.

Thus was Ireland inhabited by this people vnder the gouernment of those three sons of Bartolenus and their offspring, about the space of three hundred yeares. Togither with Bartolenus arrived Ireland certeine godles people of Nimrods stocke, worthilie termed giants, as those that in bodilie shape exceeded the common proportion of others, and vied their strength to gaine souereigntie, and to oppresse the weake with rapine and violence. That lineage (Chams brood) did grow in short while to great numbers, and atwaie indented themselves where soeuer they came to beare the rule ouer others. The cause hereof was their bodilie strength, answerable to their hugeness of stature; another, the examples of Cham or Zoaostris the magician, and Nimrod grandfather to Ninus. Which two persons in themselves and their progenies were renowned through the world as victorious princes, ruling ouer two mightie kingdoms Egypt and Assyria: A third cause there was, as this: they repined at the blessings bestowed vpon Sem and Japhet, thinking it necessarie to withstand and prevent all lawfull rule and domination, least the curse of slauerie prophesied by Noah should light vpon them, as at length it did. Whereupon

Upon rebelliouslie withstanding their due obedience from their lawfull governours here in Ireland, and taking head, set by a king of their owne faction, and maintaining his estate to the oppression of the subjects, by bringing them into continuall bondage. The successe was variable on both sides betwixt the lawfull governours & these vsurpers, with baille ratles and skirmishes, so much to the grieve of them that coueted to live in quiet vnder their rightfull princes, that they determined with the chance of one general battell, either wholie to subdue those proud rebellious tyrants, or else to end their liues in freedom, and so to be rid of further miserie. But first, where there had growen certeine debates and enmitie among themselves, whereby they had inweakened their owne forces, they thought good to make peace together, before they put their whole state in hazard of one battell against the giants, concluding therefore an agreement, and joining in league with promise to assist ech other to subdue their common enemies, they assemble their power forth of all parts of the land, and comming to ioine battell with the giants, after they had fought right fiercelie together for the space of certeine houres, the victorie inclined to the rightfull part, so that the lawfull kings preuailing against the wicked tyrants, great slaughter was made on the whole brood of that mischeuous generation. For the kings meaning to deliuer themselves of all danger in time to come, vsed their happie victorie with great crueltie, which turned to their owne confusion: for where they neither spared man, woman, nor child that came in the waie for more despise, & fuller satisfieng of their whole reuenge, they did not vouchsafe to burie the carcasses of their slaue enemies; but cast them out like a sort of dead dogs: whereof through stench of the same, such an infectue pestilence infused in all places through corruption of aire, that few escaped with life, beside those that got them awaie by sea.

And hereby lieth a vaine tale among the Irishmen, that one of the giants named Kuanus, chancing to be preserued from this mortalitie, liued forth two thousand and one and fortie yeares, which is more than twise the age of Methusalem. By this man (saie they) saint Patrike was informed of all the estate of the countrie: and after that vpon request he had receiued baptism of the said Patrike, he deceased in the yeare after the birth of our saviour foure hundred and thirtie, as in the Irish histories hath bin vnadvisedlie registered. But such foolish tales and vaine narrations may warne the aduised reader how to beware of yielding credit vnto the like idle fantasies and forged tales, when they hap to light vpon such blind legends. For where some of the poets vsed for inuention sake to faine such dreaming fables for exercise of their stiles and wits: afterwards through error and lacke of knowledge, they haue bene taken with the ignorant for verie true and most assured histories. But now to the matter, as we find it recorded of an infinit number of giants slaue and made awaie in manner afore rehearsed, certeine there were that got them into some lurking dens or caues, and there kept them till lacke of vitels enforced them to come forth, and make shift for sustenance; and perceiving no resistance because the land was in manner left desolat, they wared bolder; and when they vnderstood how things had passed, they settled themselves in the best part of the countrie, easily subduing the poore scellie soules that remained, and so retaining their lineage, they became lords of the whole Island, keeping the same in subiection for the space of three score yeares together.

Among Iaphets sons we read in Genesis that Magog was one, who planted his people in Scythia nere

Tanais, from whence about the yeare of the world two thousand three hundred & fourtenth. Memodius with his foure sonnes, Statius, Carbaneles, Annus, Fergusius, captains ouer a faire companie of people, were sent into Ireland, who passing by Crete, and taking there such as were desirous to seeke adventures with them; at length they landed in Ireland, inhabited the countrie, and multiplied therein, although not without continuall warre, which they held with the giants for the space of two hundred and firtene yeares, in the end of which terme the giants preuailing chased them thence againe, so that they retired into Scythia. This was about the yeare after the creation (as by their account it should seeme) two thousand five hundred thirtie and three, from which time the giants kept possession of the land without forein inuasion, till the yeare two thousand seauen hundred and fouretene; but yet in all that space they were not able to frame a common-welth: for falling at variance among themselves, and measuring all things by might, seditionlie they vered ech other. Which thing comming to the knowledge of the Crete, the sons of Deila moved five brethren, sonnes to one Deila, being notable seamen and skillfull pilots to rig a nauie, and to attempt the conquest of this Island. These were of the posteritie of Memodius, and named Gandius, Genandius, Sagandus, Rutherantius, & Slantius. When all things were readie, and their companies assembled, they took the sea, and finallye arriuing here in Ireland, found the puissance of the giants sore weakened through their owne ciuill dissention: so that with more ease they atchued their purpose, and wan the whole countrie, bitterlie destroying and rooting out that wicked generation enemies to mankind; and after diuided the Island into five parts, and in each of them they severallie reigned. Furthermore, to satisfie all sides, and avoid contention, they concluded to fix a mere-stone in the middle point of Ireland, to the which ech of their kingdoms should reach, so as they might be equalie partakers of the commodities found within that countrie soile.

These are also supposed to haue inuented the distribution of shires into cantreds, euerie cantred or baronie containing one hundred townships. At length desire of souerainie set the five brethren at variance, & greatlie hindred the growing wealth. But Slantius getting the upper hand, and bringing his foure brethren to a low eb, took on him as chiefe aboute his other brethren, incroching round about the middle stone for the space of certeine miles, which plot in time obtained the priuilege & name of one entier part, & now maketh by the number of five parts (into the which Ireland is said to be diuided) and is called Meth, and in Latine Media, taking that name (as some haue guessed) for that in respect of the other, it contained but the moitie of cantreds, that is, firtene (where ech of the other comprehended two and thirtie a peece) or else for that it lieth in the middelt of the land. This part Slantius ioined as a surplusage ouer and aboue his inheritance, to the monarchie: which part notwithstanding grew to a seuerall kingdom. Thirtie yeares the monarchie yet continued in this order, but finallye Slantius departed this life, and was buried in a mountaine of Meth, that beareth hitherto (as they saie) the name after him. When the princes subiect to him, began to stomach the matter, and denied their obedience to his successor: whereupon ensued continuall wars betwixt them, falling still at debat for the land of Meth, which strife of long time might neuer fullie be appeased. In the meane of these troubles also there arriued in Ireland a new arme of Scythians, who made claime to the land by a title of right which they pretended from their their forefather Demobus: and so taking & making parts, they set all in an vpoze, that hanoche was made on each side with fire and sword in most miserable manner.

To be short, they spent themselves in pursuing one another with such outrage, that now they cared not what nation or what souldier they receiued to their aid, to keepe vp or beat downe a side. By which occasion the Britons also put in a foot among them, who procured Brennus the brother of Belinus to direct his course thither, with the same nauie which he had made readie to passe ouer into Gallia, now called France, to the aid of Segwin then king of the Allobroges that inhabited the countries called Saualle and the Delphinat. But his enterprise into Ireland took small effect, though there were other kings of the Britons that gat dominion there, in so much that Gurguntius, or Gurguntius, the sonne of Belinus, accompted Ireland among other his dominions to belong to him by lineall descent: notwithstanding the British princes neuer intioled the quiet possession thereof, longer than they held it by maine force, but were often repelled and put to the worse with seeking after it, finding there small gaine other than stripes, whereof they bare alwaies great plentie. But now to come to the Spaniards, that lastlie (vnder the conduct of foure capitaines) passed into Ireland from Britaine, and inhabited that Island, it shall not be impertinent in following the order which our author keepeth, to speake somewhat of their originall, that it may appeere from whence the Irish nation had their first beginning.

In the yeare of the world 2476, after the vsuerfall flood 780, whilst the Israelits serued in Egypt, Cathelus the sonne of one Heale, a great lord in Grecia, was vpon dissauis, exiled his countrie with a number of his factious adherents and friends. This noble gentleman being right wise, valiant, and well spoken, comming into Egypt, got honozable intertainment of Pharaosurnamed Nus, as in the Scottish historie more plainelie appeareth. And afterwards departing that countrie, trauesed the seas, and landing first in Portugall, after some bickering with the inhabitants; at length yet he got by their consent a portion of the countrie, lying by the banks of the riuer ancientlie called Spunda, & now Spodego, where shortly after he began to build a citie first named Brachara, but now Brasalo, as Hector Boetius hath. After this, when Cathelus his people began to increase in power, through persuasion of the Spaniards their neighbors, they removed into Gallia, where they also builded a citie named Brigantium, which is now called Coruna. Finally, when they grew into such a huge multitude, that Gallia was not able to susteine them, Cathelus with a certeine number of them passed ouer into Ireland, and there grew into such estimation with the barbarous people, that for his knowledge speciallie in all languages, he was highlie honored: for he not onelie instructed and beautified the Irish tong, but also taught them letters, fought vp their antiquities, practised their youth in warlike feats after the maner of the Grekes and Egyptians, from whence he descended.

To conclude, he was so acceptable to them, that to gratifie such a benefactor, they agreed to name the Island after him Cathelia, and after his wife Scotia. This is one opinion but yet incredible, not onelie to Humfreie Lhuid, but also to other learned men, and diligent searchers of antiquities, by reason of the sundrie arguments of improbabilitie, as well in the miscount of yeares as o her unlikelihoos found therein, when the circumstances come to be duly examined, thoughlie tried, and well considered. Yet certaine it is, that Ireland was ancientlie named Scotia, and the people Scots, as by diuerse old writers it may be sufficientlie proued: albeit by what occasion it first took that name, or from whence they came, it is as yet doubted. But to proceed with the historie as we find it. The residue of Cathelus his people, which remained in Spaine, founded the citie of Balon in the confines of Gascoigne, and replenished the seacoasts of Spaine with stoze of inhabitants, and welnere about two hundred yeares after their first arrivall there (when they were estones pestered with multitude of people) they began to fantasie a new voiage, but whether at that time they passed ouer into Ireland, or some whither else, it is uncerteine.

Notwithstanding sure it is, that in the daies of Gurguntius king of the Britons, the chiefe gouernour of Balon with foure brethren Spaniards, of the which two are said to be Hiberus and Hermon, not the sonnes (some thinke) of Cathelus (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) but some other perhaps that were descended from him, who vnderstanding that diuerse of the westerne Isles were emptie of inhabitants, assembling a great number of men, women, and children, embarked with the same in three score great vessels, and directing their course westward, bouered a long time in the sea about the Isles of Dykenie, untill by god hap they met with Gurguntius then returning from the conquest of Denmarke (as in the British historie it appeareth) whom they besought in consideration of their want of vittells and other necessaries, being such as they were not able longer to abide the seas, incumbered with a sort of women and children, to direct and appoint them to some place where to inhabit; promising to hold the same of him, and to become liege people to him and his heires for ever.

Gurguntius adouising himselfe hereof, remembred with what trouble he held the Irish in subiecti on, and conceiuing hope that those strangers should either subdue or wholly destroye that vnraie generation, took the othes of those Spaniards with hostages; and furnishing them and their ships with all things needfull, set them ouer into Ireland, where assisted with such Britons as Gurguntius had appointed to go with them for their guides, they made a conquest of the whole countrie, & settled themselves in the same. Some write, that Ireland was before that present hold of all inhabitants: but yet they agree that these Spaniards were guided thither by the Britons: & that vnder such conditions as before is recited. So that it appeareth the kings of this our Brittain had an elder right to the realme of Ireland, than by the conquest of Henrie the second, which title they euer maintained, and sometimes preuailed in pursuing thereof, as in the daies of king Arthur, to whom the Irish (as in some histories is remembred) acknowledged their due subiecti on with paiement of their tribute, and making their appeerance at the citie called in the British tong Caer Lheon. Wherevnto when their free assent, the submission of their princes with lawfull conquest and prescription are adioined, an inuincible title must needs be inferred.

But now to our purpose. The Spaniards substantiallie aided by the Britons, settled themselves, and diuided their seats in quarters, the foure brethren reigning severallie apart in foure sundrie portions in good quiet and increase of welth, untill their pride and ambition armed two of them against the other two: as Hiberus and one of his brethren against Hermon and the other brother. In this dissention Hermon due his brother Hiberus. Of whom at the same time the countrie (as some hold) was named Hibernia, as in the description further appeareth: although some rather hold, that it took the name of iron, of the plentifull mines of that kind of metall wherewith that land aboundeth: and so those ancient writers which name it Ierna, named it more aptly after the speech of the inhabitants than others, which name it Hibernia. But to proceed. Hermitage hereupon to avoid the ill opinion of men, for that he had thus attained to the sovereignty by the unnatural slaughter of his brother, in that unhappy civil warre, purged himselfe to his subjects, that neither maliciously nor contentiously, but for his necessarie defense and safetie he had borne armes against his brethren: and to witness how farre he was from all desire to rule alone, he appointed certaine capitaines as kings, to rule under him severall countreies, reserving to himselfe but one fourth part, and the portion of speech allotted to the monarchie for the better maintenance of his estate.

These parts appointed forth in this wise at length grew to five kingdomes, Leinster, Connagh, Ulster, and Downe divided into two parts, and sometime to more, by usurping or compounding among themselves: but ever one was chosen to be chiefe sovereign monarch over them all. Thus it seemeth that certaine of the Spaniards of the north parts of Spaine, inhabiting the countreies about Biscaye and Galicia, came and peopled Ireland (as both their storie histories and the British do wholly agree:) but from whence they came first to inhabit those countreies of Spaine, verelie I have not otherwise to assure: for no other writers that I can remember, but (such as have registered the Scottish chronicles) make mention of the coming thither of Gathelus with his wife Scotia and their people, in manner as by the said chronicles is pretended. But now to our purpose. An hundred and thirtie chiefe kings are reckoned of this nation from Hermon to Laogirus, the sonne of Dealus Magnus, in whose time that holie esteemed man Patrike converted them to christianitie. But now in the meane time whilst the Irishmen lived in some tollerable order and rest under their severall kings, one Rodolike a Scythian prince with a small companie of men, being weather driven round about the coasts of Britaine, was by chance cast upon the shore of Ireland.

These were Picts, and the first that had been heard of in these parties (as some authors have recorded) a people from their verticrable given to dissention, landleapers, merciless, fierce and hardie. They being brought and presented to the Irish king, craved interpreters, which granted, Rodolike their chiefeine made this request for him and his, as followeth: Not as denigrate from the courage of our ancestors, but fashioning our selves to fortunes course, we are become to craves of Ireland, as humble supplicants that never before this present have so embased our selves to any other nation. Behold sir king, and regard us well, no light occasion causeth these lustie valliant bodies to stoop. Scythians we are, & Picts of Scythia, no small portion of glorie resteth in these two names. What shall I speake of the civil warre that hath expelled us from our native homes, or rip up old histories to move strangers to bemoane us? Let our servants and children discourse thereof at leisure, if perhaps you will vouchsafe to grant us some time of abode in your land, to the which effect and purpose our urgent necessity beseecheth your favors, a king of a king and men of men are to crave assistance. Princes can well discern and consider how nere it toucheth their honour and suertie, to uphold and release the state of a king, by treason decaied. And manifest it is to all men of reasonable consideration, that nothing more becometh the nature of man, than to be moved with compassion, and as it were to feele themselves hurt, when they heare and understand of other mens calamities. Admit (we beseech you) and receive amongst you these few scattered remnants of Scythia: if your comes be narrow, we are not marie: if the soile of your countrie be barren, we are borne and enured to hardnesse: if you live in peace, we are at commandement as subjects: if you warre, we are ready to serve you as souldiours: we demand no kingdome, no state, no pompous triumph in Ireland: we are here alone, and have lost such things behind us with our enemies: howsoever you estimate of us, we shall content our selves therewith, and learne to frame our liking to yours, calling to mind not what we have borne, but what we are.

Great consultation was had about this request of these strangers, and many things debated to and fro. In conclusion, the Irish laid forth for answer the opinions of their antiquaries; that is, such as were skillfull in old histories and sayings of their elders, whereunto they gave credit, and therefore they gathered it could not be expedient to accept the Scythians into the land, for that mingling of nations in one realme breedeth quarrels: moreover, that the multitude of the inhabitants was such, as come in the whole Ile was unable to receive them, and therefore those few new comers, being placed among so manie old inhabitants, might breed quickle some disturbance to bring all out of joint. But (said they) though we may not conveniently receive you among us, yet shall you find us ready to further you to be our neighbours.

Not far hence there lieth the great Ile of Britaine, in the north part whereof, being void of inhabitants, your manhoods and policies may purchase for you comes to place your selves at ease: we shall appoint you capitaine to guide you thither, we shall assist to settle you with our forces in that countrie, make ready your ships that ye may passe thither with all convenient speed. Encouraged with this persuasion, they took their course towards the north parts of Britaine now called Scotland, where contrarie to their expectation Marius king of Britaine was ready to await their coming, and with sharpe battell vanquishing them in field, slew Rodolike with a great number of his retinues. Those that escaped with life, and sought to him for grace, he licensed to inhabit the uttermost end of Scotland. This Marius Humfric Lhuid taketh to be the same, whome the Romane writers name Arviragus, who reigned about the yere of our Lord seuentie, a prince of a noble courage and of no small estimation in his daies (as should seeme by that which is written of him.) His right name (as the said Humfric Lhuid anoneth) was Aneurig.

But now concerning the Picts, whether that those that escaped with life, got seats by king Aneurigs grant (as above is specified) or that getting to their ships, they withdrew into the Isles of Orkneye, and there remained. Whiles they wanted also to increase their issue: and because the Britons thought scoone to match their daughters with such an unknowne and new come nation, the Picts continued their first acquaintance with the Irish, and by intreatie obtained wives from them, with condition, that if the crowne should hap to fall in contention, they should yeld thus much to the prerogative of the woman, that the prince should be elected rather of the blood roiall of the female kind than of the male. Which order (saith Beda) the Picts were well known to keepe unto his time.

But howsoever we shall give credit to this historie of the first coming of Picts into this land, if we grant that to be true which Geffrie of Monmouth republic of this victorie obtained by Marius against the Picts: yet haue I thought good to aduertise the reader, that the Britons of this Ile were disquieted by that nation long before the supposed time of the said king Marius. For Panemtinus in his oration intituled Panegyricus, Max. Dictus hath these words (speaking of the conquest which Iulius Cesar had here against the Britons.) But in that age (saith he) Britaine was neither furnished with anie ships of warre for battell on the sea, and the Romans after the warres of Affrike and Asia, were well practised with the late warres against pirats, and after that against Spithridates, in which they were exercised as well by sea as land. Moreover, the British nation was then unskillfull, and not trained to feats of war, for the Britons then being onelie used to the Picts and Irish enemies, people halfe naked through lacke of skill, easilie gaue place to the Romans force, so that Cesar might onelie as it were glorie in this, to haue passed in that iourneie ouer the ocean sea.

Whereby it should seeme that the Picts and Irish did disquiet the Britons, before the comming of Iulius Cesar into this Ile of Britaine. But whether they inhabited at that time in some part of Ireland, or in some of the out Isles by Scott land, either in anie part of Germanie, or Scandinavia; or else whether they were already settled in the furthest parts of Scotland, as in Cathnesse, towards Dungenbie head: we haue not to affirme, other than that which in Scotland we haue written, in following Hector Boetius, whose opinion how farre it is to be suspected in matters of antiquitie, I leaue to the consideration of others. But for the first comming as well of the Picts as Scots (whom he maketh inhabitants with in this Ile so long before) either the name of the one nation or the other is remembred to haue had anie gouernement here, by anie ancient or approved writer. I cannot persuaide my selfe, that either Scots or Picts had anie settled seats within the bounds of this Ile of Britaine, till after the birth of our sauour: but that rather the Scots, as yet inhabiting in Ireland, and in the westerne Isles called by the Romane writers Hebrides, and the Picts, in the Isles of Orkney called in Latine Orchades, did vse to make often inuasions vpon the Britons, dwelling vpon the coasts that lie nere to the sea side ouer against those Isles.

From whence they comming ouer in such vessels or boats, as the fishermen doe yet vse, at length the Picts first about the yere of our Lord 290, as Humfreie Lhuid hath noted, entred generallie into Cathnesse, and other the north parts of Britaine, where they settled themselves, and remoued the Britons that there inhabited before that time: and shortly after the Scots likewise came ouer and got seats in the west parts ouer against the north of Ireland, and in those westerne Isles, which Isles they first got into their possession. And in this sort those nations Picts and Scots came first to inhabit here in this our Ile of Britaine, as the said Humfreie Lhuid, not without aduised coniectures grounded vpon good reason and sufficient authoritie to lead him so to esteeme, hath written in his short commentaries of the description of Britaine.

And verelie I thinke we may more safely beleue that which he auoucheth in this behalfe, than that which Hector Boetius setteth downe, sith for anie thing I can perceiue, his authorities bring no such warrant with them, but we may with good reason suspect them. But for the man himselfe, euē as he hath verie orderlie, and with no lesse cunning than eloquence set downe diuerse things incredible, and reported some other contrarie to the truth of the historie for the glorie of his nation, as we may take it; so in his excuse it may be alledged, that he was not the author of those matters, but wrote what he found in Cambell, Veremound, Cornelius Hibernensis, and such other, in like case as Gefferie of Monmouth wrote what he found in old ancient British monuments, & was not the deuiser himselfe (as some haue suspected) of such things as in his booke are by him expressed. But now to returne to the Picts. It may be that they came at severall times in like manner as the Scots did out of Ireland, of whom the first is remembred to be Fergus, the son of Fergus, a man right skilfull in blasoning of armorie, himselfe bare a lion gules in a field of gold. The marble stone wherof in the Scottish historie is mentioned, brought into Ireland by Simon Brechin, and kept till those daies as a pretious iewel, this Fergus obtained towards the prospering of his iourneie: for that it was thought, who so had the same in possession, could not but obtaine soueraintie and rule ouer others as a king, namelie those of the Scottish nation. This stone Fergus bringing into Scotland, left it there. But although that Fergus be put in ranke among those Scottish kings that should reigne in Britaine, yet he bare small rule there, & was diuers times beaten backe into Ireland, where finally he was drowned by misfortune in the creeke of Knockfergus.

That he incountred with Collus king of the Britons (as the Scots write) is not possible, as our author hath verie well noted; except they mistake the name of Collus for Cailus, with whom the age of Fergus might well meet: the rather, for that in the first yere of Cailus reigne the Picts entered, Fergus immediatly after them, 330 yeres yet Christ was boine; where Collus reigned in the yere after the incarnation 124, about which time befell the second arriuall of the Picts in Britaine. And thus it may be they mistake, by error of the name, Collus for Cailus, and the second arriuall of the Picts for the first. But now to the course of the historie. Whilst the Picts were seated in the north of Britaine, and grew to a great multitude; the Irish made sundrie errands ouer to visit their daughters, nephews, and kinsfolks, and by their often comming and going they were aware of certeine walle corners, and small Islands void of inhabitants, as that which seemed rather neglected and suffered to lie waste.

Whereof they aduertised their princes, namelie Keneth or Keuda, who being descended of Fergus, determined to inuest himselfe in certeine portions of land beside the Picts. He therefore well appointed passed ouer, and partlie by composition, and partlie by force, got possession of those quarters which were desolate, & began to erect a kingdome there, by little and little increasing his limits: and finally got betwixt the Picts and Britons, possessing that countrie which toke the name of him called Keuderdaball, and now Kildesdale (as you would saie) Keudas part; for Dahall in the Scottish tong signifieth a part. In these quarters he could not settle himselfe, but that he was oftentimes assailed by the Britons that bordered next vnto him, and at length his chance was to be slaine, but the kingdome continued still in the hands of his successors: and the Picts and Scots grew in friendship together, permitting each other to liue in quiet.

The Scots nestled themselves in the Isles and coasts alongst the sea side. The Picts held the middle part. But shortly after, the peace began to hang doubtfull betwixt them: for the diuersitie of people, place, custome and language, together with the memorie of old grudges, moued such gelousie and inward hate betwixt those nations, that it seemed they were ready to breake out into open dissention vpon the first occasion. And as in such cases there neuer

The amitie betwixt Scots and Picts.

Their falling out.

The first instruction of Ireland

wanteth one deuise or other to raise tumults: it chanced that certeine of the Scottish nobilitie had got out of Grece (as some write) a Molossian hound, which both in swiftnesse of foot, and pleasantnesse of mouth, was accounted percelle. This hound being flollen by a Pict, was cause of the breach of peace; so that cruell wars thereof ensued, as in the Scottish historie more at large appereth. But where some write, that Eugenius should reigne ouer the Scots when this quarell fell out for stealing of this hound, Hector Boetius saith, it was in king Crathlinth's daies. Morouer it shuld seme by that which the same Boetius writeth, that the hound or grehound for the which this trouble rose, was not fetched so far as out of Grece, but rather bred in Scotland: notwithstanding because the Latinists call such kind of dogs Molossi, for that the first generation of them, or the like, came from a citie of Grece called Molosse; it may be, that some haue thought that this grehound came from thence, for that he was so called after the name of that place from whence the breed of him first came. But to returne to the historie.

After the Scots and Picts had tugged together a while, at length one Carausius a Briton laboured a friendship betwixt them, and bringing his purpose to passe, perswaded them to lend him their helpe to expell the Romans out of Britaine: but his hap was shortlie after to be slaine by the Romane capitaine Alcedus. And so new sturs were in hand betwixt the Britons and Romans, the Scots & Picts for the most part taking part with the Britons, till at length Maximus the Romane lieutenant found means to set the Scots and Picts at variance, and joining with the Picts in league, used their aid against the Scots, whome he so earnestlie pursued with all the power he might make, that in the end they were vtterlie expelled out of all the coasts of Britaine, so that they fled some into one part, some into another, but the most number got them ouer into Ireland, and the Isles, where they remained for the space of fourtie three yeares, and then at length returned thither, vnder the leading of their prince Fergus, being the second of that name, as they account him. From thenceforth the Scots kept such sort in Britaine, that they incroched vpon their neighbors, in such wise as they waxed stronger than the Picts, whome in the end they quite rooted forth, and nestled themselves in their seats, although now at their first returne they concluded a firme amitie with the same Picts, that joining their forces together, they might the better make head against both Romans and Britons, whome they reputed as common enemies to them both.

Thus the Scots a liuelie, cruell, vnquiet, ancient and victorious people, got place within this Ile of Britaine, mixed first with Britons, secondlie with Picts, thirdlie and chiefe with the Irish, which after this time left their name of Scots vnto those in Britaine, and chose rather to be called Irish: and then came by the distinction of the name, as Scotia maior for Ireland, Scotia minor for the countrie inhabited by the Scots within Britaine. But Cambrensis saith, that the Scots chiefe preuailed vnder the leading of sir vallant gentlemen, sons to Muridus king of Ulster, who in the time of Iseale, turnamed the great that inioied the monarchie of Ireland, passing ouer into Scotland to succour their countriemen there, at length took vp for themselves certeine parcels of ground, which their posteritie were owners of in the time that Cambrensis liued, to wit, about the yeare of our Lord 1200, who treateth hereof more largelie in his booke intituled Topographia Britannia. Since which time they haue bene euer taken, reputed and named Scots, the Pictish nation being dzien into corners, albeit the mountaine parts and out Isles, uen vnto this date are inhabited with a wild kind of people called Redshanks, esteemed by some to be mingled of Scots and Picts.

The Scots write, that their king Gregorie the sonne of Dongall, who began his reigne in the yeare of our Lord 875, pretending a title to Ireland, as belonging to him by right of lawfull succession, made a iourneie thither, and within a small time made a conquest of the countrie. This Gregorie lieth buried in one of the out Isles called Iona, or Colme-hill, where they speake naturalie Irish: and therefore some of the Scots would seme to make the conquest of Henrie the second in Ireland, a reuolting from the right inheritors: although they doe confesse they can not tell how they came from the possession of it, otherwise than by forging a tale that they willingly forewent it, as reaping lesse by retaining it, than they laid forth, and so not able to discharge that which was to be defraied about the keeping of it they gaue it ouer, perswading themselves that the kings of England haue gained little or nothing by the hauing of Ireland. And yet in the time whilst sir Henrie Sidneie was gouernour there, when the countie of Ulster was aouched to belong vnto the crowne: it was proued in open parlement, that the reuenues of that earldome, in the daies of Edward the third were reckoned, and found to amount vnto the summe of one and thirtie thousand marks yearelie, the same being but a fift part of Ireland: so that if things were well looked vnto, and such improvement made as might be, Ireland would suffice to beare the necessarie charges, and yeld no small surplusage vnto the princes coffers.

But now as it falleth forth in the historie. We haue thought good here to shew in what sort Ireland came to receiue the christian faith. We find in deed that immediatlie after Christs time, saint James the apostle, & other travelling into these west parts, did first instruct the Irish people, and teach them the glad tidings of the gospell, so that diuerse amongst them euen then were christened, and beleued, but not in such numbers (as may be thought) whereby it should be said, that the countrie was generallie conuerted. Notwithstanding, the Scottish chronicles aouch, that in the daies of their king Finco-marke, who departed this life in the yeare of our redemption three hundred fiftie and eight, Ireland was conuerted to the faith by this meanes.

A woman of the Pictish blood chanced (saie they) to serue in those daies the queene of Ireland, which woman being a christian hir selfe, first instructed hir mistresse in the faith and true points of christianitie; and the queene hir husband, who conuerted the whole Irish nation. Howbeit, by the report of the Irish writers themselves, this should not seme altogether true: for they affirme, that their countrie was rather still esteemed as one of the vnchristened Isles, till about the yeare foure hundred twentie and six, whilst Celestine the first of that name gouerned the see of Rome, who vpon conference had with his cleargie, touching the restoring of the christian faith in the west parts of the world, greatlie decayed there by the heresie of Pelagius, vnderstood that Ireland also by reason of distance from the hart of christendome, and rudenesse of the nation, had receiued little fruit at all of true religion, a thing much to be lamented.

Among other that then were assembled to treat of those matters was one Paladius archdeacon of Rome, who offered his charitable trauell towards the conuersion of anie of those lands whither it shuld please them to appoint him to go. Celestine knowing the sufficiency of the man consecrated him bishop, authorized his iourneie by letters vnder his scale, furnished his wants, and associating to him such religious persons and others as were thought necessarie to assist him, deliuered to him the bible with great solemnitie, & other monuments in furtherance of his good speed. At length he landed in the north of Ireland, from whence he escaped right hardlie with his life into the Isles adjoining, where he preached the gospell, and converted no small number of Scots to the christian beliefe, and purged that part that was christened from the infection of the Pelagians, as in the Scottish historie more at large appereth. He was required by the Scots that inhabited here in Britaine, to leaue the Isles and come ouer into them, there to instruct the people in the waie of true saluation, to the which with the popes licence he seemed willing enough: and the bishop of Rome the more readilie condescended thereto: for that in the instant time, when Paladius was to depart, one Patrike attended at Rome, suing for licence to be sent into Ireland.

The pope therefore granted that Paladius might passe ouer to the Scots in Britaine, and appointed Patrike to go with authoritie from him into Ireland; where, vpon his arriuall he found the people so well bent to heare his admonitions, contrarie to their accustomed stouardnesse, that a man would haue thought that had seene their readines, how that the land had bene reserved for him to conuert. And because it pleased God to bestow such an vniuersall benefit to this land by his meanes, we haue thought god in following our author herein, to touch some part of the course of his life. This Patrike in Latine called Patricius, was borne in the marches betwixt England and Scotland, in a towne by the sea side called Ciburne, whose father hight Calphurnius, a deacon and sonne to a priest: his mother named Conches, was sister to saint Martine that famous bishop of Towers in France.

Patrike of a child was brought vp in learning, and well instructed in the faith, and much giuen to deuotion. The Irishmen in those daies assisted with Scots and Picts were become archpirats, soze disquieting the seas about the coasts of Britaine, and vsed to sacke little small villages that late scattered along the shoze, and would often lead awaie captiue the inhabitants home into their countrie. And as it chanced, Patrike being a lad of sixteen peares old, and a scholer then in secular learning, was taken among other, and became slave to an Irish lord called Machuaine, from whome after six peares terme he redeemed himself with a peece of gold which he found in a clod of earth, that the swine had newlie turned vp as he followed them in that time of his captiuitie, being appointed by his maister to keepe them. And as affliction commonlie maketh men religious, the regard of his former education printed in him such remorse and humilitie, that being thenceforth wearied from the world, he betooke himselfe to contemplation, euer lamenting the lacke of grace and truth in that land: and herewith not despairing, but that in continuance some god might be wrought vpon them, he learned their tongue perfectlie. And alluring one of that nation to heare him companie for exercise sake, he departed from thence, and got him into France, euer hauing in his mind a desire to see the conuersion of the Irish people, whose babes yet unborn seemed to him in his dreames (scam out of their mothers wombs) to call for christendome.

In this purpose he sought out his uncle Martine, by whose means he was placed with Germanus the bishop of Auerre, continuing with him as scholer or disciple for the space of forty peares: all which time he bestowed in like studie of the holie scriptures, psalmes, and such godlie exercises. When at the age of threescore and two peares, being renowned through the Latine church for his wisdom, vertue and skill, he came to Rome, bringing letters with him in his commendation from the French bishops vnto pope Celestine, to whom he vttered his full mind and secret vot, which long since he had conceiued touching Ireland. Celestine inuested him archbishop and primate of the whole Island, set him forward with all fauour he could deuise, and brought him and his disciples onward to their countrie.

In the three and twentieth yeare therefore of the emperor Theodosius the younger, being the yeare of our Lord 430, Patrike landed in Ireland, & because he spake the tongue perfectlie, and withall being a reuerend personage in the eyes of all men, manie listened and gaue god care to his preaching, the rather for that (as writers haue recorded) he confirmed his doctrine with diuerse miracles: but speciallie those regarded his words before all others, that had some taste of the christian faith aforehand, either by the coming into those partes of Paladius, and his disciple one Albion an Irish bishop, or otherwise by some other: for it is to be thought, that continuallie there remained some sparke of knowledge of christianitie euer since the first preaching of the gospell (which was shortly after the ascension of our saviour) by saint James (as before is mentioned.) In continuance of time Patrike wane the better part of that kingdome to the faith.

Laugerius sonne of Deale the great monarch, although he receiued not the gospell himselfe, yet permitted all that would to embrace it. But sith he refused to be baptised, & applie to his doctrine; the bishop denounced against him a curse from God accordinglie, but tempered yet with mercie and iudgement, as thus: What during his life he should be victorious, but after him neither the kingdome should stand, nor his lineage inherit. From thence he toke his waie vnto Connell lord of Connagh, who honourablie receiued him, and was conuerted with all his people; and after sent him vnto his brother Logan king of Leinster, whome he likewise conuerted. In pounster he found great friendship and fauour by means of an earle there, called the earle of Daris, who honoured him highlie, and gaue him a dwelling place in the east angle of Armagh called Sozta, where he erected manie celles and monasteries, both for religious men and women. He travelled thirtie peares in preaching through the land, planting in places conuenient bishops and priests, whose learning and vertuous conuersation by the speciall grace and fauor of God, established the faith in that rude nation. Other thirtie years he spent in his prouince of Armagh among his brethren, placed in those houses of religion, which by his meanes were founded, and so he liued in the whole about one hundred twentie two peares, and lieth buried in Downe.

Of saint Patrikes purgatorie ye shall find in the description of the countrie, and therefore we doe here omit it. But yet because we are entered to speake of the first foundation of churches and religious houses here in Ireland, in following our author in that behalfe: we will speake somewhat of such other holie men and women as are renowned to haue liued in Ireland, as ornaments to that Ile, more glorious than all the triumphs & victories of the world, if their zeale had bene seasoned with true knowledge of the scriptures: as it maie well be that in some of them it was, howsoeuer mistaken by the iudgement and report of the simple, which hath raised not onlie of these persons, but also of the vertie apostles themselves, certeine fantasticall tales, which with the learned are out of all credit. But this matter I will leaue to diuines to discusse, trusting that the reader will Giral. Camb.

Giraldus Cambrensis telleth, that in saint Patrike time flourisheth saint Bide the virgine, and saint Colme, which two, with the same Patrike, were buried in Dolone (as in the Scottish historie ye maie find) and (as the same Giraldus saith) their three bodies were found there hozilie after the conquest. Sir John Contweie being president of Ulster, in viewing the sepulture, testified to haue seene three principall towels, which were then translated, as honourable monuments worthy to be preferred. Of saint Colme it is doubted in what age he liued. Bideget, otherwise called Bide, was base daughter to one Dubtactus, a capteine in Leinster, who perceiving the mother with child, sold hir secretlie (fearing the gealousie of his wife) to an Irish Deet, reseruing to himselfe the fruit of hir wombe. She was there deliuered of this Bideget, whome the Deet trained bp in learning, and vertuous education, and at length brought hir home to hir father.

Deet, that is, Magus in Latine, or (as we may say) a magician or sorcerer in English, An. Dom. 439.

The king of Leinster.

The damsell also was instructed in the faith by saint Patrike, that preached then in those quarters, whereupon she became so religious and ripe in iudgement, that not onlie the multitude of people, but also a whole synod of bishops assembled nere to Dublin to heare hir aduise in weightie causes, such estimation they had of hir. One fact of hir being yet a child, made hir famous. The king of Leinster had giuen to hir father Dubtactus as a token of his good liking towards him for his valiant seruice, a rich sword, the furniture whereof was garnished with manie costlie iewels. And as it chanced, the damsell visiting the sicke neighbours dinnerlie distressed for want of necessarie reliefe (hir father being a sterne man, and his ladie a cruell she-w) she could deuise no other shift to helpe to releue the want of those poore and needie people, but to impart the same iewels of that idle sword among them. This matter was heinouslie taken, and being brought to the kings eares, it chanced that hozilie after he came to a banquet in hir fathers house, and calling the maid asote him that was not yet past nine yerres of age, he asked hir how she durst presume to deface the gift of a king in such wise as she had don this? She answered that the same was bestowed vpon a better king than he was, whom (quoth she) finding in such extremitie, I would haue giuen all that my father hath, and all that you haue, yea your selues too, all, were ye in my power to giue, rather than Christ should starue. She professed virginittie, and allured other noble yong damselfs vnto hir fellowship, with whome she continued in hir owne monastrie, where she was first professed, untill the yeare of our Lord 500, and then departing this life, she was buried in Dolone in saint Patrikes towne.

A concordance of the four euangelists.

Conanus first an of war, and after a bishop. Abbat Brendan.

Giraldus Cambrensis reporteth of his owne knowledge, that among other monuments of hirs, there was found a concordance of the four euangelists, seeming to be written with no mortal hand, beautified with myrrour pictures in the margin, the colours and cunning workmanship whereof at the first blush appeared darke and nothing delectable, but in the heedfull view of the diligent beholder vertie liue and wonderfull artificiall. Conanus that was first a souldier, succeeded saint Patrike in the see of Armagh, after he had certeine yerres followed the warres. Brendan abbat at the age of ten yerres was of such incomparable holinesse (as they saie) and therewith so wise and learned, that his father and mother, thinking themselves to haue gained the most worthy fruit that might inue of their marriage, by mutuall consent professed continencie, and abandoned matrimoniall companie. He flourished in the daies of saint Bideget, and liued in familiar societie with saint Arons the bishop, and Fintan the abbat.

Hadoc abbas Conan of noble parentage taken prisoner by the king of Temore, and kept in his court with diuerse yong men his scholefellows, openlie adured the king to licence him and them to depart, that they might serue God as they were accustomed, the which being now kept in sunder and restrained of libertie, they were forced to discontinue. Whereupon immediatlie they were dismissed. He died bishop of Fernes, and laid the foundation of that burrow. His successor Melingus, although he was bishop, gaue himselfe yet to voluntarie labour, and with his owne hands desiered and brought a running spring to his monastrie, induring that trouble daily after praier and studie for the space of eight yerres together.

Fintan abbat was had in such reuerence, that whereas Colme king of Leinster kept Conmake the kings son of Tensill prisoner, he went boldlie with twelue of his disciples through the pzease of all the souldiers, and in sight of the king was suffered to baptize the yong prince. For the Irish are not sterne against those of whom they haue conceived an opinion of holinesse. I remember (saith our author) that Cambrensis writeth himselfe merillie to haue objected to Porice then archbishop of Cashill, that Irel and in so manie hundred yerres had not brought forth one martyr. The bishop answered pleasantlie (alluding to the late dispatching of Thomas archbishop of Canturburie) Our people (quoth he) notwithstanding their other enozmities, yet haue spared euery the blood of vertuous men. Marie now we are delinered to such a nation that is well acquainted with making martyrs, so that from henceforth I trust no complaint shall need for want of martyrs. Palachias was borne in Armagh of a noble progenie, brought bp in vertue by the example of his mother, and trained forth in learning, professed greatlie in deuotion: so that being yet but a verie babe, he was espied diuerse times to steale awate from his companions to praie in secret. He was so graue and modest, that of himselfe he chose the most graue and seuer scholemaister, refusing an excellent cleerke, because he saw him somewhat lightlie demeaning himselfe at game. In the beginning of his youtie full yerres, he became the disciple of Imarius an old recluse, whose auerittie of conuersation the whole towne had in great reuerence. Where he became a deacon, and at five and twentie yerres a priest.

The archbishop, for the same and the opinion of his worthinesse, receiued him to be assistant to him in office, in the which he so behaued himselfe, that he reformed superstitions, and reuined the force of religion, namelie in the vniuersitie of their church seruice, wherein before time they tarred. The famous monastrie of Banchor he reedified of the patrimonie and legacies by his vnckle left him. The same monastrie was of old time gouerned by Congellus, and after him by Colimbannus the father of manie religious houses in France. This abbey being spoiled and nintie of his brethren murdered in one day by the prior, the possessions whereof being come to the hands of Palachias by his vnckles assignement, he restored forthwith, and advanced the foundation. At the age of thirtie yerres he was by canonicall election forced to accept the bishopricke of Conereth, a people of all the Irish then most savage and wild, whome with inestimable trauell he reclaimed from their beastlie maners. In the meane while died Celstis bishop of Armagh, after whome succeed ded Galachias at the age of eight and thirte peares. But before this, nere hand the space of two hundred peares together, a custome had crept into the countrie, that the metropolitane see was conferred vpon such bishops as were married, and were of the blood royal, in manner by way of inheritance. Wherefore Sigellus or Peale the next of kindred, animated by the parcialitie of some princes, and getting into his custodie the bible and staffe, and other monuments of saint Patrike, whereunto opinion of the common people tied the prelacie, came to his palace with a band of souldiours to haue slaine the bishop. When all the people wept and howled for his perill, he alone stepped into the bosome of his enemies, demanding what was their purpose? The bloudie souldiours letting fall their weapons, in stead of executing the pretended murder, fell to reuerence him, and at length departed from him as friends.

Thise peares he sat in the primasie rather to discontinue the horrible corruption before used, than with intent to settle himselfe there. After he had removed the abuse, he procured Blasius to succeed him in the archbishops see, and he returned to his former see of Downe, to the which as then was annexed the bishopricke of Coner. But Galachias vnderstanding that in times past they were six seuerall sees, he diuided them againe, and ordeined an other to the bishopricke of Coner, desirous rather to lessen his cure than to enlarge the fruits by taking more charge vpon him. Galachias being demanded of his brethren the monkes of Benchor, where and when he would wish to die and to be buried, if it late in his choice? He answered: If in Ireland, beside the bodie of saint Patrike: if beyond the seas, at Clareuale where saint Barnard was then resident, and in the feast of Allsoules. He purposed within few daies to sue to pope Eugenius for increase of the number of metropolitans, which request was shortly after accomplished. And in this viage which he thus made, he staid at Clareuale, and there diuerse times openlie foreshewed, that the yeare of his departure forth of this world was come; and accordingly when he had taken leaue of saint Barnard and the brethren, he went downe from his chamber to the church and there did communicat. Which done, he returned to his lodging, and there on Allsoules daie in the yeare of his age 54 he gaue vp the ghost, so mildly and quietlie, that it seemed rather a sleepe than a death.

Galchus, though borne in Ireland, yet he spent the most part of his time in the monastrie of Winchester in England, and from thence was taken and admitted bishop of Lismore. Saint Barnard remembreth of him, by occasion he cited a lunatique child in confirming, else (as they termed it) in bishopping him. This miracle scene and confessed by manie hundreds of people, was blowne through the world. The same time happened discorde betwixt the king of Mounster and his brother, and as the matter was handled, the king was overmatched and fled into England, where he visited Galchus in his abbeie, and would by no meanes depart from him; but remained there vnder his rule and government, so long as it pleased God to denie him quiet returne into his countrie: he contented himselfe with a poore cell, used bathie to bath himselfe in cold water, to allwaie the wanton motions of his flesh, and for his diet receiued none other delicats than bread, water, and salt, day and night, sobbing and bewailing with great remorse of conscience his former incontinent life. At length the other kings and people of Ireland began to repine at the usurper, set vpon him with open war, vanquished him in a pitch field, and called home the rightfull prince his brother again, to resume his kingdome, who with manie earnest persuasions of Galchus and of Galachias could vneth be brought to forsake that trade of life and companie, the which he had with such delectation inured himselfe vnto.

Thus far of the Irish saints. Of the which, as some of them are to be esteemed right vertuous and godlie men, so other of them are to be suspected as persons rather holie by the superstitious opinion of the people, than indued with anie such knowledge of true godlinesse and sincere religion, as are worthy to be registred in the number of those that of right ought to passe for saints, as by certeine late writers may appeare. But this we leaue to the iudgement of the aduised reader, for that in such matters we mind not to preiudice anie mans opinion, but onelie with the reader to take heed how he giueth credit to that which oftentimes is found written by authors touching feigned miracles, and other vaine superstitious dealings, wherethrough manie zealous persons haue often bene deceived. Now therefore to leaue saints, and returne to other matters touching the Irish historie. In the yeare 586: the Norwegians had got dominion ouer the Islands in the north-west ocean called the Isles of Orkneye, and scowred the seas, that none other nation durst vneth appeare in sight for dread of them. A people giuen greatlie to seeke the conquests of other realmes, as they that could not faile to find more warme and fruitful places for to inhabit than their owne. These hot fellows chanced to light into Ireland by this meanes. Careticus the king of Britaine ran into such hatred of his people, that they raised warres against him. The Saxons that possessed now six seuerall kingdomes in the Ile of Britaine, reioiced not a litle at this ciuill discorde betwixt the Britaine king and his subiects.

Wherevpon meaning to make a full conquest of the Britains, & utterly to expell them forth of all the Ile, he assembled their powers, & ioined to the same Curmundus, a notable rouer of the Norwegians, who hauing at all times a naule in a readinesse, and men to furnish it, holpe the Saxons to chase the Britains into the marches of Wales. For from thence (being retired into the mountains and woods) they could not drue them. This Curmundus (as some thinke) builded at the same time the towne of Curmondchester, and after being assisted by the Saxons, made a viage into Ireland, where he sped not greatlie to his desire, and therefore the Irish account not this for anie of their conquests, as some of their antiquaries informed our author. Curmundus therefore finding but forie successe, built a few slight castles and forts in the frontiers, and so left the land, and sailed from thence into France, where at length he was slaine. Our chronicles in deed name him king of Ireland; but the Irish affirme that before Turgesius, there was none of the easterne people that obtained dominion in their countrie.

Giraldus Cambrensis to make the matter whole (a Gods name) thinketh Turgesius to haue conquered the land, as lieutenant or deputie vnder Curmundus. But this being granted, there ariseth a more manifest contradiction than the former: for he himselfe numb'reth betwixt Laogtrius king of Ireland that liued in the yeare foure hundred and thirte, and Columding, whome Turgesius vanquished, 33 monarchs, whose reigns comprehended foure hundred peares, so that Turgesius liued in the yeare after the incarnation eight hundred and thirte. When it is so plaine that he could not haue anie doings with Curmundus, who ioined with the Saxons against Careticus, in the yeare six hundred foure score and six. This knot (saith our author) might be untwisted butted more facilitie thus. Curmundus made much of that little he got, and wrote himselfe king, which title our histories doe allow him, because he made the wale plaine, intred it a while, and set open the gate vnto his countreymen. Turgesius atchieued the whole exploit, and brought it to perfection, and in these respects either of them may be called king and conqueror of Ireland.

Turgesius therefore with his Norwegians the second time inuaded Ireland, sustained diuerse losses and overthrowes: but in the end fortifying himselfe by the sea coasts, & receluting thereby his friends at his pleasure, waxed so strong that he subdued the whole Ile, still erecting castles and fortresses as he wan ground, so to maister the Irish that with such manner of strengthe of wals and rampires had not as yet bene acquainted: for till those daies they knew no defense but woods, bogs, or strokes. Turgesius so subdued the Irish kings, and kept them in awe, that without interruption he reigned like a conqueror thirte yeres. He cried hauocke & spoile where anie rich preie was to be had, sparing neither those of the laitie nor of the clergie, neither church nor chapell, abusing his victorie verie insolentlie. Malaghlil king of Metch was in some trust with the tyrant. His onelie daughter Turgesius craved for his concubine. The father hauing a readie wit, and watching his time, began to breake with Turgesius in this wise: Hauing your fanse my lord (quoth he) there are diuerse ladies of bloud in this countrie meete befallowes for a king than that browne gristle: and therewith he began to reckon vp a number of his neeces and cousines, indowd (as he set them forth) with such singular beautie, as they seemed rather angels than mortall creatures. The tyrant as it were rauished, and doting in loue of those perelous pieces befoze he saw them, by reason of such exceedingly praises as he thus heard of them, doubted yet least Malaghlil extolled them to preterue his daughter out of his hands: and the subtil father clocked his wit with modest behauior, lingering time to inflame the leachers follie, as he that witheld anie thing more to be suspected, than that which he meant most earnestlie to bring to passe.

At length, when Turgesius seemed to take his dealing thus of time somewhat displeasentlie, he vsed this or the like speech: If I should saie (quoth he) that I gaue you my sole daughter with goodwill to be deuoured, your high wisdom would some ghesse that I did but flatter you; and yet if ten daughters were deerer to me than your good pleasure and contentation, by whose bountifull goodnes both she, & I, and we all are supported, I were unworthie that secret and nere friendship wherein it liketh you to vse me. As for the twench, it will be in part honorable for hir to be requited to the bed of such a prince, sith queenes haue not sticked to come from farre, and yeld the vse of their bodies to noble conquerors, in hope by them to haue issue. And howsoeuer it be taken, time will weare it out, and redeme it; but such a friend as you are to me and mine, neither I nor mine shall liue to see. And verelie I meane not to hazard your displeasure, if it were for a greater matter than the value of twentie maidenheads; seeing fathers haue not sticked to giue vp their owne wiues to quench the lusts of their sons. Therefore am I thus agreed, name the daie and place, separat your selfe from the view of your court, conferre with those that haue a deintie insight, & skillfull eyes in discerning beauties; I will send you my daughter, & with hir the choise of twelue or sixtene gentlewomen, the meanest of the which may be an emperesse in comparison. When they are before you, make your game as you like, and then if my child please your fantastic bitt, she is not to good to be at your commandement: onelie my request is, that if anie other shall presume vpon your leanings, your maiestie will remember whose child she is.

This liberall proffer was of Turgesius accepted (whose desire was most insatiable) with manie good words, thanks, & faire promises. To be short, the same daie Malaghlil put his daughter in prince-like apparell, attired after the trimmest wise, and with hir sixtene proper yong men beautifull and amiable to behold: and so being sent to the king were presented vnto him in his priue chamber, hauing none about him but a few dissolute youthfull persons; wherupon those disguised yong striplings drew forth from vnder their long womanish garments their sheins, and valiantlie bestirring themselves, first stabbed their weapons points through the bodie of the tyrant, and then serued all those youths that were about him with the like saluoe, they making small or no resistance at all. The byrte of this murder was quicklie blowne abroad through all Ireland: and the princes readie to catch hold on such advantage, rose in armes with one assent, in purpose to deliuer themselves from bondage, and recover libertie.

All Metch and Leinster were speedilie got together, resorting vnto Malaghlil the author of this practise, who lightlie leapt to horse, and commending their forward redinesse in so naturall a quarell, said: My lords and friends, this case neither admitteth delay, nor requireth policie; hart and hast is all in all. Whilist the matter is fresh and greene, and that some of our enemies lie still and sleepe, some lament, some curse, some are togither in counsell, and all the whole number dismaied: let vs present their furie, dismember their force, cut off their sight, seise vpon their places of refuge and succour. It is no victorie to plucke their feathers, but to breake their necks; not to chase them in, but to rotte them out; to weed them, not to rake them; not to tread them downe, but to rot them vp. This lesson the tyrant himselfe did teach me. I once demanded of him as it were in a parable, by what good husbandrie the land might be rid of certaine rauening foules that annoied it. He aduised vs to watch where they bred, and to fire their nests about their eares. So we then vpon these conuizants which shewd themselves in our possessions, and let vs so destruye them, that neither nest nor roost, neither seed nor stalke, neither branch nor stumpe shall remaine of this inuagations generation. Scarce had he ended his tale, but that with great shoutes and clamours they extolled the king, as defender of their liues and liberties; assuring them both of their hold and hardie stomachs and speedfull expedition loosened with their confederats, and with a running campe swept euerie corner of the land, rased the castles to the ground, chased awaie the strangers, slue all that abode baffell, ech man recovering his owne, with the state of gouernment.

Thus in effect haue the Irish writers reported of Turgesius a Norwegian, whether he did reigne befoze the supposed time of Curmund, or whether that he came thither as lieutenant to him: which if it shuld be true, no doubt the same Curmund was some king of the Danes, or Norwegians, and not of the Africans (as some of our countreymen name him.) Which error is some committed, in taking one heathenish nation for another, as those men haue done that haue named the Hungarians (when they did inuade Gallia befoze they were christians) Saracens. And so likewise might that author (whosoener he was) whome Geffrie of Monmouth followeth, finding Curmund written to be a king of the miscrants, mistake the Norwegians for Africans, because both those nations were infidels: and therefore sith happilie the Affricans in the daies when that author liued, bare all the hute aboue other heathenish nations then, as the Turks do now, he named them Affricans. Whosoeuer it was, certeine it is that the Danes or Norwegians made fundrie inuasions into Ireland, and that at severall times. But for Turgesius, whether he were an absolute king, or but a lieutenant of some armie, vnder some other king named Gurmound, or peradventure Gormo, (as such names are soon corrupted) I cannot affirme, because that no certeine time is set downe in the chronicles which are writtten of those nations, whereby they may be so reconciled togither, as sufficeth to warrant anie likelie conecture in this behalfe.

But if I should saie (with the readers licence) what I thinke, this Gurmound whatsoeuer he was, made no such conquest of Ireland, nor of this our Ile of Britaine (as by some writers is supposed) but yet might he peradventure land in Wales, and either in fauor of the Saxons then enemies to the Britons, or in hatred of the chrisstian name persecute by cruell wars the British nation, and vse such crueltie as the heathenish nations then were accustomed to practise against the chrisstians in all places where they came, and chanced to haue the vpper hand. The chiefest cause that moueth me to doubt thereof, is for that I find not in anie of our approued ancient English writers, as Beda, Malmesburie, Huntingdon, Houe-den, or such like, anie plaine mention made of him; whereby I may be thoroughlie induced to credit that which I find in Geffrie Monmouth and others recoded of him, except his name be misfaken, and so thereby some error crept in, which I am not able to resolue.

But sith we are entred to speake thus farre of the Norwegians, here by the waie I haue thought it not impertinent to the purpose of this Irish histo-rie, to write what we find recorded in the chronicles of those northerne regions, Denmarke, Norweie, and Sweden, writtten by Saxo Grammaticus, Albertus Crantz, and others, concerning the fundrie inuasions made by the Danes, Norwegians, or Normans (whether we list to call them) into Ireland.
Fridele or Frideleus king of Denmarke that succeeded Dan the third of that name, surnamed the Swift, arraiuing in Ireland, besieged the citie of Dublin, & perceiuing by the strength of the walles, that it would be an hard matter to win it by plaine force of hand without some cunning policie, he deuised to catch a sort of swallows that had made their nests in the houses within the towne, tied wild fier to their wings, and therewith cast them vp, and sufered them to flie their waies, whereupon they com-ming to their nests, set the houses on fier, which whiles the citizens went about to quench, the Danes entred the citie and wan it.

Secondlie, Frotho king of Denmarke, the third of that name, after he had subdued the Britons here in this Ile, made a voiage into Ireland also, where he landed with some danger: for the Irishmen had strawed all alongest the shore a great number of caltrops of iron, with sharpe prickes standing vp, to wound the Danes in the feet, as they should come forth of their ships to follow them, for they meant to slee of a pretended policie for that purpose. But Fro-tho perceiuing their deceitfull craft, followed them more aduisedlie than rashlie, and so put their captaine named Heruill to fight, and slue him in the field; whose brother remaining in life, & mistrusting his owne puillance, yielded himselfe to Frotho, who diuiding the preie amongst his souldiers and men of warre, shewed thereby that he onelie sought for glorie and not for gaine, reseruing not a pennie of all the spoile to his owne vse. After this, in the daies of king Frotho the fourth of that name, which reigned ouer the Danes, one Starcater a giant, in compa-nie of Haco a Danish capteine, made a tourne like wise into Ireland, where in the same season, one Huglet reigned as monarch ouer that Ile: who hauing plentie of treasure, was yet so giuen to coue-tousnesse, that by such vnprincipellie parts as he plaib, to satisfie his greedie desire to fill his coffers, he became right odious, and farre out of all fauor with his subiects. Yet there were of his nobles, verie valiant and worthie men, namelie two, Gegathus, & Sulbdauus: whereupon, when it came to passe that he should soine in battell with his enemies the Danes, the most part of all his people fled out of the field, so that Gegath and Sulbdaue were in maner left alone. For they regarding their honoz and dutie that appertained to men of their calling, would not flie, but manfullie did what laie in their powers to beat backe the enemies, insomuch that Gegathus raught Haco such a wound, that the vpper part of his liver appeared bare. He also wounded Starcater in the head right sore, so that in all his life daies, he had not before that time receiued the like hurt: in the end yet Huglet the monarch of Ireland was slaine, and Starcater obtaining the victorie, did make great slaughter of the Irish subiects, the which had followed their king to this battell, being men (thorough his corrupt example and slothfull trade of life) degene-rat from all warlike order and vse of manlike exercise.

After this, the Danes went vnto Dublin, which towne they easilie toke, and found such store of riches and treasure therein, that euerie man had so much as he could wish or desire; so as they needed not to fall out among themselves for the partition, sith there was so much for each mans share as he could conuenientlie carrie awaie. Thus hath Saxo Gram-maticus writtten in effect of Starcaters comming into Ireland: of whome the Danish writers make such mention, both for his huge stature and great manhood. Some haue thought, that Starcater was the verie same man which the Scots name Finmacole, of whome in the Scottish historie we haue made mention: but whereas the Scottish writers affirme that he was a Scottish man bozne in Castland, among the people called Ossones. Reignirus the sonne of Silwardus the second king of Denmarke, hauing achieued fundrie victozies in England and Scotland, and subdued the Isles of Orkney, he passed likewise into Ireland, slue Helbricke king of that land, and toke the citie of Dublin by siege, where he remained the whole tearme of twelue moneths before he departed from thence.

After this, Gormo the third of that name king of Denmarke, although an infidell himselfe, and a cruell persecutor of the chrisstian religion, yet toke to wife a chrisstian ladie named Thira, daughter to C-thelzed king of England, who had issue by him two sonnes Inaught, or Canute, and Harold, prouing men of high ballancie and notable prowesse, insomuch that after the atchieuing of diuerse worthie victozies against the enemies neare home, they made a voiage into England, not sparing to inuade the dominions of their grandfather king Cthelzed: who rather reioissing, than seeming to be offended with those manlike enterprizes of his cousins, proclaimed them his heires to succeed after him in all his lands and dominions, although of right the same were to descend first vnto their mother Thira. The yong men being incouraged with their grandfather his bountifull magnificence, attempted the inuasion of Ireland, where at the siege of Dublin, Canute or Wrought the elder brother was shot into the bodie with an arrow, and died of the wound: howbeit his death was kept close by his owne commandement given befoze he died, till his people had got the citie into their possession. But the gaine was small in respect of the losse, which was thought to rebound vnto the whole Danish nation by the death of that noble young gentleman Canute, who for his high prowesse and valiance was most tenderlie beloued of all men; but namelie of his father king Gormo, insomuch that he swore to kill him with his owne hands, whosoever should first tell him newes of his death. This Gormo was now a man far stricken in age, and blind; hauing small soie of anie worlde pleasures, otherwile than to heare of the welfare and prosperous proceedings of his sonnes. When therefore his wife queene Thira had perfect aduertisement of his sonnes death, and that neither she nor anie other durst breake the matter vnto his husband, she deuised a shift how to signifie that vnto him by outward signes, which by word of mouth she was afraid to expresse, as thus. She caused morning apparell to be made for his husband, & putting off his roiall robes, clad him therewith, and other things appertaining to moyners she also put about him, and prepared all such furniture and necessaries as were used for funerall exequies, witnessing the lamentable grieve conceiued for the losse of some friend, with that kind of morning weed and funerall ceremonies. Which when Gormo perceiued: Who is me (saith he) you then signifie the death of my sonne Canute. Where- to she made answer, that he and not she did discouer the truth of that which was meant by those morning garments; and with that speech ministred cause of his husbands death, whereby she became presentlie a widow, not openlie moyning for his sonne, befoze she moyned likewise for his husband: for he took such grieve for Canutes death, that immediatlie he died thorough sorow and dolor: so as Thira was thus dauen to lament, as well the death of his sonne, as of his husband both at once. But now to the purpose of the Irish historie.

We haue thus partlie heard what the Danish writers do record in their histories, touching the conquests which their people made in Ireland; but whether the same be meant of that which goeth befoze, or rather of that which followeth, touching the trade which the Norwegians merchants used thither; or whether the Irish writers haue passed these iournies ouer with silence, which the Danish writers in forme (as befoze is toucht) do make mention of, I cannot affirme. But like it is that as the Danes, or Norwegians, whether you will call them, did inuade Ireland as well as England, France, and Scotland, in those daies according to the report of their writers, and that by waie of open warre as well to conquer the countrie, as to take preies, prisoners, and booties, and not for trade of merchandize onelie: albeit that they might peraduenture so get entrie at the first, as by the Irish histories it should seeme they did shortly after the slaughter of Turgesius. And afterwards when they saw themselves settled, and perceiued that they began to grow to be enuied of their Irish neighbours, who thereupon would not sticke to molest them as occasions serued, they saw no better meane to assure themselves against their aduersaries, than to send vnto their countrymen, which in those daies roured abroad (as befoze I haue said) in euerie quarter of this our west ocean, waiting for oportunitie to aduance their conquests in each countrie where anie thing might be gotten. And so this mate agre vnto well with the Irish writers, whom as I do not take vpon me to controll, but rather to report the storie as I find it by them written, I will proceed with the order which they follow. After the countrie was deliuered of the tyrannie wherewith it was oppressed by the same Turgesius & his people, Danes or Norwegians whether they were (for so Cambrensis esteemeth them) the Irish deliuered of seruile bondage, fell to their old wonted habit, in persecuting each other: and hauing latelie defaced their fortified towne and castles, as receptacles and couerts for the enimie, all sides laie more open to receiue harme.

This being perceiued and thoroughlie considered, the princes that in the late rule of Turgesius had espied some towardnesse to wealth & ease, fell in hand to discourse the madnesse & follie of their ancestors, which saw not the vse of that which their enimies abused: they began to loze their vniuersal trade of life, to with either lesse discord, or more strength in each mans dominion; to cast the danger of naked countries, readie to call in the enimies, as the strength of forts & castles was a meane to preserve them from losse. If aine would they haue provided remedie in this case, if they had knowne how. The former suggestion, though it seemed intollerable, yet they felt therein proceeding steps towards peace. The gaine that rose of merchandize, rest and suertie to the whole estate of the countrie. For the difference was great betwixt the inuaders of the two nations, Norwegians and Irish. The first knew the waie to thriue, might they get some commodious seats and soile. The other had commodities plentie, and cared not for them.

While the princes and potentats staied vpon such a good consideration, certein merchants of Norwate, Denmarke, and of other those parties, called Ostmanni, or (as in our vulgar language we learne them) Gasterlings, because they lie East in respect of vs, although indeed they are by other named properlie Norrmans, and partlie Saxons, obtained licence safelie to arrive here in Ireland with their wares, and to bitter the same. Hereupon the Irish, thorough traffike & bartering with these Norrmans or Danes (for so they are called also in our English chronicle) by exchanging of wares and monie, finding them ciuill and tractable, and delisting also with gaine conceits, brought into them by those merchants (such as till they saw them they neuer esteemed needfull) they began to enter into a desire that a trade might be open betwixt them & the other nations, whereupon to allure other, they licenced these merchant strangers to build (if they thought good) haue towne in places most commodious. This was no sooner granted, than begun, and with speed finished.

Amilanus founded Waterford; Sutaricus, Limerike; Quorus, Dublin; and so by others diuers other towne were built as leisure serued. When by the helpe and counsell of these men, manie castles, forts, temples, and churches, euerie where were repaired. And thus are the Irish mingled also with the blood of the Danes, Norwegians, or Norrmans, who from thenceforth continually stocked into Ireland, to the great commoditie of the inhabitants, lining amongst them obedientlie, till wealth pricked and moued them to raise rebellion: but they could not haue holden out, had not the conquest insuing determined both their quarrels. In the meane while they became lords of the hauens and burrow towne, planted men of warre in the same, and oftentimes skirmished with their aduersaries; but yet measured their fortune with indifferent gaires, and crept no higher than the same would giue them leaue. Whelie a memorie is left of their field in Clontars, where diuerse of the Irish nobilitie were slaine, that lie buried befoze the crosse of Kilmastinam. These are by our authoz, not without good iudgement, reported to be Danes, Danes, which people then being pagans, sore afflicted England, and after that France, from whence they came againe into England with William Conqueror. So that those people called Ostomanni, Csterlings, Normans, Danes, Swedes, Bozwegians, & Suedeners, are in effect all one nation, borne in that huge region called Scandinavia; and as it appeareth by conference of times and chronicles, much about one season, vered the Frenchmen, afflicted Scotland, subdued England, and multiplied in Ireland. But in the yeare of Christ 1095, perceiving great enuie to remaine and lurke in the distinction of the names Casterlings and Irish, that were altogether westerne; and the Casterlings not easterne indeed, but rather simple northerne: in consideration thereof, and because they magnified themselves in the late conquest of their countreymen, who from Normandie comming over into England ruled there at their pleasure, these strangers in Ireland would algate now be also called and accounted Normans.

Long before this time (as ye have heard) Ireland was befolwed into two principall kingdomes, and sometime into more, whereof one was ever elected and reputed to be chiefe, and as it were a monarch, whome in their histories they name Maximum regem, that is, the greatest king, or else without addition, Regem Hibernie, the king of Ireland: the other they name Reguli or Reges, that is to wit, small kings or else kings, by limiting the places whereof they were to be reputed kings, as of Leinster, Connagh, Ulster, Mounster, or Weth. To the monarch, besides his allowance of dominion, titles of honor, and other pri-uileges in iurisdiction, there was granted to him a negatiue in nomination of bishops, when they were vacant: for the cleargie and laetic of the diocesse commended one, whom they thought conuenient vnto the king, the king to the monarch, the monarch to the archbishop of Canturburie: for that as yet the metropolitans of Ireland had not receiued their palles.

In this sort was nominated to the bishopricke of Dublin then void, in the yeare of Christ 1074, at the petition of Godertius king of Leinster, by suffrage of the cleargie and people there, with the assent of Terdenatus the monarch, a learned prelat called Patricius, whome Lanfranke of Canturburie consecrated in Pauls church at London, and swore him to obedience after the manner of his ancestors. Christian bishop of Lismore, legat to Eugenius the third, summoned a prouinciall councell in Ireland, wherein were authorized foure metropolitans, Armagh, Dublin, Cathill, and Tuene; of the which places were bishops at that present, Celastus, Gregorius, Donatus, Edonius. For hitherto though they yielded a primacie to the bishop of Armagh in reuerence of saint Patrike the first bishop there: yet the same was but of good will, and confirmed rather by custome than by sufficient decree; neither did that archbishop take vpon him to inuest other bishops, but sent them to Canturburie (as before is mentioned) which from henceforth they vsed not to do, inso much that the next bishop named Laurence, sometime archbishop of saint Beuins in Scotland, was ordered and installed at home by Celastus primate of Armagh.

TO THE RIGHT WOR- thie and honorable gentleman fir

Walter Raleigh knight, seneschall of the duchies of Cornewall and Excester, and lord warden of the stannaries in Deuon and Cornewall : Iohn Hooker wisseth a long, a happie, and a prosperous life, with the increase of honour.

Mong all the infinit good blessings, right honorable, which the Lord God hath bestowed vpon vs, I thinke none more expedient and necessarie, than the vse and knowledge of histories and chronicles : which are the most assured registers of the innumerable benefits and commodities, which haue and daileie doo grow to the church of God, and to the ciuill gouernment through out all nations. The vse of them began and was receiued euen from the first beginning, and immediatlie vpon the dispersing of the sonnes of Adam through out the world : for they were no sooner diuided into seuerall nations, but they did (as Cicero saith) make choise of some one man among themselves, who surpassed the rest in wisedom, knowledge and vnderstanding, Ad quem confugiebant. These kind of men for the most part in those daies were preests and philosophers, and for their great knowledge, wisedom and credit, had the charge to commend to their posteritie such notable and good acts as were worthie the memorie. And as all other nations had such men, so the re-more llands in the great Ocean had the like. For Britaine, now containing England, Scotland and Wales, had their Druides and Bardos, and Ireland had their Odalies or Rimers, who being verie wise men & of great credit, did deliuer all their saings in meeter, and were therefore called Poets. And these for the better alluring of the people to attention, and to frame them to the knowledge of vertue, did vse to sing with an instrument such lessons and instructions as they were wont to giue, whether it were concerning manners and common conuersation, or matters of policie and gouernment, or of prowesse and martiall affaires, or of the gifts of their ancestors, or of anie other thing thought meet to be learned and worthie the knowledge, by which meanes they made men the more apt, readie, and willing to applie themselves to vertue and to a commendable course of life, both concerning God how he was to be honored, the magistrate how he was to be obeyed, & the common societie how it was to be conserued ; and finallie how the whole course of mans life was to be ordered and directed.
These and manie other like comodities when Cicero had considered, did grow by these means, which is the verie substance of an historie : he described the same to be the witnesse of time, the light of truth, the life of memorie, and the mistresse of life : willing and aduising euerie man at all times and in all matters to haue their recourse to the same, and to be well exercised in the knowledge thereof, because the things past are set downe therin, and by them a man may learne what to doo in the life to come. For as the wise man saith, There is nothing new vnder the sunne : for the thing which is now hath bene, and by the things past we are taught the things to come. And so saith Augustine : Historia magis vel certe non minus pronuntiandis futuris, quam enuntiandis preteritis inuenitur intenta. Histories doo teach and aduertise vs as well of the things to come, as of the things past : and the knowledge thereof is so no necessarie that Melancthon would haue no man to be vnlearned in histories, because Sine qua nulla in re quispiam lucem habet. And Thucidides the old ancient historiographer of Grecia would that euerie man should haue about him a booke of histories, as a thing most necessarie for him in all matters whatsoeuer : and this did he draw and learne (as it should seeme) from Moses, who when he had faithfullie and diligentlie written and set downe the whole course of the world, the woonderfull works of God, and all the most necessarie precepts and rules for mans life, either concerning matters of religion or causes of ci-uill policies, or of common societie : then he and Iosua assembling all the people together, did deliuer vnto them the whole Pentateuchon of Moses to be daileie read & taught, with a commandement that they should neuer haue that booke out of their hands, but to haue alwaies their continuall recourse to them, as well for their life, as also for their direction in all their causes. Which thing they did most diligentlie obserue and keepe, and not onelie in matters of religion, but in all doubtfull matters, as to the most true oracles, they would make their recourse for their full resolutions. As the enemies of Iehuda, when they saw the prosperous successe of the building of the temple in the times of Ezras and Nehemias, and they much maligning the same, made sute to king Artaxerxes that he would reuoke the decree which king Cyrus had made vnto the Iewes, licencing them to build the temple, alledging manie great and sundrie matters against them. Wherevpon the king commanded the chronicles to be searched, whether it were true that had bene informed against them. Likewise when Hamon had greeuousslie complained vnto king Ahasuerus against Mardocheus and the Iewes, charging them with sundrie hainous offenses worthie death, the king commanded the chronicles to be searched. Also when Paule and Syllas first preached the gospell at Thessalonica and Bærea, a doctrine then accounted strange and new, they searched and examined the books Num hac ita se haberent. For as they found things there recorded, so gaue they credit, and by the same they did proceed in the like. For it was a common thing among the Romans, that not onelie they would make recourse in all doubtfull matters to their owne annales: but what so euer they found in the like in anie other nation or commonwealth, which might further them in anie thing touding their owne affaires, they would draw the same into an example for themselves to follow, which was no small benefit to their commonwealth.

Alexander. Likewise Alexander the great, notwithstanding he were brought vp in all good letters vnder Aristotle, yet when he was to enlarge his empire, he gaue himselfe to the diligent reading of Homer, the most exact chronographer of the Troian wars: and so he esteemed that booke, that in the daie time he caried it about him, and in the night time he laid it vnder his beds head; and at all times conuenient he would be reading of it, and in the end was so perfect therein, that he could verbatim repeat the whole without booke; the stratagems, the policies, and the manie deuises vsed in those warres he practised in his owne warres, which stood him in great steed. Iulius Cæsar also in his wars searched the ancient bookes and histories of the citie of Rome: and did not onelie thereby draw a paterne for his owne direction, both for his ciuill and his martiall affaires: but also, he being then the greatest monarch of all the world, thought it not preiudiciall to his imperiall estate and maiestie, to commend vnder his owne hand writing vnto his posteritie, the historie of his owne age and doings. Manie like princes hath England bred, who haue bin verie carefull, that the memoriall of the good things done in their times should be commended to their posteritie, to follow in the like. And therefore euerie king for the course of hundreth hundreds of yeares, was wont to retaine and keepe some wise, learned, and faithfull scribes, who should collect and record the things done in euerie their feuerall times, and all which as time and course of yeares did serue, were published; and what great good benefits haue growne thereby to this present age, and like to serue to the future time, all the world maie easilie see and iudge: for this I dare boldly saie and affirme: No realme, no nation, no state, nor common wealth throughout all Europa, can yeeld more nor so manie profitable lawes, directions, rules, examples & discourses, either in matters of religion, or of ciuill gouernment, or of martiall affairs, than do the histories of this little Isle of Britaine or England. I would to God I might or were able to saie the like, or the halfe like of Ireland, a countrie, the more barren of good things, the more replenished with actions of blood, murder, and lothsome outrages; which to anie good reader are greuous & irksome to be read & considered, much more for anie man to pen and set downe in writing, and to reduce into an historie. Which hath bene some cause whie I was alienated and vtterlie discouraged to intermedle therein: for being earnestlie requested, by reason of my some acquaintance with the maners and conditions of that nation during my short abode therein, to continue the historie of that land, from the death of king Henrie the eight vnto these presents, which hitherto hath not bene touched; I found no matter of an historie woorthie to be recorded: but rather a tragedie of cruelties to be abhorred, and no historie of good things to be followed: and therefore I gaue the matter ouer, and was fullie resolved not at all to haue intermedled therewith. Neuerthelesse, being againe verie earnestlie requested, and no excuse neither of my age, nor of my often sicknesse, nor of my calling in the seruice of the commonwealth, nor of my small learning and skill, sufficient to compas such a matter, could be accepted: then (but with an euill will) I entred into it, and the more I bethought my selfe of the matter, the more I began to consider, and at length to behold the two great and wonderous workes of God, both of his seuerie iudgement against traitors, rebels, and disobedient; and of his mercie and louing kindnesse vpon the obedient and dutifull. Whereof, though there be infinite examples both in the sacred histories and humane chronicles: yet I find none more apparant and effectuall, nor more fit for vs, and for this our time and age, than the histories of our owne nation, which yeeld vnto vs most infinite examples, how yong princes rebelling against the kings their fathers, noble men against their soveraignes, and the commons against the kings and rulers, some by the mightie hand of God swallowed vp in the seas, some deuoured with the sword, some by martiall and some by ciuill lawes executed to death: and few or none which haue escaped vnpunished. But of all others, none to be compared to this tragical discourse of Ireland, and the most vnnaturall wars of the Desmonds against hir sacred maiestie. Whose disobedience the Lord hath in iustice so seuerelie punished and reuenged, as the like hath not in our age bene scene nor knowne; which albeit somewhat at large it be set downe in the historie, yet briefe and in effect is as followeth.

The earle of Desmond, named Girald Fitzgirald, was descended of a yonger house of the Giraldines of Kildare, and both of them descended from one and the same ancestor Girald of Windsor, a noble gentleman of Normandie; who after his arriuall into England, trauelled into Wales, and there married the ladie Nesta daughter to the great Roelines prince of south Wales, and by hir among others had issue Moris Fitzgirald, ancestor to these the foresaid Giraldines; and he being assistant to Derman mac Morogh king of Leinster in Ireland, was one of the cheefest and most principall seruitors in the conquest, or rather one of the conquerors of that land vnder king Henrie the second. The issue and offspring of this Moris as they were honourable in blood, so they were no lesse honorable in all their actions: they being verie famous for their good gifts of the mind, in wisdom and policie in their ciuill gouernment, and renowned for their valiantnesse and prowesse in martiall affaires, in both which they had well tried themselves, and therefore manie times they had the cheefe gouernment of the whole realme, being sometime lord iustices, sometime lord lieutenants, and sometime lord Deputies of the whole land. And for their truth and fidelitie were aduanced to honor. For Thomas Fitzgirald being the elder house, was created earle of Kildare in the eighteenth yeare of king Edward the first, in the yeare one thousand two hundred foure score and nine. And in the beginning of king Edward the third his reigne, in the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and seuen, Moris Fitzthomas a yonger brother of that house was created earle of Desmond; and from thence as before, they continued verie honourable, dutifull & faithfull subiects, for the course of hundreth hundreds of yeares: vntill that this brainede and breake danse Girald of Desmond, and his brethren, alies and complices, forgetting the honour of his house, and forsaking their faith, dutie and allegiance, did breake into the impeach of hir most sacred maiestie, and the destruction of the commonwealth: the price whereof in the end ing verie few Giraldines in the prouince of Mounster left to bemone or bewaile their deaths. For first the earle himselfe, the cheefe of his familie, after his long repast in his traitorous follies, was driuen in the end to all extremities and penuries, and at the last taken in an old cotage, and his head was cut off and sent to London, and there set vpon London bridge, and his lands and inheritance confiscated and discontinued from his house and name for euer. Sir James one of his yonger brethren, in taking of a preie, was taken and made a preie; he was hanged as a theefe, quartered as a traitor, and his head and quarters disperfed and set vpon the gates and walls of the citie of Corke. Sir Iohn of Desmond, another of his yonger brethren, and next to himselfe the cheefe ringleader of this rebellion, was taken, his head cut off and set vpon the castell of Dublin, and his bodie hanged by the heeles at Corke. His onelie sonne and heire being whole disinherited, is prisoner in the Tower of London. His ladie and wife destituted of all honour and liuings, liueth a dolefull and miserable life. His captains, soldiers, and men of warre, put all for the most part to the sword. The popes two prelates and nuncios, the one slaine in the field, and the other died most miserable in the woods. The Italians and strangers few or none left alieue to returne to aduertise of their successe vnto their holie father. The common people such as escaped the sword, all for the most part are perished with famine, or fled the countrie. The land it selfe being verie fertile, is waxed barren, yeelding nor corne nor fruits; the pastures without cattell, and the aire without fowles, and the whole prouince for the most part desolate and vnhabited, sauing townes and cities: and finally, nothing there to be scene but miserie and desolation.

Sir James of Desmond taken & hanged.
Sir Iohn of Desmond killed & hanged.
The earles sonne a prisoner in the Tower of London.
The countesse of Desmond liueth a wofull life.
D. Allen slaine.
D. Sanders dieth miserable.

The epistle dedicatorie.

A notable and a rare example of Gods iust iudgement and seuer punishment, vpon all such as doo resist and rebell against the higher powers and his annointed: which is so greuous an offense in his sight, that next to the capitall offenses against the first table, this is accounted the greatest and in the highest degree. For as it is written, Who resisteth against the higher power, resisteth against Gods ordinances, and he shall receiue iudgement. And the Lord shall root him from out of the face of the earth that shall blasphem his gods, and curseth the prince of the people. Euen as of the contrarie, when the people liue in all subiection, humblenesse, and obedience, the Lord defendeth and keepeth them, and with his manifold blessings prospereth them; as hir maiesties good victuall dwelling within the English pale, and inhabiting within hir cities and townes can witnesse. They sow and till the land, and doo reape the fruits. Their fields are full of sheepe, and they are clothed with the wooll. Their pastures are full of cattell, and they inioice them. Their cities and townes are well inhabited, and they liue in safetie. All things go well with them, and peace and plentie resteth in their houses. Two notable examples (I saie) and worthie to be throughlie obserued; the one of Gods iust iudgement against the rebels and traitors, and the other of mercie and loue towards the obedient and dutifull subiect. Which examples the later they are, the more should they imprint in vs an inward affection and an vndoubted resolution, to yeeld to the superiours all dutie and obedience; and by the examples of the rebels, to shun as a pestilence all disobedience and rebellion; least in doing the like, we doo receiue the like iust iudgements with them. Let therefore the examples of the elders be sufficient perswasions and instructions to the posteritie, to follow that which is good, and to eschew that which is euill. For albeit good counsell of our friends, and conferences with the good men, maie much preuaile with vs, yet none can so much preuaile nor be of such vertue and effect, as the examples of our ancestors, and the actions of our forefathers when they be laid before vs: Magis enim exemplis potest persuaderi, quam argumentis extorqueri. And therefore in times past, the surest course which our forefathers tooke, either in ciuill gouernment or in martiall affaires, was that which they drew from the examples of their ancestors before them. And for as much as such is the value and vertue of the footsteps of our forefathers, I trust it shall not be offensive vnto you, that I doo a little digresse and speake somewhat of your selfe and of your ancestors; who the more honourable they were in their times, the greater cause haue you to looke into the same: that what in some of your later forefathers was conspited, maie not in you be conspited, but rouzed and raised vnto his former and pristinat state. And for as much as I am somewhat acquainted in their descents, let me make bold with you to laie the same downe before you.

Rom. 13.

The prosperitie and quietnes in the English pale.

Patric. de insit resp.

There were sundrie of your ancestors by the name of Raleigh, who were of great account & nobilitie, and alied as well to the Courtneis earls of Deuon, as to other houses of great honour & nobilitie, & in sundrie succeeding descents were honoured with the degree of knighthood. One of them being your ancestor in the directest line, was named sir John de Raleigh, who then dwelled in the house of Furdell in Deuon, an ancient house of your ancestors, and of their ancient inheritance: and which at these presents is in the possession of your eldest brother. This knight married the daughter and heire to sir Roger D'amerie, or de Amerie, whome our English chronicles doo name lord de Amerie, who was a noble man and of great linage, and descended of the earls de Amerie in Britaine, and alied to the earls of Montfort in the same duddie and prouince. This man being come ouer into England, did serue in the court, and by the good pleasure of God and the good liking of the king he married the ladic Elisabeth, the third suster and coheire to the noble Gilbert earle of Clare and of Glocester, who was slaine in the battell of Banokesborough in Scotland, in the time of king Edward the second. This earle died sans issue, he being the sonne and the said ladic Elisabeth the daughter to Gilbert de Clare earle of Glocester, by his wife the ladic Iane de Acres or Acon, daughter to king Edward the first. This Gilbert descended of Robert earle of Glocester, sonne to king Henrie the first, and of his wife the ladic Mawd, daughter and heire to Robert Fitzhamon, lord of Aftrouill in Normandie, cosen to the Conqueror, knight of the priue chamber to king William Rufus, and lord of the lordship of Glamorgan in Wales. So that your ancestor sir John de Raleigh married the daughter of de Amerie, Damerie of Clare, Clare of Edward the first, and which Clare by his father descended of king Henrie the first. And in like maner by your mother you maie be deriued out of the same house. These all were men of great honour and nobilitie, and whose vertues are highlie recorded sparsum in the chronicles of England; some greatlie commended for their wisdomes and deepe iudgements in matters of counsell, some likewise much praised for their prowesse & valiantnesse in martiall affaires, and manie of them honored for both.

The descent of the lord warden.

But yet as nothing is permanent in this life, and all things variable vnder the sunne, and time hath deuoured and consumed the greatest men and the mightiest monarchs, and most noble commonwealths in the world, according to the old countrie saing; Be the daie neuer so long, yet at length it will ring at euensong: so this honorable race, though for so manie descents, and for the course of so manie yeares it continued in great honor, nobilitie, and reputation, yet in proceesse of time the honour became to be of worship (neuerthelessse alied alwaies and matched in houses of great honour and nobilitie) and so euer since possessed by knights of your owne name, vntill by little and little the honour and estimation of your noble and worthie ancestors seemed at length to be buried in obliuion, and as it were extinguished and to be vtterlie forgotten as though it had neuer beene. And now when all was past anie hope and vnremembred to the world, it hath pleased God to raise the same euen as it were from the dead, and to looke vpon you the yongest sonne of manie, as he did vpon Ioseph, one of the yongest sonnes of Iacob; and in you hath left a hope to restore the decayed house of your sept and familie. He hath brought you into the good fauour of your prince, who hath pleased to reward and honour in you the approued faithfull seruice of your late ancestors and kindered decessed, and inclined hir princelie hart, conceiuing a great hope of your owne sufficiencie and abilitie to restore you againe, being the last branch remaining of so manie noble and famous houses descended. And whereof commeth this, that the Lord hath thus blessed you, and so bountifullie hath dealt with you? but onelic (as the wise man saith) Vt noscas in omni virtute omnibus prodesse, and that you should be beneficiall and profitable to all men. And therefore in all our actions, Semper aliquid ad communem utilitatem est afferendum: for we are not borne to our selues alone, but the prince, the countrie, the parents, freinds, wiues, children and familie, euerie of them doo claime an interest in vs, and to euerie of them we must be beneficiall: otherwise we doo degenerate from that communitie and societie, which by such offices by vs is to be conserued, & doo become most vnprofitable: Nam inutilis prorsus est, qui nullam utilitatem reipublice ac communi societati possit afferre, and euerie such man, as a member vnprofitable is to be cut off. And as the bee is no longer suffered to haue a place in the hieue, than whiles he worketh; no more is that man to haue place in the publike weale than whiles he dooth some good therein, because through idlenessse they doo not onelic no good, but as Cato saith, they doo euill: Nihil agendo homines male agere discunt. Idlenessse therefore the mother of all wickednesse, and idlers the sonnes of so bad a mother, are vtterlie to be exiled and expelled out of all well gouerned commonweales; and they onelic to be fostered, nourished and cherished, who as they are borne to the countrie, so if they doo good and be beneficiall to the same.

All things haue an end.

Cicero de offic.

Cicero.

Cato. Idlers ought not to haue place in the commonwealth.

And how great your care hath beene heerein, the course of your life hitherto dooth manifest it. For after that you had seasoned your primer yeares at Oxford in knowledge and learning, a good ground and a sure foundation to build therevpon all your good actions, you travelled into France, and spent there a good part of your youth in the warres and martiall seruices. And hauing some sufficient knowledge and experience therein, then after your returne from thence, to the end you might euerie waie be able to serue your prince and commonweale, you were desirous to be acquainted in maritimall affaires. Then you, together with your brother sir Humfreie Gilbert, travelled the seas, for the search of such countries, as which if they had beene then discovered, infinit commodities in

fundrie respects would haue infused, and whereof there was no doubt, if the fleet then accompanieng you, had according to appointment followed you, or your selfe had escaped the dangerous sea fight, when manie of your companie were slaine, and your ships therewith also sore battered and disabled. And albeit this hard beginning (after which followed the death of the said woorthie knight your brother) was a matter sufficient to haue discouraged a man of a right good stomach and value from anie like seas attempts; yet you, more respecting the good ends, wherevnto you leuelled your line for the good of your countrie, did not giue ouer, untill you had recovered a land, and had made a plantation of the people of your owne English nation in Virginia, the first English colonie that euer was there planted, to the no little derogation of the glorie of the Spaniards, & an impeach to their vaunts; who bicause with all cruell immanitie, contrarie to all naturall humanitie, they subdued a naked and a yeelding people, whom they sought for gaine and not for anie religion or plantation of a commonwealt, ouer whome to satisfie their most greedie and insatiable couetousnesse, did most cruellie tyrannize, and most tyrannicallie and against the course of all humane nature did seord and rolt them to death, as by their owne histories dooth appeare. These (I saie) doo brag and vaunt, that they onelic haue drawne strange nations and vknowne people, to the obedience of their kings, to the knowledge of christianitie, and to the enriching of their countrie; and thereby doo claime the honor to be due to themselves onelic and alone. But if these your actions were well looked into, with such due consideration as apperteineth, it shall be found much more honorable in sundrie respects, for the aduancement of the name of God, the honour of the prince, and the benefit of the common wealth. For what can be more pleasant to God, than to gaine and reduce in all christianlike manner, a lost people to the knowledge of the gospell, and a true christian religion, than which cannot be a more pleasant and a sweeter sacrifice, and a more acceptable seruice before God? And what can be more honorable to princes, than to enlarge the bounds of their kingdoms without iniurie, wrong, & bloudshed; and to frame them from a savage life to a ciuill government, neither of which the Spaniards in their conquests haue performed? And what can be more beneficiall to a common weale, than to haue a nation and a kingdome to transerre vnto the superfluous multitude of frutelesse and idle people (heere at home daileie increasing) to trauell, conquer, and manure another land, whiche by the due intercourses to be deuised, may and will yeeld infinit commodities? And how well you doo deserue euerie waie in following to honourable a course, not we our selues onelic can witnesse, but strange nations also doo honour you for the same: as dooth appeare by the epistle of Basimerus of France, to the historie of Florida: and by Julius Caesar a citizen of Rome in his epistle to his booke intituled Cyllombeados. It is well knowne, that it had benee no lesse easie for you, than for such as haue benee aduanced by kings, to haue builded great houses, purchased large circuits, and to haue vsed the fruits of princes fauours, as most men in all former and present ages haue done; had you not preferred the generall honour and commoditie of your prince and countrie before all priuat gaine and commoditie: wherby you haue benee rather a seruant than a commander to your owne fortune. And no doubt the cause being so good, and the attempt so honorable, but that God will increase your talent, and blesse your doings, and euerie good man will commend and further the same. And albeit the more noble enterprises a man shall take in hand, the more aduersaries he shall haue to depraue and hinder the same: yet I am perswaded, as no good man shall haue iust cause, so there is none so much carried with a corrupt mind, nor so enuious of his countries honour, nor so bent against you, that he will derogate the praise and honour due to so worthie an enterprise; and that so much the sooner, bicause you haue indured so manie croses, and haue through so much enuiings and misfortunes perseuered in your attempts, whiche no doubt shall at last by you be performed when it shall please him, who hath made you an instrument of so worthie a worke. And by how much the more God hath pleased thus to blesse you, so much the more are you bound to be thankfull vnto him, and to acknowledge the same to proceed from his grace and mercie towards you. Giue me leaue therefore (I praie you) to be bold with you, not onelic to put you in mind hereof, but also to remember you, how it hath pleased God to bring you into the fauour of your prince and souereigne: who besides his great fauour towards you manie waies, she hath also laid vpon you the charge of a gouernement in your owne countrie, where you are to command manie people by your honourable office of the stannarie, and where you are both a iudge and chancellor, to rule in iustice and to iudge in equitie. Wherin you are so much the more to be circumspect and wise, bicause vpon your iudgement (and such as you shall appoint to be vnder you) the determinations of all their causes dooth rest and depend, knowing that a hard iudgement abideth for such as be in authoritie, if they iudge not vprightlie, and doo not yeeld iustice to euerie man indifferetlie. Be you therefore carefull in this respect, that you be well reported for your vpright dealings, both herein, & in euerie of all your other actions to all men. Be you a patterne of vertue, & an example of true nobilitie, which is grounded & hath hir foundation vpon vertue, for as the poet saith, Ex virtute nobilitas nascitur, non ex nobilitate virtus: virtus sola nobilitat, non caro nec sanguis. And therefore saith Demosthenes; If thou draw thy descent & pedegree euen from Iupiter himselfe, yet if thou be not vertuous, iust & good, Ignobilis mihi videris. In my opinion thou art no gentleman. It is a noble thing to be borne of noble ancestors (as Aristotle saith) but his nobilitie faileth, when his ancestors vertues in him faileth, Hic enim vere nobilis est descendus, cui non aliena sed sua virtus ad gloriam opitulatur. Your ancestors were verie ancient, and men of great nobilitie, beneficiall to their princes and countrie manie & sundrie waies. And as in nature you are descended from them, so it hath pleased God to blesse you with knowledge in learning, with skill of warlike seruice, and in experience in mariuall causes, and besides hath placed you among the nobles, and in the good grace and fauour of your prince. Wherefore you are so much the more to be carefull to restore the house of your decayed forefathers to their ancient honor and nobilitie, which in this later age hath benee obscured, abiding the time by you to be restored to their first and primer state: which you are not onelic taught by their old and good examples, but also by the ensignes of their and your nobilitie. For the fusils, being an instrument of trauell and labour, doo aduertise you, that you are one of the sonnes of Adam, borne to walke in a vocation, and therein to be a profitable member in the church of God, and in maintenance of the common societie: which when you behold and looke vpon, you must so endeavour your selfe, euen as Agathocles king of Syracusa, whose cupbords, though they were well furnished with great store and varietie of rich plate, yet he thought not the same sufficientlie fraughted, vnlesse he had also his earthen pitchers and stone cups, in which he vsed to drinke, to teach & remember him in the middle of his roialtie, to be mindfull of his origin estate and durie.

The white colour or siluer mettall dooth teach vnto you vertue, sinceritie & godlinesse. For as siluer is a most excellent mettall, and next vnto gold excelleng all others, and with which for the excellencie thereof, the Lord God would haue his tabernacle and his temple to be adorned and beautified with vessels and ornaments thereof; and as the white colour, if it be spotted and foule, dooth lose his grace: euen so it teacheth you to be a man of an honest and of a godlie conuersation, to lead a life in all vprightnesse, without reproch and disgrace: and that you should be seruiceable to God and your countrie in all good actions; and therewith also (which by the gulie colour is meant) you be bold and valiant for the defense of your countrie, and for the safetie thereof to spend both life and goods, that you should be beneficiall to all men, hurtfull and iniurious to no man. And such kind of men were your ancestors, who for the same were beloued and honoured, and their names for euer registred in immortal fame and memorie. And so shall it be with you, if you doo the like, and follow their steps and examples, God shall blesse you, & you shall prosper & flourish as did Ioseph; you shall be honored, as was Daniell; and you shall be in fauor before God & man, as were your ancestors; the whole people shall speake good of you, the honour of your house shall be restored, & your talent shall be augmented & increased, & all things shall go well with you. But to returne where we left. When I had waded as far as I could in the discourse of this historie, according to such such instructions as partlie by my selfe, but more by other mens helps, I had collected and gathered; and thought to haue continued the same from the death of King Henrie the eight, vnto these presents: it came vnto my mind and I thought it verie expedient, to make a new review of that, which by others had bene doone in the interuall betwene Cambrensis, and my doings, wherein I found great paines had bene taken, and that the authors had well deserued great praises and commendations. And yet in this they were much to be blamed, that all of them were beholding vnto Giraldus, and not one of them would yeeld that curtesie either to publish his historie, or vsing the same to acknowledge it. For some misliking both method and phrase, framed it into another forme, and penned it in a more losstie stile; and vnder that colour haue attributed vnto themselves the honour and fruits of another mans doings. In which, their discourtesie was the more, because they iniured so noble and woorthie a personage. For Giraldus was a noble man by birth, he being the sonne vnto Mauricius, the sonne vnto Giraldus de Windsor, and to his wife the ladie Nesta, daughter to the great Roefius prince of south Wales. He was from his youth brought vp in learning, and proued verie well learned in all good letters both diuine and likewise humane: and by profession he was a man of the clergie, and liued by the patrimonie of the church. He was chapleine to king Henrie the second, and to king Iohn his sonne, and both of them he attended in their iourneys into Ireland, and at the request and commandement of the king the father, he wrot the historie of this land according as what he saw and knew to be true. The more noble then that this man was by birth, the more reuerend in calling, the more painfull in trauels, and the better learned he was: euen so much the more is their fault, that will borrow of him and not acknowledge it, nor thinke themselves beholding vnto him. For as Plinie saith, Ingeniū pudoris est, fateri per quos profecerimus; it is the part of a good nature not to be ashamed to acknowledge and confesse by whom he is the better, and benefited. I know it hath bene an old vsage in all ages, and among all the auncient writers, both Græcians & Latinists, that they would borrow of other mens writings, and enlarge their owne therewith: as Plato did of Socrates and Pythagoras, Aristotle out of Plato, Cicero of them both; and so likewise others: and these men would not onelie confesse the same, which was accounted to be some part of recompense, but also they accounted their owne doings to be so much the better, as that they were confirmed by the authoritie of such wise, graue, and well learned men. The like reason might suffice to perswade such in this later age, as which be so curious that they will not haue anie father, doctor, or anie other writer to be named nor alleaged in sermons, readings, predings, or writings; and yet they will not sticke to vse & recite verbatim, whole sentences, yea & whole pages out of other mens writings, and attribute the same to themselves, as of their owne inuention. A great fault and a point of ingratitude, not allowed among the gentiles: much lesse should it be so among christians, especiallie among them of the highest profession, Non profiteri per quos profecerunt.

But leauing euerie man to himselfe, for as much as all histories are to be doone with all sinceritie & truth, which in this cannot be so well doone, vnlesse the first writer and author of this historie of Ireland haue his place: I haue thought good to publish and set forth Giraldus his owne workes as they are, which, leauing all other translations, I haue as faithfullie translated as the historie requirith, and in as fit an English phrase as is most meete and conuenient for the reader. And because the same so long hence written, hath sundrie obscure things, which doe require some further opening, for the better vnderstanding of the reader; I haue subiected and added to euerie chapter (so requiring) such notes and obseruations, as he shall be therewith the better instructed and satisfied. This thing thus by me doone, together with so much as I my selfe haue penned from the death of king Henrie the eight vnto these presents: which although it maie seeme to be verie imperfect, and to want that fulnesse as the course of so manie yeares might afford; or that some things maie be misreported and set downe, otherwise than the truth is, or that some things maie be mistaken, &c: let this be imputed vnto them, through whose default the same is so befallen; for manie things were promised and little performed; and some, who had and haue an interest in the matter, haue refused and would doe nothing. But for my selfe, according to such instructions and collections as are come to my hands, I haue after the method and nature of an historie, most sincerelie and faithfullie set downe what is materiall and woorthie the writing. And for as much as your selfe was a partie and a doer in some part of the Desmonds wars, in which you were a painfull and a faithfull seruitor, and therefore can giue some report and testimonie to this discourse, and also for the loue and honour which I doe owe and beare vnto you, I thought it my part and dutie to offer and present, and presentlie in most humble maner I doe offer and present the same vnto your good fauour and protection. And albeit the thing it selfe be verie slender, and too farre an inferior present to be offered to one of your estate and calling; yet let your courtesie couer that, and accept my good will, which as time and occasion hereafter shall serue, I shall & will be most willing (as your lordships most deuout and assured) to supplie in all the good seruices I maie or shall be able to doe at your commaundement. The Lord blesse you and multiplie your daies, to the honor of God, the good seruice of hir maiestie, the benefit of the commonwelth, the comfort of your friends, and to your owne increase in all honour. The first preface of Giraldus Cambrensis vnto his historie of the conquest of Ireland.

IForsomuch as in our Topographie we haue at large set forth and described the site of the land of Ireland, the natures of sundrie things therein contained, the woonderous & strange prodigies which are in the same, and of the first origin of that nation, euen from the first beginning vntill this our time: it resteth, that at the request of sundrie men, and of some of great estate, we do now in a particular volume declare & set forth the conquest of the same land in these our daies, together with the noble acts & gests therein doone. For if we haue well discovered the old & ancient times long before vs, how much more should we doo that which we haue seene, and for the most part are witnesses thereof, & which are yet in our fresh & perfect memorie? Our Topographie discovereth the things done in times past and long ago; but this present historie intreateth of the things presently doone, and in our daies. But me thinketh I see some man to shrinke vp the nose, and as it were to snuffe, because I haue written all things so plainelie and euidentlie; and therefore in great scorne he reacheth the booke to one, & with as great disdain casteth it to another. But let him know this, that I haue now written this chieflie for the laie people, and for such princes as be not of greatest learning, and are therefore desirous to haue things to be vttered in such a plaine and sensible speech as they may best vnderstand the same. For whie, most plaine terms are most meet to be vsed, when the noble acts of noble men & worthie seruitors are to be published and set forth to the notice and knowledge of all men. For this cause therefore haue I written this historie in as plaine & sensible maner as I can (leauing as much as may be) the darke & obscure maner of writing vsed in times past. And forsomuch as euerie age hath his peculiar manner, I haue according to the mind of the philosopher (whose aduise is, that the liues of the old men, and the pleasant speeches of yoong men should be receiued and followed) I haue (I saie) of purpose written in that order and phrase of speech as now is most in vre. For sith that words are but messengers of a mans mind, and giuen onelie to that end he should without close couering and couching plainelie disclose his mind and meaning: I haue purposelie indouored my selfe, that seeing what others doo not see, and knowing what others doo not vnderstand, I might so write as I might of all men be vnderstood. For whie, Seneca saith: It is better to be dumbe and not to speake at all, than so to speake as not to be vnderstood, so that the speech be framed in such phrases & order as are most meet to be vsed, & with the wise and learned do most affect. But forsomuch as some men haue maliciouslie and slanderouslie depraued my Topographie, I haue thought good by the waie here to interlace a few words in defense therof. All men generallie concerning the beginning of a good or a learned matter, doo consider and haue respect speciallie to three things; the first is, the author of the thing, then the matter it selfe, and lastlie, the ordering and well handling of the thing so begun. Concerning the first and last of these three, the enuious man being afraid to vtter his malice, euen against his will giues praise & commendation to both. But yet as a staged man can not alwaies dissemble and cloke himselfe, so this man, who to haue his will ouer me & to deprauie me, inueigheth against the second point, thinking and meaning by reproouing me to be a lier therein, to condemne all the rest; he obiekteth therefore and laieth to my charge the strange prodigies which I wrote, namelie how the wolfe spake and talked with a priest; of the man that in the hinder parts was like to an ox; of a woman that had a beard like a man; and a man like an horse; of a gote & a lion, which resorted and accompanied with a woman. But who so misliketh hereof, let him read in the booke of Numbers, & he shall find that Balaams asse spake and reprooued his maister. Let him examine the liues of the fathers, and he shall learne how that a satyre in the wildernesse did talke with Anthonie the heremite; and how Paule the heremite was fed in the desert by a rauen. Let him read also the workes of Jerome, the Exameron of Ambrose, and the dialog of Gregorie. Let him likewise read saint Augustine his booke of the citie of God, especiallie the xv. and xxi. bookes, which are full of strange prodigies and woonders: let him read Isodorus in the xi. booke of his Etymologies, concerning woonders, his xij. booke of beasts, & his xvi. booke of pretious stones, and of their vertues; let him also read Valerius Maximus, Trogius Pompeius, Plinius, and Solinus, & in euerie of these he shall find manie things which he may mislike and thinke to be vntruths, & so condemne the residue of all the writings of so noble and woorthie men. But let him be better aduised, & consider well, how that as S. Ierome saith, there are manie things contained in the scriptures which seeme to be incredible, and to carie no truth in them, and yet neuerthelesse are most true. For whie, nature dooth not, nor can preuaile against the Lord of nature: and therfore euerie creature ought not loth, but to reuerence, and haue in great admiration the works of God: & as S. August. saith, How can that be against nature which is doone by the will of God? Bicause the will of so great a creator is the nature and beginning of euerie thing created. A portent then or a monster is not against nature, but against it which proceedeth from nature. And therfore as it is not impossible to God to ordeine and creat what natures or things he listeth; no more is it impossible to him to alter and change into what forms he listeth the things alreadie created. And yet I would not that euerie thing by me written, should forthwith be credited and receiued as an vndouted truth: for whie, I my selfe do not so firmlie beleue of them, as of things most certeine and true, sauing of such things which by experience I know to be true, and which also euerie other man may by prooffe so find it to be. For as for all other things, I so account of them, that I neither do nor will stand either in the deniall or affirmation of them. The iewellers & such as haue, & be acquainted with the pretious stones come out of India, do not so strangelic think or haue admiration of them, as they who neuer saw them afore: & yet they hauing had once experience of them, do the lesse muse & wonder at the strangenes of them. For whie, the dailie vse taketh awaie all strangenes & admiration; and euerie thing be it neuer so strange & maruellous at the first, yet by dailie viewing of them they wax to be contemned and the lesse esteemed: euen as the Indians themselues do litle value or esteeme their commodities, which we do so much maruell & wonder at. S. Augustine therfore vpon the gospell, how the water was turned into wine hath these words: Maruellous great is the power of God in the creation of the heauen & earth, & of the gouerning of the same; & as great it is to see how the raine water, by the nature of the vine is turned into wine, and how of litle and small seeds great trees and fruits do spring and grow; and yet because we do see it this daie as it were by a naturall course, we do lesse esteeme & consider of them. But yet God aboue the common course hath reserved to himselfe some small things, & which seeme to be of no value, to the end that his power might appeare in greater things, and driue vs the more to consider of them. Wherefore let the malicious & enuious be contented, & not to enuie against the Lord of nature, who of purpose in the sight of man hath doone manie things against the common course of nature: because it should be apparant, & euerie man should well see, that Gods power far exceedeth mans reach & knowledge, & his diuinitie surpasseth mans vnderstanding. Cassiodorus therfore saith: It is a great point of knowledge in man to vnderstand & haue the knowledge, that God can and dooth such great and woonderfull things as do far exceed and passe the capacitie & vnderstanding of man. For God alwaies of purpose dooth transpoe and alter his great things into strange forms, that albeit men may in some respect discern the same: yet fullie they can not comprehend the same. If then the old and ancient writers haue diligentlie and with good allowance noted & registred in their writings the strange prodigies in their times; whie are we doing the like (vnlesse the whole world be set in wickednesse) maligned and backbitten? For if there be anie new and strange thing in our worke, and which heretofore hath not beene heard of: yet let not the malicious & spitefull man forthwith, without further allowance condemne and depraue it, but rather suffer to remaine as it is. For as the poet saith: If our forefathers had reiected (as we do) all new things, what shuld now be old? Let him therfore cease to blame or carpe at new things, because in course of time they ceasse to be new, and wax to be old. He may therfore take his pleasure, and depraue the same, & yet no doubt our posteritie will allow therof. He may do what he can to hurt it, yet they will accept and read it. He may do what he can to disprooue and blame it, yet will they loue it. He may do what he can to reiect it, yet will they receiue and allow of it.

HAuing bene eftfoones, and by manie requested, to register and write the historie of fuch noble acts doone in our times, which I haue either feene my felfe, or haue heard it crediblie reported; I was for my excufe woont to alleage the wickedneffe of the time, wherein, by realon of the exceffive riotoufneffe which fo aboundeth, all things are fo farre out of order, and men fo carefull to pamper vp the bodie, that the mind, which of his nature is free, is now in captiuitie, and cannot haue his libertie. Neuertheleffe, confidering, and diligentlie aduifing with my felfe, how neceffarie the knowledge of thofe things will be to our pofteritie, and how nothing is more pernicious and hurtfull to a good wit, and an honest difpofition, than to lie wallowing in idleneffe and floth; I did at length with much adoo yeeld my felfe to thofe requests, and refolued my felfe to fatisfie the fame. But yet what can be more prefumptuous than to write when time ferueth not, & leifure wanteth? Or to defire our owne bookes to be commonlie read, and yet at no leifure to read our felues? Or that we fhould be fubieft to the examination and lifting of a malicious reader, and an enuious iudge, and yet we not at leifure to examine our felues? Tullius, the founteine and wellspring of all eloquence, being on a time requested to make an oration, is faid he did excufe himfelfe, becaufe he had not studied nor read the daie before. If fo famous a man, and the father of all eloquence, did fo eftime the benefit of studieng, what fhall others of a farre meaner eftate and learning thinke of themfelues? For true it is, the wit of man if it be not reuiued with continuall and dailie reading waxeth faint and dull, and with reading it is increafed and nourifhed as it were with a naturall food and fufenance. For as the full barns are foone spent, if they be not new stored; and the stocke of great wealth and treafure foone wafte & confumed, if it be not repared; euen fo the knowledge of man being not dailie renewed by reading and perufing of other mens works dooth foone perifh and decaie. We are compact and doo confift of two natures, the one temporall, the other eternall; and hauing refpect to both, are to nourifh both, the earthie part with things tranfitorie and earthie according to the time, the heauenlie part with things perpetuall and euerlafting. The bodie for the time hath his cares; but the mind, which of his nature is free, and which cannot be shut vp, and as it were imprifoned, is neither vnder the power of vs, nor of anie others; let it therefore inioie his owne and proper libertie which to it apperteineth, and inioie the freedome to it belonging. As for the outward man, let him wander and ftraie, and be troubled about manie things, let him follow vaine and trifling toies, and doo all things as will lufteth, & let him be fubieft to the miserable condition of the flefh: but the inward man, which as the kernell is inclofed in the fhell, let him inioie that right and priuilege which God hath giuen vnto it; let it be fo warded and defended, that being in troubles, it be not troubled; and being folitarie, it be not deftituted. God and the king haue each of them their feuerall power and empire ouer vs: the king hath power onelie ouer the bodie, but the fecret and incomprehenfible part within vs, namelie the foule, God onelie poffeffeth, and he alone knoweth and fearcheth the fame. For it is a moft noble and excellent thing, paffing all other the gifts of God vnder heauen, being incomprehenfible, and yet comprehending all things, and moft euidentlie declaring the diuine power which is in it. For by a certeine naturall agilitie which is in him he comprehendeth all the foure corners of the world, and in a maruellous fecret celeritie dooth difcerne the whole world and all that therein is: it hath the knowledge and vnderftanding of all arts, fciences & knowledges: he is onlie known to him that is vnknown, feene of him that is not feene, & cōprehended of him which is incomprehenfible. God forbid therefore, that the continuall exercifes of this foule fhould be hindered with vaine and worldlie cares, whereby things for a time omitted or fet afide fhould perifh or be forgotten: for what is the bodie to the foule but a heauie burthen, a paine, & as it were a prifon, which though not holding him, yet hindring him? For what the fhell is to the kernell, the fame is the flefh to the fpirit, both of them carrieng his owne impediment and burthen. Wherefore right noble now earle of Poitiers, but fhortlie which fhall be king of England, & duke of Normandie, hauing the force and helpe of this, I haue yeelded my felfe, and haue now written and drawn out the historie of the conquest of Ireland, and the fubduing of the barbarous nation of the fame in thefe our daies, and haue dedicated the fame vnto your highneffe: that by recording the gifts thereof, and feeing how your father did grow in renowme and honor, fo the fame alfo may increafe in you: and as you are knownen to be the right heire of your fathers inheritance, fo you may fucceed him alfo in his vertues and victories to your great honor. I haue hitherto traueled in this rude and rough matter after a groffe manner, but hereafter more fullie, and in better order to be expreffed and fet foorth, as time and yeares fhall increafe, and as I fhall be more at full instructed.

To his most reuerend lord and beloved in Christ, Iohn the noble and wvorthie king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandie and of Aquitaine, and earle of Aniou: Giraldus offereth this his simple worke, and wisheth all health both of bodie and of soule, and a prosperous successe in all things according to his hearts desire.

IT pleased your noble and excellent father king Henrie, to send me being then attendant upon him, ouer with you into Ireland, where when I had noted sundrie notable things, and which were strange and unknowne to other nations: then at my returne, I made a collection and choise of the chiefest matters therein: and within three yeares, I made my booke of Topographie, of the woonders of Ireland, and of the description of that land, doone in and for the honor of your father; who hauing good liking, and being well pleased with those my trauels (for why, he was a prince (a thing rare in our times) verie well learned) his desire and pleasure was, I should also write out the historie of the last conquest of the same land, made by him and his. Which renewing my former trauels I did: but neither it, nor these my paines were considered. For vertue commonlie is more commended than rewarded. But because by negligence, or rather by reason of the great businesse, wherewith I was incumbred: I had almost forgotten the site, nature, and maner of the west parts of the said land, which I had not seene a long time. I thought it good to ouerrun, and peruse againe my said worke, and being better corrected, to dedicat the same vnto your highnesse. Wherein our historie taketh his beginning from the time that Dermot mac Morogh prince of Leinster was driven out of his countrie by his owne men, and fled to your father then being in Aquitaine: most humblye craving, and at length obtaining aid and succor, vntill your first comming into that land, when I was with you: and haue faithfullie declared in order, what things were there doone by euerie of these noble men and captains, which then passed thither; euen from the first to the last; and what good or euill was doone by them.

In which historie as in a glasse, a man may most apparantlie and euidentlie see and discern truth; who, and what they were which deserued the most honor in this conquest; whether the first aduenturers out of the diocesse of saint Dauids my cousins and kinsmen; or they of the diocesse of Landaff, who came next, and who in verie deed are gentlemen, but more in name than valiant in act; and who vpon the good successe of the first, hoping to haue the like themselves, went ouer: or else they which passed ouer the third time, who were well and fullie furnished at all points with good store of armor, vittell, and other necessaries. Surelie they deserued well, who gaue the first aduenture: and they also are much to be commended, which continued the same: but they deserued best, who went ouer last. For they not onelie did establish and confirme the authoritie and dooings of the first and second, but also made a small end, and brought the whole countrie into subiection. But alas, by reason of their too hastie returning from thence, and of the vnnatural warres and rebellion of the sonnes against their father, the land could not be brought to a perfect order, nor the things begun could haue his full perfection. Wherefore, O noble king, despiſe not the great trauels and labors of your father, nor yet my poore paines herein. Do not impart your honor and glorie to the vnworthie and vnthankefull: neither for the coueting of an Iland of siluer to hazard the losse of one of gold: the one far passing and exceeding the other in value. For the gold of Arabia and the siluer of Achaia doo both fill a mans cofer alike: but the one more in price and value than the other. Besides this, there is another thing which might persuaide you to be mindfull, and haue some regard of the land of Ireland. It hath pleased God and good fortune to send you manie children, both naturall, and also legitimat; and more hereafter you may haue. It were therefore verie good as you may, to appoint and place in those two kingdomes, two of your sonnes to be gouernors and rulers of them: and vnder them to appoint a great number of your men, and endow them liberallie with great liuings and linehoods; and especiallie in Ireland, which as yet is rude, vnmurtured, and nothing to the purpose by our men inhabited. But if so be that neither for the increasing of your owne honor, the enriching of your treasurie, nor for the aduancing of your children, you will haue respect to your realme of Ireland; yet haue some consideration of your poore veterans and old seruitors, who haue most faithfullie and trustilie serued both you and your father, and by whose seruice that realme of Ireland was first conquered; and is yet kept and reteined; and yet are supplanted by such yong nouices and yoonkers as are of late gone thither thither, to inioy and to succeed into the fruits of other mens travels, fortune better fauoring them, than vertue commending. And the follie of these men is growne to such a pride and arrogancie, that as it is said, they are greatlie to be suspected to aspire and to vsurpe the whole seignorie and dominion to themselves, which it lieth you vpon to see to be quailed and abated.

And in following these your Irish affaires, you are to haue great care and regard, that when so euer you doo march and take anie iourneie, either for the vanquishing of the enimie, or for the reuenging of anie wrongs and iniuries; that you haue alwaies an eie backward, and leaue all things behind you in such safe and sure order, that no danger thereof doo insue vnto you. For why, the household enimies be alwaies working swiles, and waiting for an aduantage; and doo but looke when time and place may serue for them: to rebell: and therefore you are to haue great care and good regard, that you doo leaue all things behind you in safetie, and out of danger: and that you doo not suffer the serpent to lurke and hide himselfe, as it were in your bosome: nor to nourish and rake vp the fire as it were in your lap, the same being ready to breake out into great flames: for this shall not onelie be counted a great rechelesnesse, but also a great fault in you, and to your great reproch. It is verie expedient therefore to euerie prince, that in his land he doo not foster and mainteine anie such Hydras and venomous serpents. And for princes of Ilands, it should be good for them, that they in their dominions and realmes haue in no side anie other marches than the seas it selfe. But if it be so, that you will not be perswaded for anie of the foresaid reasons, to haue regard or remorse to your said land, being so oftentimes desolated, and almost utterly destroyed; that it may be reduced to some better order and state, whereby it may be more profitable to your selfe and vnto yours: then I praise you to pardon vs Welshmen, notwithstanding we be of nature somewhat rash; and giue vs leave to put you in remembrance touching which your father, for the aduancement of himselfe and of his posteritie, did promise to pope Adrian, when he first procured licence and libertie to invade and to conquer the realme of Ireland. The first is, that you would set vnto the true religion, and reforme the church of God in that realme: and then, as you doo now in England, so also in Ireland, you doo cause to be paid out of euerie house the Peter pence, according to the tenure of the said priuilege by your father obtained, and which remaineth in the treasure of Winchester; that you maie so deliuer your fathers soule, and satisfie his promise. For why, as Salomon saith: Alieng toong besecmeth not a king, especiallie when he shall liue to God, and being a creature, wittinglie to offend his creator; for that is an offense verie heinous and dangerous.

And forsomuch as you are to answer before the high and strict iudge, hauing nothing for your excuse and defense than as before is said, for the so much innocent bloud by your father and your selfe alredie shed, and which hereafter maie be shed: you ought to be verie carefull and diligent, that Gods anger maie be appeased, and your fathers promise be performed: that God being thus honored for this conquest, you maie haue a prosperous successe, and all yours in this world: and also after this life inioie that perpetuall felicitie, which surpasseth all ioy and felicitie. And because you haue not kept nor performed these promises, these two defects by Gods iust iudgement are befallen vnto you. The one is, that this conquest could neuer be brought to his full effect and perfection. The other is, that they which were the cheefest and most principall seruitors in this conquest, namely Robert Fitzstephans, who first entered into the land, and made waie vnto others, Henrie of monte Moris, Reimond, Iohn de Courcie, and Meilerius, neuer had anie lawfull issue of their bodies begotten. And no maruell: for notwithstanding the happie and fortunat successe of the conquest, the poore cleargie was neuer considered, but were driuen to beg; and the cathedrall churches which were richlie indued with great liuelehoods, possessions, and territories, were altogether wasted and spoiled. These things a good prince of his honor ought to see to be redressed, and to provide that the cleargie, who are and ought faithfullie to assist and serue him in all weightie causes of counsell and importance, should be releued, and inioie the honor vnto them belonging, and that small portion which was promised vnto them; that God in some things maie be appeased and satisfied for these cruell and bloudie conquests. And moreover, vnder your patience we saie also, that for the perpetuall memorie of this conquest made by Englishmen, and because in proceesse of time, and course of yeares, there happeneth great change of lords, and manie times the inheritance commeth to such as are furthest remoued in kinred, that therefore there be a yearelie tribute rated and yeelded vnto the king, to be paid in gold or such commodities as that land best yeeldeth: and that this be comprised in a publike instrument, that the whole world maie know how the realme and land of Ireland is subiect to the crowne of England. And forsomuch as things doone, being put and registred in writing, and to be read by an interpreter, are not sensible, nor so well understood of the hearer, as when he maie or dooth read the same in his owne speech and language: it were verie good (in my opinion) that some learned man, and skilfull in the French toong, should translate the same into French.

How Dermon Mac Morogh king of Leinster fled out of his countrie vnto Henrie the second king of England for aid and succour.

Chap. I.

Dermon (1) Mac Morogh prince of (2) Leinster & go-uernour of the fift part or portion of Ireland, did in our time possesse & in-ioie the east part of the land, which bozdereth and lieth to wards England: being disieuered from the same by the maine seas. This man from his verie youth, and first entrie into his kingdome, was a great oppressor of his gentlemen, and a cruell tyrant ouer his nobles: which bred vnto him great hatred and malice. Besides this, there befell to him an other mischæse: for Morike prince of (3) Meth was gone in a iornie, leauing his wife the daughter of Dinolaghlin behind, in a certeine Iland in Meth: there to remaine and tarie vntill his returne. She (4) late and this Der-mon had bene long inamourèd and in loue the one with the other: and she watching a time how to haue loue and lust satisfièd, taketh the aduantage of hir husbands absence, and yeldeth hir selfe to be rauished, because she would be rauished: for by hir owne procurement and intisings, she became and would needs be a partie vnto the preier. Such is the variable & fickle nature of a woman, by whome all mischieses in the world (for the most part) doe happen and come, as mate appeare by (5) Marcus Antonius, and by the destruction of (6) Troie. King Morike being aduertised hereof, was forthwith maruellouslie troubled & in a great choler, but more grieved for shame of the fact than for sorrow or hurt; and therefore is ful-lie determined to be auenged: and forthwith assem-bleth all his people and neighbors, as also procured into his aid and for his helpe Mothorike king of (6) Connagh and then monarch of all Ireland. The people of Leinster considering in what distresse their prince was, and how on euerie side he was beset of his enemies, they also call to mind the old sores and griefes, which they of long time had dissembled: & to be auenged & wreched the reof, they make league and become friends with their enemies, and utterlie leauè and forsake their king. Dermon seeing himselfe thus forsaken and left destitute, and that fortune frowned vpon him (for he had oftentimes in-countered with his enemies and euer had the worst) determined at length, as to his last refuge to flee ouer the seas, and to seeke for some better chance. By this euent and sequele of this man, as also by manie other like examples it appeareth, that it is better for a prince to rule ouer a people, which of a god will and loue doe obeie him, than ouer such as be froward and stubborne. This (6) Pero well felt and (7) Domitia-nus well knewe (8) and Henrie duke of Saronie and Baire well tried. It is more necessarie and expedient for a prince to be rather beloued than feared. In deed it is good to be feared; so that the feare doe proceed rather from a good will than of compulsion. For that soeuer is outwardlie onelie and to the shew loued and receiued, the same of consequence must be feared: but that soeuer is feared, that is not forthwith loued. Wherefore feare must be so tempered with loue, that neither a remisse good will doe war into a coldnesse, neither feare grounded vpon a rash insu-lencie be turned and become tyrannie. Loue did in-large the empire of (9) Augustus, but feare shortened the life of (10) Julius Cesar. Well, was Morogh following fortune, and yet in hope that once againe he will turne hir whele, hauing wind and wether at will, taketh ship, passeth ouer the seas, and went vnto Henrie the second king of England, and most humble and earnestlie prayeth his helpe and succor.

Who being then in the remote places in France and Aquitaine, and busied in great and weightie affaires, yet most courteously he receiued him and liberallie rewards him. And the king hauing at large and orderlie heard the causes of his erile and of his repaire vnto him, he toke his oth of allegiance and swore him to be his true vassall and subiect: and there vpon granted and gaue him his letters patents in maner and forme as followeth. Henrie king of England, duke of Normandie and Aquitaine, and earle of Anjou, vnto all his subjects, Englishmen, Normans, Scots, and all other nations and people being his subjects sendeth greeting. Whensoever these our letters shall come vnto you, know ye that we haue re-ceiued Dermon prince of Leinster into our protection,

Henrie the 2.
king of Englands this and letter.

tion, grace, and fauour : wherefore whosoever within our iurisdiction will aid and helpe him, our truſtie ſubiect, for the recouerie of his land, let him be aſſured of our fauour and licence in that behalfe.

(1) Derman is in Latine Dermotus, and Horogh is in Latine Murchardus, and are mere Irish names: and for a difference giuen commonlie to a child at his birth or christening: Mac Horogh is a word compounded of Mac which is a sonne and of Horogh the proper name of a man, and so Mac Horogh is the sonne of Horogh: the Latine name is Murchardides, which is to ſaie De Murcharde, or of Horogh: according to the Welsh phrase in which the word is used in the same sense. And this is common to the Irish & Welsh, for they call not any man by the name of his familie or nation as is used in England: but by the name of difference giuen to his father, as in this example: Derman being Horoghs sonne is called Derman Mac Horogh. But this name of Mac Horogh is since turned and become the name of a familie or nation: for by reason that this Mac Horogh was a noble and valiant man about all the rest of his nation in his daies: therefore his sequele and posteritie haue euer since and doe yet keepe that name. Some are of the mind that Horogh and Maurence are one name: but the Latine differences importeth the contrarie, and the one is a mere Irish name, and the other a Welsh, and borrowed out of Wales.

(3) Meth in Latine Media is one of the five portions of Ireland according to the first diuision. It is the least portion being but of eightene cantreds, but yet the best and most fertile, and lieth for the most part all within the English pale: and euer since the conquest of king Henrie the second, hath bene subiect and obedient to the English lawes and gouernment: and because it lieth as it were in the nauill or bowels of the land, it taketh the name accordingly, being called Media, which is the middle. In it is but one bishop and the suffragan, and vnder the primate or archbishop of Armagh. His see is at Trim and his house at Arbraghin. There was no prince sole gouernour of this as was of the other portions: because it was alwaies allowed & allotted to the monarch, whome they called Maximum regem, or Regem Hibernie, as a surplus towards his diet.

(4) Marcus Antonius was a famous and a noble Romane, excelling in wisdom, knowledge and learning all the Romane princes in his daies; as also a verie noble and a valiant man in the fields, hauing attained to great victories and atchieued to sundrie conquests. And yet notwithstanding being married to Cleopatra queene of Egypt, he so doted vpon hir, and was so bewitched in loue of hir: that leauing all his wonted manners, he consumed his whole time in hir companie, and in the end was more infamous for his vicious, disordered, and loose

(5) Troia called also Ilion, was an ancient and a famous citie in Asia the lesse, and situated in the prouince of Dardania, builded by Tros the sonne of king Erichonius, who called it after his owne name. It was a citie verie large, strong, and rich, and in those daies thought impregnable; & yet by means that Helena was rauished, the same was in the end utterly subuerted and destroied: the historie is this. Priamus the king of Troie had by his wife Hecuba a sonne named Paris or Alexander: he dreamed on a time that Mercurius should bring vnto him the three ladies, Venus, Juno, & Minerva, that he should giue his iudgement which was the fairest and most beautifull of them. Then Venus, to haue the iudgement for hir and in hir behalfe, did promise him that he should haue for the same the fairest woman in all Greece. Not long after, Paris being in his fathers court in Troie, there were great speeches made of Helena and of hir passing beautie. She was wife to Menelaus king of Sparta in Greece. Where vpon Paris calling to memorie his former dreame, and also inflamed with a feruent desire to see so faire a ladie, maketh preparation both of ships and of men to saile into Greece. Whobeit, some write that he was sent by the king his father in an ambassage to king Menelaus: but whether it was so or not, certaine it is he went thither, and was receiued with all courtesie, and had his intertainment in king Menelaus house. Paris hauing viewed and beheld the queene Helena, he was not so much warmed before vpon the onelie report of hir, as now inflamed with hir passing forme and beautie; and taking the aduantage of king Menelaus absence, perforce taketh Helena, spoileth the kings house, and carrieth all awaie with him. Menelaus at his returne home, being dismasted at so sudden a change and chance, and grieved with such an iniurie, sendeth his messenger first to Paris, and then his ambassadours to king Priamus for restitution and amends. But when no intreatie could take place nor requests be heard, the Grecians not minding to beare with such an iniurie, doe all consent to be auenged thereof: and therefore with all their force and power doe prepare to giue warres vnto Troie, and make choise of Agamemnon the kings brother to be their captaine. The warres were cruell and long, and endured for the space of ten yeares, but in the end Troie was taken, spoiled, and also destroied.

6 Nero, whose name at the first was Claudius Domitianus, was in his youthfull yeares well disposed to good letters, & giuen to honest exercises. And Claudius the emperor hauing good liking of him, adopted him to be emperor, and married him vnto his daughter. After the death of Claudius, he being emperor, did gouerne well enough the first five yeares: but thenceforth he waxed so vicious, and became so horrible in all dissolute wantonnesse, prodigalitie, monstrous lecherie, couetousnesse, and all other most wicked vices: that he seemed to be bozne to the destruction of the whole world. And in the end he was and became so odious to the whole world, that it was decreed by the senat, and sentence giuen, that he should be beaten and whipt to death. Which thing he perceiuing, fled out of Rome, and finding none that would kill him, did runne himselfe thorough with his owne sword, fateng; & so with wickedlie haue I liued, and most shamefullie shall I die.

7 Domitianus, the brother of Titus, and sonne of Vespasian the emperor, was nothing like vnto them, but altogether resembled & was of the nature and and disposed the empire; but it was so cruell a man, that all men, some of them, had a menial chamber.

and disposition of Nero: for at the first entrie into the empire, he did to his commendation sundrie good acts; but in the end he became so wicked a man and so cruel a tyrant, that he generallie was hated of all men, and abhoyred of his owne familie, of whom some of them, to rid the common wealth from so wicked a member, did murder and kill him in his owne chamber.

(8) His Henrie was the sonne of Henrie the third of that name, and emperor of Rome, he was king of the Romans in his fathers time, and emperor next after him. His father died, he being verie young, and left him to the gouernement of the emperesse his mother; who during his minozitie did rule and gouerne the empire in verie good order: but when he himselfe came to the sole gouernment, great dissensions fell betwene him and his nobles, because he contemned, despised, & oppressed them. He gaue himselfe to wantonnesse and pleasure, and little esteemed the execution of iustice; by means whereof, he had manie enemies, who sought what they might to depose him both of empire and of his life. The pope also and he were for the most part in continuall debates and strifes, and who was the cheefe cause why he was so ouerset and hated of his nobles. And being thus ouermatched and in the hatred both of the tempozall and ecclesiasticall estates, he for verie sorrow languished and pined awaie, and so died.

(9) Augustus was the sonne of Octavianus a senator in Rome, who married Accia the daughter of Julius Cesar, and was first named Octavianus Julius Cesar. His uncle hauing no son, adopted him, made him his heire, and appointed him to be his successor in the empire. After the death of the said Julius, the state by reason he was so cruellie murdered, was maruelouslie troubled and in great perils. But this Octavianus hauing attained to sit in Julius Cessars seat, did so prudentlie order and direct his gouernement, that he did not onelie reduce and restore the citie and empire of Rome to a quietnesse; but also increased the same with the conquests of sundrie nations. Such also were his excellent vertues in wisdom, magnanimitie, courtelie, stabilitie, & liberalitie, and such others; that all people were not onelie raiſed in loue with him, but also came and resorted of all nations vnto Rome, to visit, see, and heare him. And hauing stablished the empire in quietnesse, enlarged it with manie nations, & increased vnto himselfe the vniuersall loue of all people, the senat gaue him not onelie the name of Augustus, but gaue vnto him also the titles of the highest and greatest honors, and was called summus pontifex perpetuus dictator & pater patrie, and yelbed vnto him the whole power and empire of the sole monarch of the world, now reposing that in him alone, which rested before in the senat and people of Rome. These be the fruites when a prudent magistrat and a wise gouernour ruleth in loue and gouerneth in wisdom.

(10) Julius Cesar was the sonne of Lucius Iulius a noble Romane, and came and descended of the ancient house of the Iulies, who were of the race of Aeneas: he was as noble a man as euer Rome brought fourth, and excellent in all respects: most valiant and fortunate in the warres, and verie prudent in the ciuill gouernement, verie well learned, and a notable orator: he deserved well of his common wealth, for he enriched the same with the conquests which he made ouer sundrie nations. But his ambitious mind and immoderate desire to reigne alone, and to be the sole monarch of the world, drowned all the good vertues which were in him, and for which all the nations feared him, the citizens of Rome hated him, and the senators enaied him: and in the end a conspiracie was made for the murdering of him, and by the senators executed. For he on a certeine daie, vpon occasion being come into the senat house, and mistrusting nothing, although he wanted not sufficient warnings before giuen him, was there wounded in two and thirtie places to death, and so murdered.

The returne of Dermont Mac Morogh from king Henrie through England, and of his abode at Brilflow and other places in Wales.

Chap. 2.

Dermont Mac Morogh, hauing receiued great comfort and courtelie of the king, taketh his leaue, and returneth homeward through England. And albeit he had bene verie honourable and liberallie rewarded of the king: yet he comforted himselfe more with the hope of good successe to come, than with liberalitie receiued. And by his daillie longing he came at length vnto the noble towne of (1) Brilflow, where because ships and botes did daillie repaire and come from out of Ireland, and he verie desirous to heare of the state of his people and countrie, did for a time sojorne and make his abode: and whilest he was there he would oftentimes cause the kings letters to be opened, and did then offer great intertainment, and promised liberal wages to all such as would helpe or serue him; but it serued not. At length Gilbert the sonne of Gilbert, earle of Cheyſtore (2) came to see him and to talke with him: and they so long had conferred together, that it was agreed and concluded betwene them, that the erle in the next spring then following, should aid and helpe him: and in consideration thereof, the said Dermont should giue him his onelie daughter and heire to wife, together with his whole inheritance, and the succession into his kingdome. These things orderlie concluded, Dermont Mac Morogh being desirous (as all others are) to see his naturall countrie, departed and toke his iourneie towards S. Davids head or Stone (3) in south Wales: for from thence is the shortest cut ouer into Ireland, the same being not a daies sailing, and which in a faire daie a man may ken and discern. At this time Ríce Fitzgriffith was cheefe ruler vnder the king in those parties; and Dauid the second, then bishop of S. Davids, had great pitie and compassion vpon his distresse, miserie, and calamitie.

Dermont thus languishing and lieng for passage, comforted himselfe as well as he might, sometime drawing and as it were breathing the aire of his countrie, which he seemed to breath and smell, sometimes viewing and beholding his countrie, which in a faire daie a man may ken and discern. At this time Robert Fitzstephans vnder Ríce had the gouernement, & was constable of Aberteſſe the cheefe towne in Carretica (4) and by the treacherie and treason of his owne men was apprehended, taken and deliuered vnto Ríce, and by him was kept in prison three yeares, but now deliuered, vpon condition he should take part and iourne with Griffith against the king. But Robert Fitzstephans, considering with himselfe that on his fathers side (who was a forman) he was the kings naturall subject, although by his mother the ladie Beſſa, daughter to the great Ríce Fitzgriffith, he were cosen germane to the said Fitzgriffith, chose rather to aduenture his life, and to seeke fortune abroad and in forren countries, than to hazard his faith, credit, and fame, to the slander, reproch, and infamie of himselfe, and of his posteritie. At length by the earliest mediation and intercession of Dauid then bishop of S. Davids, and of Dauid Fitzgriffith.

Fitzgerald, which were his halfe brothers by the mothers side, he was set free and at libertie: and then it was agreed and concluded betwene them and Mac Morogh, that he the said Mac Morogh should giue and grant vnto the said Robert Fitzstephans, and Maurence Fitzgerald, the towne of (5) Wexford, with two (6) cantreds of land adioining, & to their heires in fee for euer: and they in consideration thereof, promised to aid and helpe him to recouer his lands the next spring then following: and to be then with him without all faile if wind and weather so serued. Whereupon being wearie of his exiled life and distressed estate, and therefore the more desirous to draw homeward for the recouerie of his owne, and for which he had so long trauelled and sought abroad: he first went to the church of St. Dauids to make his orisons and prayers, and then the weather being faire, and wind good, he aduentured the seas about the middle of August; and hauing a merrie passage, he shortly landed in his ingratfull (7) countrie: and with a verie impatient mind, hazarded himselfe among and through the middle of his enemies; and coming safelie to (8) Fernes, he was verie honorable receiued of the cleargie there: who after their abillitie did refresh and succour him: but he for a time dissembling his princelie estate, continued as a priuat man all that winter following among them.

(1) Bisslow in the old time was named Bocræ, afterwards Benta, and now Bristolium, and standeth vpon the riuer Hamnum which is nauigable, & flieth into Seuerne or the Seuerne seas: in it there are two rodes, the one named Kingrode, five miles distant from Bisslow, in which the ships doe ride. The other is named Hongrode, a place where the ships lie bedded, and this is three miles from Bisslow. It standeth vpon the borders or confines of the prouince of Gloucestershire and Summersteshire: some should haue it to be in the marches and vnder the principallitie, but in the old times it was parcell of the bailie of Bath, which was the metropole of Summersteshire. It is verie old, ancient and honorable, and sometimes named but a towne: but since for defect and other good considerations, honoured with the name and title of a citie, as also is made a seuerall prouince or countie of it selfe, being distinct from all others; hauing a maior and aldermen according to the ancient times, as also two shiriffes according to the latter grants, by whome the same is directed and gouerned. It is the chiefe estemporium in that part of England, the inhabitants being for the most part merchants of great wealth, aduentures, and traffikes with all nations: great delings they haue with the Camber people and the Irish nation, the one of them fast bordering vpon them, and the other by reason of the nearnesse of the seas, and pleasantnesse of the riuer, daillie resorting by water to and from them.

(2) Chepstow is a market towne in Wales, in that prouince named in old time Benta, being now vnder the principallitie of Wales. In times past it was named Strigulla, whereof Richard Strangbow being earle he took his name, being called Comes Strigulensis.

(3) St. Dauids head or stone is the promontorie in west Wales, which lieth and reacheth furthest into the seas towards Ireland: and the same being a verie high hill, a man shall the more easilie discern in a faire daie the countrie of Wexford: for that is the neerest part of Ireland vnto that part of Wales. Not farre from this promontorie or point is the cathedral church of saint Dauids, which is the see of the bishop there: it was and is called Penentia, and was in times past an archbishoplike. But as it is written in the annales of the said church, that in the time of Richard Carew and two of his predecessors bishops there, they were by the kings commandement made to yeld, and submit themselues vnto the metropolitane see of Canturburie.

(4) Aberteife is an old ancient towne standing vpon the mouth of the riuer of Teife, and thereof it taketh his name, that is to saie the mouth of Teife, but now it is called Cardigan. The countrie about it was in times past named Caretica, but now Cardiganshire, so Aberteife is Cardigan towne, and Caretica Cardiganshire.

(5) Wexford in Latine named Guesfordia, is next after Dublin the chiefe towne in Leinster, it lieth full vpon the seas, but the haven is a barred haven and dangerous: from it is the shortest cut out of Ireland into England, if you doe touch and take land either at saint Dauids or at Milford.

(6) A cantred (as Giraldus saith) is a word compounded of the British and of the Irish twongs, and containeth so much ground as wherein are one hundred villages: which in England is termed a hundred. Men of later time to declare the same more plainelie, doe saie that it contained thirtie villages, & euerie village contained eight plough lands. Another saie that a cantred containeth twentie townes, and euerie towne hath eight plough lands arable, besides sufficient pasture in euerie for three hundred kine, and none to annoie another; and euerie plough land containeth six score acres of land Irish, and euerie Irish acre farre exceedeth the content of the common acre.

(7) The place where Wexford landed is named Glaskecarge, it is a creeke or a baie lieng vpon the open seas, and in the countie of Wexford, since there was builded a monasterie which was and is dissolved.

(8) Fernes is the see and cathedral church of the bishop, whose diocesse is the countie of Wexford, it lieth nere in the middle of the prouince of Leinster, and was sometimes a church well adorned and maintained, but now in great ruine and decaye, the bishop & chapter not remaining there at all. There is also a strong fort of the princes, wherein sometimes was kept a garrison at the princes charges, but now one lie a constable is placed therein, and he hath the sole charge thereof.

The going ouer and landing of Robert Fitzstephans and of his companie in Ireland, and of the winning of the towne of Wexford,

Cap. 3.

In the meane time Robert Fitzstephans, not vnmindfull nor carelesse of his word and promise, prepareth and prouideth all things in a readinesse, and being accompanied with thirtie gentlemen of seruice of his owne kinsfolks & certaine armed men, and about three hundred of archers and footmen, which were all of the best chosen and piked men in Wales, they all ship and imbarke themselues in three sundrie barkes, and sailing towards Ireland, they land about the callends of Maie at the (1) Banne. Then was the old prophesie of Merlin fulfilled, which was, that a knight biparted should first enter with force in arms & breake the bounds of Ireland. If you will vnderstand the myserie herof, you must haue respect to his parents, for his father was a Norman and an Englishman, his mother the noble ladie Nesta was a Camber or a Britaine, in his companie also was Beruete of Mont Maurence, a man infortunat, vnrmed, armed, and without all furniture: but he travelling in the behalfe of the earle Richard, to whome he was uncle, was rather a (3) spie than a souldier. On the next daie following Maurice of Desmondgast a (4) lustie and a hardie man, and boine about Milford in west Wales, he with ten gentlemen of service, and a good number of archers imbarke themselves in two ships, and arrive also at the Banne. These men thus landed at the Banne, and not standing well assured of their safetie, by reason their coming was blown abroad through the whole countrie, they with all hast sent messengers to Derron, advertising him of their coming. Whereupon diverse of that countrie, who dwelling upon the sea coasts, and who when fortune frowned had and did shrinke away from Derron, now perceiving that the favour was againe, returned and fawned upon him; according to the saying of the poet in these words:

As fortune to the faith of man doth stand or fall,

Maurice of Desmondgast, as soon as he heard of their landing and coming, sent his bafe son Donold, a valiant gentleman unto them with five hundred men: and verie shortly after he himselfe also followed with great loie and gladnesse. And then when they had renewed their former covenants and leagues, and had sworn each one to the other, to observe the same and to keepe faith: then, though they were people of contrarie dispositions, yet now being good friends and all of one mind, they joine their forces together, and with one consent do march towards the towne of Waterford, which is about twelve miles distant from the Banne. When they of the towne heard thereof, they being a fierce and unrulie people, but yet much trusting to their wonted fortune, came forth about two thousand of them, and were determined to wage and give battell. But when they saw their adversaries armed to be better set in order than in times past, and that the horsemen were well armed with armour and shield shining bright: then upon new chances & changes taking new counsels, they set on fire and burned their suburbs, and retired into the towne.

Fitze Stephens minding and preparing to give the assault, filled the ditches with armed men, and setteth his archers to marke and watch well the turrets of the wals: which things done, he with great shoutes and force giveth the assault. The townesmen within being ready to stand at defense, cast over the wals great peeces of timber & stones, and by that means hurting many, made the rest to give over and retire. Among whom a lustie young gentleman named Robert Barrie, being hot and of a lustie courage, and nothing afraid of death, so he might achieve unto honour, giveth the first adventure to scale the wals: but he was stricken with a great stone upon the headpiece, wherewith he fell headlong downe into the ditch and escaped verie hardlie, for with much ado did his fellowes draw & pull him out of the place. About sixtene yeares after, all his great teeth with the force and violence of this stroke fell out; and that which is verie strange, new teeth grew up in their places. Upon this repulse they all retired and withdrew themselves from the wals, & assembled themselves upon the sea strands, where forthwith they set on fire all such ships and vessels as they could there find. Among whom was one merchant ship lately come out of England laden with wines and corne, which there lay then at anchor, and a company of these lustie youths having gotten votes for the purpose, would have taken hit: which the mariners perceiving, suddenly cut their cables and hoisted up their sailes, & the wind being westerlie and blowing a good gale, they recovered the seas. These youths still following them, had almost lost all and marred the market: for if others their fellows had not made good shift and rowed a good pace after them they would scarce have recovered the land againe. Thus fortune, which is onlie constant in inconstancie, seemed to have forsaken Maurice and Fitz Stephens, and to have left them destitute of all hope and comfort: nevertheless, on the next morow having heard divine service through the whole campe, they determine with better advise and circumspection to give a new assault, & with lustie courages drew to the wals. The townesmen within seeing this, began to distrust themselves, & to consider how most unnaturally and unchristianly they had rebelled against their prince & soveraigne: wherupon being better advised, they send messengers to him to intreat for peace. At length by the earnest intercession and mediation of two bishops, and certelie good and peaceable men which were within the towne, peace was granted, and foure of the best & chiefe men within the towne were delivered and given for pledges and hostages, for the true keeping of the peace and their fidelitie. Maurice of Desmondgast, to gratifie his men in their first successes, and to acquit the first adventures, did according to his former promise and covenant give unto Robert Fitz Stephens and Maurice Fitz Gerald the towne of Waterford, and the territories thereunto adjoining and appertaining, and unto Heruic of Mount Poice he gave in fee two cantreds, lying on the sea side betwixen Waterford and Waterford.

(1) The Banne is a little creeke lying in the countrie of Waterford, next to either a fisher towne, which is belonging to the bishop of that diocesse, the open seas being on the east and not farre from the haven mouth of Waterford on the south: and as it should seeme, Fitz Stephens and his companie mistooke the place or were driven in there, the same being verie unapt for a harborow: but the same being the place of the first receipt of Englishmen, there were certelie monuments made in memorie thereof, and were named the Banna & the Boenne, which were the names (as the common fame is) of the two greatest ships in which the Englishmen there arrived.

(2) A knight biparted. The prophesie was not onely verified in respect of the parents of Robert Fitz Stephens, the one being a Norman Baron, and the other a Camber: but also in respect of his armes and ensigne which were biparted being of two sundrie changes, namelie partie per pale gules, and ermine a saltier counterchanged. For commonlie all prophesies have their allusions unto armes, and by them they are discovered, though at the first not so appearing before the event thereof.

(3) Gentlemen. The Latine word is Milites, which in the now common speeches is termed knights, a name of worship and honour: but the word it selfe importeth and meaneth men expert and skillfull to serve in the wars, whether it be on foot or horsebacke. In times past when men ruled by the sword, then such as were valiant and of good experience grew in to credit and estimation; and the people did make choise of such to governe, rule, and defend them, and who for their excellent vertues were called Nobiles, which in English is gentlemen. And then men being ambitious of honour, did contend who might best excell in feats of prowesse and chivalrie: some delivring to excell in the service on foot: and because they used chiefly the target and shield, they took their name thereof, & were called Scutiferi. Some practised chiefly the service on horsebacke, and they (according to the manner of their service) were named Equites: but both the one and the other were in processe of time called Armigeri, in English esquires: and this is taken for a degree somewhat above the estate of a one.

lie gentleman. And for so much as service in the fields did carie awaie with it the greatest honoꝝ and credit, and princes willing & desirous to incourage gentlemen to excell that waie and in that kind of service, they deuised a third degree of honour named knightthod. And this, as it excellith the others before and not to be giuen but for great desert: so to increase the credit and estimation thereof, it was not to be giuen but with great solemnities and ceremonies; and the person so to be honozed, was to be adorned with such ornaments as do speciallie apperteyne to the furniture of such service, as namelie a sword, a target, a helme, a paire of spurres, and such like: and they which were thus aduanced were named Milites or knights, and thus the name of service was turned to the name of woꝝship: yea this degree did grow and way to be of such credit, honoꝝ and estimation; that kings and princes were and would be verie circumspect and aduised, before they would dub or promote anie man to this estate. Wherefore considering the estate, nature & woꝝship of a knight, and weighing also the course of this historie, it cannot be intended that all they which went ouer and serued in this conquest, though they were named Milites, that therfore they should be compted & taken for knights of woꝝship and high calling: but that they were such as were expert and skillfull to serue in warres according to the nature of the woꝝd Miles. Wherefore I haue and do English the woꝝd Miles in this historie a gentleman of service.

(4) A spie, not to watch the doings of his countrymen, whereby to take them in a trip, but to note, marke and consider the nature, maner, and disposition of the countrey and people: whereby to aduertise the earle how he should pꝛouide and order his doings against his comming ouer into the land.

(5) Paucice of Pendalgast was doubtlesse a valiant gentleman, and borne and bred in west Wales, in or about the pꝛouince of Penbroke. He is not named nor mentioned in some books of this historie; but I finding in such exemplars as I haue of best credit, do thinke I should haue done wrong to haue omitted him. There are yet of his race, posteritie and name, remaining at these daies in the countie of Wexford, and elsewhere.

Of the ouerthrow giuen in Ossorie, and of the submission of the king thereof.

Chap. 4.

These things thus done and ended as they would themselves, they increase their armie with the towncsmen of Wexford, and being then about thre thousand men, they march towards (1) Ossorie, whereof Donald was then the prince, & who of all the rebels was the most mortall enemie which Mac Morogh had. For on a time he hauing the said Dermons eldest son in his ward and handfast, was in gealoussie of him, and mistrusted him with his wife: whereupon he did not onlie shut him vp in a closter prison; but also to be auenged thereof, and of other supposed injuries, putteth out both of his (2) eyes. First then Dermon and his companie enter into Ossorie, but they durst not march or aduenture anie further than to the midst of the countrey, because the whole countrey else was full of woods, streits, passes, and bogs, and no waie at all for men to trauell. But when they met and encountered with the Ossorians, they found not cowards nor dastards, but valiant men, and who stood well to the defense of their countrey, and manfullie resisted their enemies. For they trusted so much to their wonted good fortune and successe in such like affaires, that they thzonke not a whit from them, but dꝛaue them perforce out of the bogs and woods, and followed them into the champaine countrey.

Robert Fitzstephans being in the plaine and open fields with his hoꝝlemen, and seeing that the Ossorians being there he had the aduantage of them, giueth most fiercelie the onset vpon them, and slue a great number of them; and such as strayed and were scattered abꝛode, they either slue them or ouerthrew them: and such as were ouerthrowne, the footmen with their Galloglasses axes did cut off their heads. And thus hauing gotten the victorie, they gathered vp and brought before Dermon Mac Morogh thre hundred of their enemies heads, which they laid & put at his feet; who turning euerie of them one by one to know them, did then for soꝝ hold vp both his hands, and with a lowd voice thanked God most highlie. Among these there was the head of one, whom especiallie and aboue all the rest he mortallie hated. And he taking vp that by the heare and eares, with his teeth most horrible and cruellie bit awaie his nose and lips.

After this, they made a rode through the whole countrey, & marched almost to the uttermost parts, and still as they passed they murdered the people, spoiled, burned, and wasted the whole countrey. And thereupon the prince of Ossorie by the aduise of his friends, maketh sute and intreateth for peace: which obtained (although in verie deed it was but a colour red and a dissembled peace on both sides) they put in their hostages, made fealtie, and were sworne to be faithfull and true to Mac Morogh, as unto their lawfull and true lord. In these seruices, as in all other, Robert of Barrie, and Spellerius had the pꝛicke and praise, and shewed themselves of all others the most valiant. Both these young gentlemen were nephues to Fitzstephans (4) the one being his brothers sonne, and the other his sisters sonne. They both were of like valiantnesse, but of sundrie dispositions and natures. For Spellerius being ambitious and desirous of honour, referred all his doings to that end; and whatsoeuer he attempted, was to aduance his fame and credit, making more account to be reported and haue the name of a valiant man, than to be so in deed. The other being of a certeine naturall disposition both noble and valiant, was neither a greedy seeker of land and praise, nor an ambitious crauer of fame and honour; but being alwaies among the best, did rather seeke and trauell to the best, than to be onelie counted the best.

Besides, he was naturallie indued with such a maidenlie shamesfastnesse, and no bragger nor boaster, would neither gloriſie his doings, nor yet like well of anie others which would so do of him. By means whereof it came to passe, that the lesse ambitious and desirous he was of honour, the more the same followed him: for glorie and honour follow alwaies vertue, as the shadow the bodie, shunning them who do most seeke for hir, & following them who do leest regard hir. And manie men are the more liked of manie, because they seeme not to like of anie: and praise, fame, and honour most commonlie, the lesse it is esteemed, the more soner it is had & gotten. It fortuned on a time that the armie thus being in Ossorie, they did on a night incampe themselves about an old castell. These two gentlemen as they were euer wont, late togither, and suddenlie there was a great noise, as it were of an infinit number of men, which seemed to bꝛeake in and rush in among them, with great force and a rage, destroient all that euer was, and making a great noise with clashing of their harnesse, and striking of their bills togither, and therewithall such a noise and a shout, as though heauen and earth would haue come together.

These kind of phantasmes and illusions doe often times happen in Ireland, especiallie when there be a mie hostings. With this noise the more part of the armie was so afraid and dismayd, that for the most part they all fled, some into the woods, and some into the bogs, euerie one seeking a place where to hide and succour himselfe. But these two onelie tarteng behind, raught to their weapons, and forthwith full boldlie ran to Fitzstephans tents, and called againe together all such as were thus scattered, and encouraged them to take their weapons, and to stand to defence. Robert of Barrie in all his huiellie burle, standing alone by himselfe musing, except a man or two of his owne men about him, did aboue all others not without anie great admiration of manie, and to the great græse of such as enuied him, best acquit himselfe. For among other good gifts which were in him, this was speciallie reported of him; that no feare, or force, no sudden mishap or misadventure whatsoeuer, could at anie time make him afraid or discomfited, and to lie awake. For howsoeuer things fell out and happened, he was alwaies at hand, and in a readines with his weapons to the fight. And such a one as is alwaies ready to abide whatsoeuer shall happen, and to preuent what mischeues maie insue, is by all mens iudgements counted the best and valiantest man. This man was he, who in this Irish warres was the first who either was stricken or hurt. As concerning the foresaid phantasme, this one thing is much noted of it; that in the morning following, when all things were pacified and quieted, the grasse and weeds which the night before stood there vppright and of a great height, did now in the morrow lie downe flat vpon the ground, as though the same had bin troden with great multitude of people, and yet was it most certaine that none had bene there at all.

(1) There be two Dioceses, the one named the hyper Diocese, which is of the ancient inheritance of the Macguillathrikes, and who are the barons thereof; and this lieth in the diocesse of Leighling: the other lieth on the north of Dymond, and is vnder the iurisdiction of the earle of Dymond, who is also the earle thereof, being named earle of Dymond and Diocese. It is a diocesse of it selfe, and the bishop thereof is named the bishop of Diocese, whose see and house is at Bilkennie. It is parcell of the prouince of Leinster and vnder the obedience then of Dermot Mac Morogh.

(2) This was a courteous kind of punishing, for comonlie such is the reuenging nature of the mere Irishman, that albeit he can or doe late neuer so manie plagues and punishments vpon his enimie: yet is he neuer satisfied, vntill he haue also his life, pea and manie not therewith contented, but will utter their wicked nature euen vpon the dead carcase, as doth appeare in this chapter of the same Mac Morogh, who finding one of his enimies heads, was not satisfied, vntill in most cruell maner he did with his teeth bite awaie his nose and his lips.

(3) There are in Ireland three sorts of degrees of soldiers: the first is the horsleman, who commonlie is a gentleman borne, and he is armed with such armor as the seruice of that countrie requirerh: the second degree is the kernagh, & he also is a gentleman or a freholder borne, but not of that abilitie to mainteine a horse with his furniture, and therefore he is a light souldier on foot; his armor is both light and slender, being a skull, a left gantlet or a target, a sword and skeine, and three or foure darts: the third degree is the Galloglas, who was first brought in to this land by the Englishmen, and thereof taketh his name. For Galloglas is to saie, an English peo-man or seruant; his armor is a skull, a sacke, an habergeon or shirt of male, a sword and a sparre, otherwise named a Galloglas or halbert, & this man is counted the best souldier on foot, and the strength of the battell. These in all hostings haue attending vpon them a number of boies and kernes, and who doe spoile and kill all such as be ouerthrowne and hurt in the fields.

10 The conspiracie of Rotherike monarch of Ireland, and of the residue of the princes against Mac Morogh and Fitzstephans.

Chap. 5.

In the meane time the wheele of fortune is turned vpside downe, and they which before seemed to stand aloft, are now afraid of standing: and they which were on high, in perill now to fall. For as soon as it was noised through the whole land of the good successe of Dermot, and of the coming in of strangers into the land, and whereof they were much afraid: Rotherike prince of (1) Conagh, and (2) monarch of the whole land, considering how of small things great do grow; and considering that by the coming in of strangers, the whole land was in some perill; sendeth abroad his messengers, and summoneth a parlement of the whole land: who being assembled, and the matter at full debated, they do with one voice and consent conclude and determine to make open warres, and to giue the battell vnto Mac Morogh. And forthwith euerie man hauing made ready both men and armor to his uttermost power, do ioine all their forces and strengths together, and with maine and strength do invade the countrie of Dkenile in Leinster.

Dermot Mac Morogh in this distresse was somewhat disquieted, and in a great perplexitie; partly because some of his (but glossing) friends distrusting the sequele, did thinke from him, & hid themselves: some of them most traitorouslie, contrarie to their oath and promise, were fled to his enimies: and so in this his distresse he had verie few friends, sauing onlie Robert Fitzstephans and the Englishmen with him. He therefore with such companie as he had, went vnto a certaine place not farre from Ffernes, which was compassed and inuironed round about with great thicke woods, high stikle hilles, and with bogs and waters; a place so strong of it selfe, as it was in a maner inaccessible, and not to be entred into. And as soon as they were entred into the same, they forthwith by the aduise of Fitzstephans (3) did fell downe trees, plashed the wood, cast great trenches and ditches round about, and made it so strait, narrow, crooked, and strong, that there was no passage nor entrie for the enimie: and yet by their art and industrie it was made much more strong.

(1) Conagh, in Latine Conacia, is one of the five portions of the land, according to the ancient diuision. In it are thirtie cantreds or baronies; and before and vntill the conquest they were vnder the government of the sept of the O Connors, the eldest man of which sept by the Irish law was ouer the prince: but at the conquest it was giuen to certaine noble men of England, & by certaine descents it came to sir Walter de Burgo, who was lord of that whole prouince and earle of Wolsfer. From these Burghs descend the Burghs now being in Conagh, they being of a base line, and first were put onlie in trust to keepe that countrie to the vse of their lords, who then dwelled and remained in England. This countrie lieth betwene Wlster in the north, Mounster in the the south, and the seas in the west. The chiefeest and onelic merchant towne or emporium thereof is Calloway.

(2) There was alwaies one principall gouernor among the Irish, whom they named a monarch; and he was commonlie either of the Mac Carthies in Mounster, or of the Moroghs in Leinster, or of the Connoys in Connagh, as this Rothorike was. He was elected & chosen by the common consent of all the nobilitie of the land: & being once chosen, all they did homage and fealtie vnto him. The province of Menth, which was the least of the fine seuerall portions, was reserved alwaies vnto him for his diet. For though the Dinolaghins did dwell in Menth, and were great inheritors or possessorers there, yet they were not counted for princes as the other were. This monarch did gouerne the whole land vniuersallie, & all the princes were directed by him: in him it laie whether it should be peace or warre; and what he commanded was alwaies done.

(3) The manner of the Irish is to keepe them selves from force of the enemies, or in the bogs, or in the woods: the one of his nature is so strong as no horseman is to aduenture into the same; the other with industrie they make strong, by felling of trees & plashing of the woods; and by these means the horsemen (in whom is all the strength of their warres) can haue no passage nor entrie to the enemy, but must either retire, or go on foot, or seeke some other waie. If they will and must needs passe that waie, they must of necessitie go on foot, and then they are too weake, and easilie to be overcome by the Irish, whose seruice is onelic on foot: therefore they do chiefeleie keepe themselves in such places, as where they can take the aduantage of others, and not others of them.

The description of Dermon Mac Morogh, and of the message of Rothorike O Connor sent vnto him for peace.

Cap. 6.

Dermon Mac Morogh was a tall man of stature, and of a large and great bodie, a valiant and a bold warrior in his nation: and by reason of his continuall haloting and crying his voice was hoarse: he rather chose and desired to be feared than to be loued: a great oppressor of his nobilitie, but a great aduancer of the poore and weake. To his owne people he was rough and greuous, and hatefull vnto strangers; he would be against all men, and all men against him. Rothorike minding to attempt anie waie whatsoever, rather than to aduenture and wage the battell, sendeth first his messengers with great presents vnto Fitzstephans, to persuaide and intreat him: that for so much as he made no challenge nor title to the land, that he would quietlie, and in peace returne home againe into his owne countrie, but it auailed not. When they went vnto Mac Morogh himselfe, & persuaided him to take part with Rothorike, and to ioine both their forces and armies in one, and then with might and maine to giue the onset vpon the strangers, and so vtterlie to destroye them. And in this doing, he should haue Rothorike to his good friend, and all Leinster in rest and quietnesse: manie reasons also they alledged concerning their countrie and nation; but all was to no purpose.

The speeches and oration which Rothorike O Connor made vnto his soldiours.

Chap. 7.

Rothorike O Connor, seeing that by these his deuises and practises he could do no good at all, and thinking that forsomuch as he could not auaille with words, he with force and armes, as his last remedie and helpe, prepareth his armor, and maketh for the battell; and assembling his people together, maketh vnto them these speeches. The right noble and valiant defenders of your countrie and libertie, let vs consider with what people, and for what causes we are now to fight and wage the battell. What enemy of his owne countrie, that tyrant ouer his owne people, and an open enemy vnto all men, and who sometimes was an exiled man; see how he being inuironed with the force of strangers, is now returned, & mindeth the vtter destruction of vs all, and of this his nation. He enuieing the safetie of his countrie and countrey men, hath procured and brought in a strange nation vpon vs, that by the helpe of a hatefull people he might satisfie and more effectually accomply his malice, which otherwise by no means he could haue brought to passe. He then being an enemy, hath brought in that enemy which hath bene euer hatefull both vnto him, and vnto vs; and who are most greedy to haue the soueraintie & dominion ouer vs all, protesting and openly affirming, that by a certeine fatall destiny they are to be rulers ouer this land; yea, & so far hath he shed out his benonie, and almost euerie man is so inuironed therewith, that now no fauour nor mercie is to be theiued. A cruell beast, yea more cruell than euer was beast! for to satisfie his insatiable malice, and to be auenged with the bloudshedding of his owne people, he spareth neither himselfe, nor his countrie, nor sex. This is he who is a most cruell tyrant ouer his owne people: this is he who with the force and helpe of strangers vseth all force and crueltye against all men. He deserueth well therefore to be hated of all, which seeketh to be an enemy vnto all. Looke therefore (ye worthie citizens) well to your selues; I saie loke and consider well how by these meanes, I meane by ciuill discord, all realmes & nations haue for the most part bene ouerthrowen & vanquished. (1) Julius Cesar minding to inuade Britaine had the repulse twise, & was driven out by the Britons. But when Androgeus fell at variance with the king, he then to be reuenged, sent againe for Julius, who ther vpon returned and conquered the land. (2) The same Julius also conquered all the west parts of the world, but when he waxed & became ambitious, & would be a sole monarch, & haue the whole gouernement in himselfe, then discord was raised, & debate was rise, & by that meanes all Italie was filled with murders and slaughters. (3) The Britons being at discord with their king, procured Gurmundus, who then was a terror to all the ocean Isles, that he with the Saxons should pursue and make wars vpon their king, who so did: but in the end to their owne confusion and destruction. Likewise not long after (4) Kemberthus the French king, being an enemy to his owne people, and at discord with them, he procured the said Gurmundus to aid and helpe him to subdue his people, who so did: but thereof he had but bad successe. Therefore let vs with one mind like to these Frenchmen stand stoutlie to the defense of our countrie, and couragiously giue the onset vpon our enemies. And whyles these strangers be but few in number, let vs lustilie issue out vpon them: for fire whyles it is but in sparkles is soon covered, but when

when it is in great flames, it is the harder to be quenched. It is good therefore to meet with things at the beginning, and to prevent sickness at the first growing: for diseases by long continuance having taken deepe root, are hardlie to be cured. We therefore, who are to defend our countrie and libertie, and to leaue to our posteritie an immortall fame: let vs ballantlie, and with a good courage aduenture and giue the onset, that the ouerthrow of a few may be a terror vnto manie; and that by this example all other forren nations may be afraid to aduenture the like attempt.

(1) Julius Cesar hauing receiued two repulses, retired & toke shipping, being in an vtter despaire & not minding to returne anie more. Whereupon Casibelan then king of the land called & assembled all his nobles to London, where for ioie he kept a great and a solemne feast, and at the same were vsed all such games and pastimes, as in those daies were most accustomed. And at a wrestling game then it chanced two yong gentlemen, the one being nephew to the king, and the other cousine to the erle of London (Kent) to fall at variance, & in the end the kings nephew was slaine. The king much grieued therewith sent for the earle, whose name was Androgenus: and bicause he would not come vnto him he made wars vpon him. The earle considering in what distresse he was, and how farre vnable to incounter the power and withstand the displeasure of the king, sendeth his messenger with his letters vnto Julius Cesar, and besought him most earnestlie to returne with his armie, and he would aid and helpe him against the king with all the power he had. Julius Cesar glad of these tidings returneth with all speed, and in the end hath the victorie: and thus by meanes of debate and diuision the relme, which otherwise was thought to be impregnable, was subuerted and made tributarie.

(2) Julius Cesar hauing happie and fortunate successe in all his affaires, grew into such a liking of himselfe, that he would needs be the sole monarch and emperour ouer the whole world, taking foule euill that according to the ancient gouernement of the Romans anie one should be ioined with him: and ambitiouslie seeking the same, he became dreadfull to the people, lothsome to his friends, and in the displeasure of the senat: who maligning at his aspiring and mistrusting the sequels thereof, conspired his death, and in the end he comming into the senat house, and mistrusting nothing, was murdered and slaine.

(3) At this time Careticus was king and ruled ouer Britaine, now named England, who was so ambitious a man in all respects, that he became hateful both to God and man: and his subiects not abiding his tyrannie, nor boking his wickednesse, fell at diuision with him. Whereupon Curmundus then king of Ireland was procured (some saie by the Britons and some saie by the Saxons) who being entered into the land, and seeking by all the meanes they could to be the sole lords of the land, to inuade the land, which he did, and by the helpe of the Saxons drove the king out of his realme into Wales. And the Saxons hauing thus their wils done also all the Britons out, who from thenceforth hauing lost the land of Britaine, did inhabit themselves in Wales, Cornewall, and elsewhere, where they might haue refuge and succour. And thus though they were reuenged of their king, yet they themselves in the end felt the smart thereof: for they were all destroyed or banished: such are the fruits of dissention and debate.

(4) This Hembertus was not king of France, but as (Gaufrid saith) was nephew to the king: and the land being then in great troubles, this Hembert made title vnto it, and seeking by all the meanes and waies he could how to compasse the same, procured Curmundus to helpe and aid him, promising him great rewards. Whereupon Curmundus passed ouer into France, where he had but an euill successe: for there was he slaine, Hembert ouerthrowne and the French nation preuailed. And hereupon Rotherike taketh an occasion to encourage his people to stand to their tackle, and ballantlie to withstand Mac Murogh, who as Hembert had procured in Curmundus; so had he stocked in Englishmen to overrun his countrie.

The oration and speeches of Mac Murogh to his souldiors and people.

Cap. 8.

Mac Murogh beheld his men, & perceiving them to be somewhat dismayed and out of heart, framed his speech to recomfort them, and thus saith vnto them. Ye men of Leinster, truth and kindred in all aduentures hath hitherto ioined vs in one fellowship: wherefore let vs now plucke by our hearts and like men stand to our defence. For why, that wicked and ambitious man Rotherike, the author of all wickednesse & mischiefe, who desirous to haue the sole souereignetie and dominion doth now determine (which God forbid) either to drive vs cleane out of our countrie, or vtterlie to destroye vs: and marke you now how he listeth by his head and looketh aloft. He is so proud and glorieth so much in his great multitude, that by ambition and pride he measureth & valueth his force and strength: but yet (for all that) manie times a small number being balliant and well appointed are better and haue preuailed against great troops, being but sluggards and vnarmed. If he make chalenge and pretend title to Leinster, bicause the same sometimes hath bene tributarie to some one king of Conagh, then by the same reason (1) we also maie demand and chalenge all Conagh: for both thereof and of all Ireland our ancestors haue bene the sole gouernors & monarchs. But to the purpose and to speake plainelie, he seeketh not to rule and to reigne as a monarch, but to usurpe and destroye as a tyrant, to drive vs out of our countrie, to succedd into euery mans right & inheritance; and so alone to rule the rois, and to be master ouer all.

Andie there are which do brag of their great multitudes, and put their trust therein: but let them be well assured that we Leinster men though we be but few in number; yet we neuer were nor yet are afraid to incounter euen with the best & proudest. For why, victorie is not gotten, neither doth it stand alwaies in the great multitude of people, but in vertue and ballantnesse, in strength and courage. We on our sides against pride, haue humilitie: against wrongs, equitie: against arrogancie, modestie: and against intemperance, discretion & moderation: and these vertues are to fight for vs. Men do not alwaies attaine vnto victorie by great troops and multitudes of people, but by vertues. The lawes of all nations do grant and allow to resist and withstand force and iniurie with force and strength: it is a fauourable cause to fight for our countrie, and to defend our patrimonie. And forsomuch as they contend for the gaine, but we to eschew the losse; let vs be of a good courage: we stand vpon a good ground, and our seat is naturallie verie strong of it selfe, as also by our industrie made more strong: but by reason of the streitnesse thereof, the greater the companie is therein, the more comberous and troublesome it will be: and and yet to win the victorie, a small companie being valiant, courageous, and of a good agreement shall serue and be sufficient.

(1) There be (as is said) five portions of Ireland, and euerie of them (except such which was reserved to the monarch for the time being for his diet) had their particular princes, & none of these did hold anie one of the other: but of some one of them chosse was made by the whole estates of the land to be the monarch; and he for the time being did take and receiue homage and fealtie of all the others, not in respect that he was a particular prince, but because he was the monarch. And this Mac Morogh allegeth for himselfe, denieng that he held anie of his lands of the king of Connagh otherwise than in respect that he was the monarch.

The oration of Robert Fitzstephans made vnto his companions and souldiors.

Chap. 9.

When Dermot Mac Morogh had ended his speech, Robert Fitzstephans calleth his companie together, & thus he speaketh vnto them. Ye lustie yong men and my companions in warres, which haue abiden with me in manie perils; & yet still of noble minds & valiant courages: if we would now consider with our selues, what we are, vnder what captaine, and wherefore we do adventure and attempt these great enterprises, no doubt we shall excell in our wonted valiantnesse, and good fortune shall be on our side. We first came and descended from the (1) Troians, and since are of the French blood and race: of the one we haue these our noble and valiant minds, and of the other the vse and experience in feals of armes: wherefore being thus descended of noble progente by two manner of waies and in two respects; as we be now well armed and appointed, so let vs also be of valiant minds and lustie courages: and then no doubt this rascall and naked people shall neuer be able to resist no: withstand vs.

Besides you see and know how that at home, partly by the subtil and craftie dealings of our owne cousines and kinsmen, and partly by the secret malice and deuises of our familiars and acquaintances, we are bereft & spoiled both of our countrie and patrimonie. And now we are come hither, not as greedy crauers for large stipends, nor yet as couetous pollers for gaine and lucre: but onlie in respect and consideration to haue and iniole the lands & townes to vs, and to our heires after vs, offered and promised. We are not come hither like pirats or thieues to rob and spoile, but as faithfull friends, to recouer and to restore this noble and liberall gentleman to that his patrimonie, whereof he is spoiled and dispossessed. He it is that hath allured and flockt vs hither; he it is that loueth our nation: and he it is who purposeth to plant and settle vs and our heires in this Ile. And peradventure by these meanes the whole land, which is now diuided into five prouinces or portions, may be deduced and brought into one, and the same in time be whole vnto vs and our heires: if that by our valiantnesse and prowesse the victorie be gotten, and Mac Morogh by our seruice, meanes, and industrie be restored, and then the whole dominion to vs and to our heires for euer to be reserved.

O how great were then our honor & glorie! yea so great, that with the perils of our bodies, losse of our liues, and the dangers of death, it is to be wished for, sought, & aduentured. For why should we be affraid? and what is death? I praise you: Is it anie other than a short delate or distance of time, & as it were a short slepe betwene this transitorie life and the life eternall to come? What is death (I saie) but a short passage from vaine and transitorie things to perpetuall and euerslasting ioies? And certeine it is we must all once die: for it is that ineuitable destinie, which is common to all men, and can be eschewed of no man: for be we idle, and do nothing worthe of perpetuall fame and memorie; or be we well occupied, whereof industriously praise and honor: yet die shall we. When the matter being so, let them be affraid of death, who when they die, all things die with them: but let not them thinke no: be dismayed, whose vertue and fame shall neuer die but liue for euer. Wherefore ye worthe men, who are enobled for your valiantnes and famous for your vertues, let vs with bold minds and good courages giue the onset vpon our enemies, that in vs our noble race & progente be not stained, but that either by a glorious victorie, or a famous death, we do atchiue to perpetuall fame and honor.

How Rothorike intreateth for peace and obtaineth the same.

Chap. 10.

Rothorike, when he had well considered with himselfe how the euent of wars are doubtful and vncertaine, & that as the wiseman saith; A man of wisdom and vnderstanding is to trie all manner of waies rather than the warres: and also being somewhat timorous to aduenture the battell with strangers, sendeth his messengers by all the waies they best might, to intreat for peace: who at length through their industrie, and by the mediation of good men, and by Gods goodnesse who prospered the same, obtained the same, and which was concluded in this order. That Dermot Mac Morogh should haue and enioy all Leinster in peace and quietnesse, to him and to his heires, acknowledging Rothorike to be the chiefe king and monarch of all Ireland, and yelding vnto him that seruice and dutie as vnto him therein appertained. And for the performance hereof, he deliuered his sonne Cuthur in pledge and for an hostage. To whom Rothorike then promised, vpon condition, that the peace and certeine other points obserued, he would giue his daughter vnto him in marriage. These things being openlie published, each partie swore the one to the other, for the performance and keeping of the same. And yet what soeuer the vther shew, it was secretly agreed betwene them, that Dermot Mac Morogh, when and as soon as he had quietly settled Leinster in good order, he should returne and send home all the English people, as also in the meane time should not procure anie more to come over.

Of the comming of Maurice Fitzgerald into Ireland: of the yelding vp of Dublin to Dermot Mac Morogh; and of the warres betwene the two princes of Connagh and of Limerike.

These things thus done & performed, and fortune smiling with a more sauorable countenance to smile vpon them, behold Maurice Fitzgerald, of whom we spake before, who was the halfe brother by the mothers side to Robert Fitzstephans, arrived at Waterford in two ships, hauing in his companie (which he brought) ten gentlemen of seruice, thirtie horsemen, and of archers and footmen about one hundred. A man he

he was both valiant and cunning man of his worth all about him. This new enraged the king and to call for yong whelpes past done by minding to and marcherie, but left a hold led the (1) which place yet by indolence. Morogh panie of the king vnto him in the border, they fame, and the citizens of began to quicke and in fame, did true and fir time there Rothorike reke. he was both honest and wise, and for his truth and valiantnesse verie noble and famous. He was a man of his word, and constant of mind, and there-withall adorne with a certeine kind of womanlike shamefastnesse. Mac Morogh being verie glad of this new repaire, as also much animated and encouraged therewith, beghinneth to thinke vpon old sores, and to call to remembrance the great iniuries and wrongs which the citizens of Dublin had in times past done both vnto his father and to himselfe; and minding to be reuenged thereof, bendeth his force, and marcheth with his whole armie to besiege the citie, but left Fitzstephans behind, who was then building a hold or castell vpon a certeine rockie hill called the (1) Caricke, about two miles from Wexford, which place although it were verie strong of it selfe, yet by industrie and labour it was made much stronger. Morice Fitzgerald, with all the force and companie of the Englishmen, accompanied and attended Mac Morogh, who was his guide, and conducted him vnto Dublin. As soon as they were entred within the borders and confines of the territorie of Dublin, they forthwith burned, spoiled, and wasted the same, and the whole countrie thereto adioining. The citizens of Dublin seeing and considering the same, began to quaille, and their hearts fainted, and doe seke and intreat for peace; and hauing obtained the same, did sweare fealtie, and gaue in hostages for the true and firme keeping of the same. In this meane time there fell a great enimitie and quarell betwene Rothorike of Connagh and Donald prince of Limerick. And as soon as Rothorike was with all his force entered into the countrie of Limerick, Dermot Mac Morogh sent forthwith Robert Fitzstephans with all his power, to aid and helpe the said Donald: for he was Dermons sonne in law, by whose means he gat the victorie, and Rothorike with shame was driuen to retire out of the countrie, and to returne to his owne home: and left the chefferie which he demanded. In these and all other like seruises, Robert Barrie and Meilerius carried the best praise and commendations. At this time was sene a woman who had a great beard, and a man vpon his backe, as a horse; of whom I haue already spoken in my topographie.

(1) The said Caricke (as is written) is distant from the towne of Wexford about two English miles, and standeth vpon a high rocke, and is inuironed on two sides with the riuer which floweth to Wexford towne, and it is verie deepe and nauigable: the other two sides are vpon the maine land, which is a verie fertile soile, and in height almost equall with the castell. It was at the first made but of rods and fustices, according to the maner in those daies; but since builded with stone, and was the strongest fort then in those parts of the land: but being a place not altogether sufficient for a prince, and yet it was thought too good and strong for a subiect, it was pulled downe, defaced and rased, and so dooth still remaine.

Dermot Mac Morogh sendeth for the earle Richard, who forthwith maketh great preparation for his coming.

Chap. 12.

Mac Morogh, being by meanes of his god successe well quieted and satisfied, be-thinketh himselfe now of greater matters, and demiseth how and by what means he might recover his old and ancient rights; as also purchase all Connagh to his subiection. And herein he used a secret conference with Fitzstephans and Fitzgerald, vnto whom he bitterly and discouereth all his whole mind and intent: who forthwith gaue his answer that his deuise was verie easilie to be compassed, if he could get a greater supplie and aid of Englishmen. Wherevpon he made most earnest requests vnto them, both for the procuring of their kinsmen and countriemen, as also for the furthering to effect his purpose and deuise. And that he might the better persuade them herevnto, he offereth to either one of them his daughter and heire in marriage with the inheritance of his kingdome: but they both being already married, refused the offer. And at length after much talke they thus concluded, that he should with all speed send his messengers with his letters vnto the earle Richard, of whom we spake before, and vnto whom he the said Mac Morogh at his being at or about Bussow, had promised his daughter to wife, which letters were as followeth.

Dermot Mac Morogh prince of Leinster, to Richard earle of Chepstone, and sonne of Gilbert the earle sendeth greeting. If you doe well consider and marke the time as we doe which are in distresse, then we doe not complaine without cause nor out of time: for we haue already sene the (1) fozkes and swallows, as also the summer birds are come, and with the weesterlie winds are gone againe; we haue long looked and wished for your coming, and albeit the winds haue bene at east and easterlie, yet hitherto you are not come vnto vs: wherefore now linger no longer, but hasten your selfe hither with speed, that it may thereby appeare not want of god will, nor forgetfulness of promise, but the iniurie of time hath bene hitherto the cause of your long staie. All Leinster is already whole yeldd vnto vs: and if you will speedlie come away with some strong compa-nie and force, we doubt not but that the other soure portions will be recovered and adioined to this the fift portion. Your coming therefore the more speed-die it is, the more gratefull; the more hastie, the more foill; and the sooner, the better welcome: and then our mislike of your long lingering shall be recompensed by your sone coming, for friendship & good will is recovered and nourished by mutuall offices, and by benefits it groweth to a more assurednesse.
When earle Richard had read these letters, he taketh aduise with his friends, and taking some comfort and stomach of the god successe of Fitzstephans, whereof he was at the first both fearefull and doubt-full, fullie determineth to bend his whole force and power to follow this seruise and hostings. This earle was a man of a verie noble parentage, and descended of verie honorable ancestors; but yet more famous in name, than rich in purse; more noble in blood, than endowd with wit; and greater in hope of succession, than rich in possessions. Well, he thought long yet he could wend himselfe ouer into Ireland, and therefore to compass the same to god effect, maketh his repaire to king Henrie the second, and most humble praieeth and beseecheth him that he will either restore him to such possessions, as by inheritance did appertene vnto him; or else to grant him the libertie to trie and seeke fortune in some other foren countrie and nation.

(1) The fozke and the swallow are named A-ues semestres, or the halfe yeares birds: for they come at the spring, and depart againe auaie at the autume or fall of the leafe, for in the winter they are not sene. And by this Mac Morogh alludeth and meaneth that he hath awaited that whole halfe yeare for the earles coming: whose promise was, that in the spring of the yeare past he would haue come.

Mac Mo-roghs letter to earle Richard.

Of the arriual of Reimond le grosse into Ireland, and of the fight which he had against the Waterford men at Dundorogh.

Chap. 13.

The king hauing heard the earles requests, bethought himselfe a while thereof: but in the end he allowed not of the one, nor granted the other, but fed him still with good speeches, and nourished him with faire words, commending his noble mind, that he would aduenture so honorable an enterprize. And in words the king seemed to giue him leaue to follow his deuise, but to saie the truth, it was rather in game than in earnest, for the king minded nothing lesse. But the earle taking the auantage of the kings words, and accepting the same for a sufficient leaue and licence, returned home. And the same being the winter season & verie unfit to trauell into foren nations in martiall affaires, doth now make preparation of all things fit to serue when time should require. And as soone as the winter was past, he sendeth ouer before him into Ireland, a gentleman of his owne household and familie named Reimond le grosse: who had with him ten gentlemen of seruice, and thre score and ten archers well appointed, and taking shipping about the halends of Maye, then landed at the rocke of (1) Dundonolfe, which lieth south from Waterford, and about foure miles east from Waterford: and there they cast a trench, and builod a little castell of hold, with turkes and wattell. This Reimond was nephue to Robert Fitzstephans and to Spaurice Fitzgerald, being the sonne vnto their elder brother named William, and was verie valiant, of great courage, and well expert in the warres and in all martiall affaires. The citizens of Waterford, and Mmolaghlin Mfein, being aduertised of this their arriual, and nothing liking the neighborhood of such strangers, take counsell together what were best to be done: and finding it most necessarie and needfull to withstand at the beginning, they do conclude and determine to giue the onset vpon them; and being about thre thousand men, they take botes, and rowe downe the riuer of the Sure (which fleteth fast by the walles of Waterford on the east, and diuideth Leinster from Spounster) and so came to the place where Reimond and his companie were, where they landed and set their men in order for the assaults, and marched boldlie to the ditches of Reimonds fortresse or castell: but then it appeared how valiantnes can neuer be hid, lustie courage be daunted, nor yet prouesse or worthines be blemished. For Reimond and his companie, although they were but few in number, and too weake to incounter with so great a com-panie as their aduersaries were: yet being of cou-ragious minds & lustie stomachs, went out to meet with their enemies; but when they saw that their small number was not sufficient nor able in the plaines to abide and indure the force of so great a multitude, they retired to their fort. The enemies thinking then to discomfit and cleane to ouerthrow them, followed and pursued them so hotly, that the Englishmen were no soner in at the gates, but the Irishmen were also at their heeles, and some of them within the gate. Which thing when Reimond saw, and considering also with himselfe what a distresse and perill he and all his were in, suddenly turneth backe his face vpon his enemies; and the first of them which entred, he ranne him thorough with his sword (or as some saie claue his head at the der) and then with a loud voice cried out to his com-panie to be of a good comfort. Who forthwith as they turned and stood most manfullie to their defense; so their enemies also being dismayed and afraid at the death of that one man, they all fled and ranne a waie: and then they which in this doubtfull chance of fight, were thought should be vanquished and cleane ouerthrowne, suddenly became to be the victors and conquerors. And these sherpelle then pursued their enemies, who were scattered abroad in the plaines and out of arraie; that in a verie short time and space they slew about five hundred persons: and being wearie with killing, they cast a great number of those whom they had taken prisoners headlong from the rocks into the sea, and so drowned them. In this fight and seruice a gentleman named William Gerard did most valiantlie acquit himselfe. For albeit he were but of a weake bodie, yet was he of a verie stout stomach & courage; he was diseased and sicke of the leprosie, and therefore desirous rather to die valiantlie, than to liue in miserie: and for that cause would and did aduenture himselfe in places where most perill and danger was and seemed to be; thinking it good with a glorious death to prevent the grieue and losse nesse of a grieuous discase.

Thus fell the pride of Waterford, thus decayed their strength and force, and thus began the ruine and ouerthrow of that citie, which as it bred a great hope and consolation to the Englishmen; so was it the cause of a great desperation and terror to the enimies. It was a strange matter and neuer heard of before in those parties, that so great a slaughter should be made by so small a number: neuertheless by euill counsell and too much crueltie, the Englishmen abused their good successe and fortune. For hauing gotten the victorie, they saued fewentie of the best citizens, whom they kept prisoners; and for the ransome or redemption of these, they might haue had either the citie of Waterford yelded & surrendered vnto them, or such a masse of monie as they would themselves. But Herueie of Spount Sporis (who came ouer with thre gentlemen of seruice, and ioined with his countrimen and Reimonds) being both of contrarie minds, strived the one with the other, what were best to be done hereint.

(1) Dundonolfe is a rocke standing in the coun-tie of Waterford vpon the sea side, lieng east from the citie of Waterford about eight English miles, and is from the towne of Waterford about twelue miles, lieng southwards from the same: it is now a strong castell, and appertaining to the ancient house of the Powers of Kilmaithen, & called by the name of Dundorogh.

(2) The citie of Waterford or Gnaterford, named sometimes (as Ptolomeus writeth) Manapia, is a faire, ancient, and honorable citie, standing vpon the south side of the riuer of Sure, which fleteth fast by the walles thereof, and was first builod by one named Sitaratus, one of the thre princes which came out of the east parts to inhabit that land. It was at the first but a small pile, lieng in forme of a long triangle, but since & of late times enlarged by the citizens & inhabitants of the same. It is the che-fist empozium in a manner of all that land, and standeth cheeflie vpon the trade of merchandize, they themselves being not onelie great traouellers into foren nations, but also great resort and baillie con-courses of strangers are to it. Concerning the gouernement, order, state and seruice of this citie, and of sundrie other things incident to the same, are at large described in the later historie of this land.

The oration of Reimond for the deliuerie of the prisoners taken.

Reimond being verie desirous that the captiues taken might be deliuered, laboureth by all the waies he could how to compasse the same, & in presence of Herueie maketh these speeches, and vseth these persuasions to all his companie. Be my noble and valiant companions and souldiers, for increase of whose honour, vertue and fortune seeme to contend; let vs now consider what is best to be done with these our prisoners and captiues. For my part I doe not thinke it good, nor yet allow that any fauour or courtesie should be at all shewed to the enimie. But understand you, these are no enimies now, but men; no rebels, but such as be vanquished and cleane ouerthrowen, and in standing in defense of their countrie, by euill fortune and a worse destinie they are subdued. Their adventures were honest and their attempts commendable, and therefore they are not to be reputed for theues, factious persons, traitors, nor yet murderers. They are now brought to that distresse and case, that rather mercie for examples sake is to be shewed, than cruelty to the increasing of their miserie is to be ministered. Suerlie our ancestors in times past (although in deed it be verie hard to be done) were wont in times of good successe and prosperitie, to temperate their loose minds and unrulie affections with some one incommoditie or other. Wherefore let mercie and pittie, which in a man is most commendable, worke so in vs, that we who haue overcome others, may also now subdue our owne minds, and conquer our owne affections: for modestie, moderation, and discretion are wont to staine hasty motions, and to stop rash deuises. How commendable and honorable is it to a noble man, that in his greatest triumph and glorie, he counteth it for a sufficient reuenge, that he can reuenge and be weakened?

Julius Cesar, whose conquests were such, his victories so great, and his triumphs so manie, that the whole world was nosed therewith; he had not so manie friends who reioiced for the same, but he had manie more enimies who maligned and cruied at him, not onelie in slanderous wordes and euill reports; but manie also secretlie conspired, deuised, and practised his death and destruction: and yet he was so full of pittie, mercie, and compassion, that he neuer commanded nor willed any to be put to death for the same, sauing onelie one Domitius, whom he had of mere clemencie for his lewdnesse before pardoned, for his wickednesse released, and for his trecherie acquitted. And thus as his pittie did much increase his honour, so did it nothing hinder his victories. How beastlie then and impious is that cruelty, wherein victorie is not joined with pittie? For it is the part of a right noble and a valiant man, to count them enimies which doe wage the battell, contend and fight for the victorie; but such as be conquered, taken prisoners, and kept in bonds and captiuitie, to take and repute them for men, that hereby fortitude and force may diminish the battell and end the quarrell, as also humanitie may increase loue & make peace. It is therefore a great commendation and more praise, worthie to a noble man in mercie to be bountious, than in victorie to be cruel; for the one lieth onelie in the course of fortune, but the other in vertue: and as it had bene a great increase of our victorie, and an augmentation of honour, if our enimies had bene slaine in the field and ouerthrowen in the battell: so they being now taken and saued, and as it were men returned from rebels to the common societie and fellowship of men; if we should now kill them, it w^{ld} be to our great shame, dishonour, and reproch for euer. And for so much as by the killing and destroying of them we shall be neuer the nearer to haue the countrie, nor neuer sooner to be the lords of the land; and yet the ransoming of them verie good for the maintenance of the souldiers, the good fame of vs, and the advancement of our honour: we must needs thinke it better to ransom them than to kill them. For as it is requisit and meet, that a souldier in the field fighting in armes, should then thirst for the blood of his enimies, trie the force of his sword, and ballantellie stand to his tackle for victorie: so when the fight is ended, the wars are ceased, & the armes laid downe, and all fierceness of hostilitie set apart; then in a noble man must humanitie take place, pittie must be shewed, and courtesie must be extended.

The oration or speech which Herueie made.

Chap. 15.

When Reimond had ended his speech, & the whole companie being in a muttering, and as it were men well pleased and verie well allowing his mind and opinion: then Herueie stood vp and spake to them all in this manner. Reimond hath verie exquisitellie discoursed with vs of pittie and mercie, and in set speeches uttering his eloquence, hath shewed his mind and declared his opinion; persuading and inducing vs to belieue, that a strange land were to be conquered sooner by mercie and fond pittie than by sword and fire. But I praise you, can there be a worse waie than so to thinke? Did Julius Cesar or Alexander of Macedonie by such means or in such order conquer the whole world? Did the nations from out of all places run to submit themselves vnder their yoke and empire, in respect of their pittie & mercie, & not rather compelled so to doe for feare & perforce? For people, whiles they are yet proud and rebellious, they are (all pittie and mercie set apart) by all manner of waies and means to be subdued; but when they are once brought into subiection and bondage, and redie to serue and obie, then they are with all courtesie to be intreated and dealt withall: so that the state of the gouernment may be in safetie and out of danger. Wherein and in this point must pittie be vsed, but in the other seueritie or rather cruelty is more necessarie: here clemencie is to be shewed, but in the other rigour without fauour is to be exhibited and vsed. Reimond persuadeth that mercie is to be extended, as vpon a people already subdued and subiected; or as though the enimies were so few and of so small a number, as against whom no valiant seruice nor chualtrie can be exploited, and yet they redie to ioine with vs: whereby our force may be increased, and our power augmented. But alas! Doe not we see how that the whole nation and people of Ireland are wholly bent, and not without cause altogether conspired against vs?

Suerlie me thinketh Reimond is contrarie vnto himselfe; for why, his coming hither was not to dispute of pittie, nor to reason of mercie; but to conquer the nation and to subdue the people. What an example of impious pittie were it then, to neglect our owne safetie, and to haue remorse and compassion vpon others distresses? Wherefore, we haue here in the fields, and in armour more enimies than friends, we are in the middle of perils and dangers, our enimies being round about vs in euery place: and shall we thinke this to be nothing, but that we must be also in the like distresse and danger among our selues. Round about vs our enemies are infinit, and within our selues some there be which practise our destruction. And if it should happen that our captiues and prisoners should escape and breake loose out of their bonds, which are but verie weak and slender, no doubt they will forthwith take our owne armours and weapons against vs. Well well, the mouse is in the rypbord, the fire is in the lap, and the serpent is in the bosome; the enimie is at hand ready to oppresse his aduersarie, and the guest is in place with small courttesie to requit his host. And I praise you doth not Keimond execute that in his facts and doings, which he denieth in his words: Are not his speeches contrarie to his deeds? Let him answer me to this. If our enemies when they come in good arate and well appointed to giue the onset, and to wage the battell against vs, if they should happen to haue the victorie and the ouerhand ouer vs, would they deale in pitie & mercie? Would they grant vs our liues? Would they put vs to ransom? Tush what need manie words when the deeds are apparant? Our victorie is to be so bled, that the destruction of these few may be a terror to manie; whereby all others and this wild and rebellious nation may take an example, and beware how they meddle and encounter with vs. Of two things we are to make choise of one; for either we must valiantlie and couragiously stand to persewme what we haue taken in hand; and all fond pitie set aside, boldlie and stoutlie to ouerthrow and vanquish this rebellious and stubborne people: or (if we shall alter the mind and opinion of Keimond altogether be pitifull and full of mercie) we must hoist by our sailes and returne home, leauing both the countrie and our patrimonie to this miserable and wretched people. Hercules opinion was best liked, and the whole companie allowed his iudgement, whereupon the captiues (as men condemned) were brought to the rockes, and after their limbs were broken, they were cast headlong into the seas, and so drowned.

The coming ouer of Richard Strangbow earle of Cheshire into Ireland, and of the taking of the citie of Waterford.

Chap. 16.

In this meane time Richard the earle, hauing provided and made all things in readinesse fit for so great an enterpryse, took his iourne, and came through Wales to S. Davids: and still as he went he took by all the best chosen and piked men that he could get. And hauing all things in place and in a readinesse meet and necessarie for such a voyage, he went to Milford haue, and hauing a good wind took shipping and came to Waterford, in the kalends of September on the vigill of saint Bartholomew, and had with him about two hundred gentlemen of good seruice, and a thousand others. When was fulfilled Celidons prophesie, which was; that A little firebrand shall go before a great fire; and as the sparkels inkindle the small wood, so shall the same set the great wood a fire. Likewise was fulfilled the saying of Merlin; A great forerunner of a greater follower shall come, and he shall tread downe the heads of Desmond and Leinster, and the waies before opened & made ready he shall enlarge. Keimond being aduertised of the earles arrival, went the next morrow vnto him with great joy, hauing with him in his companie sortie gentlemen of seruice. And on the morrow vpon saint Bartholomeus daie, being tuesday, they displayed their banners, and in good arate they marched to the walls of the citie, being fullie bent and determined to giue the assault: the citizens & such others as had escaped at Dundoogh manfully defending themselves, and giuing them two repulses. Keimond who by the consent and assent of the whole armie was chosen and made generall of the field, and tribune of the host, hauing espied a little house of timber standing halfe open posts without the wals, called his men together, and encouraged them to giue a new assault at that (1) place. And hauing betwixt downe the posts whereupon the house stood, the same fell downe together with a pece of the towne wall; and then a waie being thus opened, they entred into the citie, and killed the people in the streets without pitie or mercie, leauing them lieng in great heaps; and thus with bloodie hands they obtained a bloodie victorie. In the tower called (2) Keimonds tower they took two murderers prisoners, whom they barned and killed; also they took there Keimold, and Macclathlen Oghlan prince of the Decies: but these were saved by meanes of the coming and suite of Mac Spozogh, who was also come thither with Maurice Fitzgerald and Robert Fitzstephans. And when they had set the citie and all other their things in good order, Mac Spozogh gaue his daughter Eua, whom he had then brought thither with him, to be married to the earle according to the first pact and couenant; and then the marriage solemnized and all things set in order, they displayed their banners & marched towards Dublin.

(1) In the verie place of the assault is now builded a strong fort and blockhouse, which is verie well furnished and appointed with ordinance and shot. It is in the verie east angle or point of the walles of the citie: and within on the south side the walles doth it appeere how the same was burned by the Englishmen at this their entrie.

(2) The Keimonds tower is a little tower in the wall of the old citie, and is next or verie neere adioining to a late monastrie or friers there: it is a verie slender thing, and not worthe of any report; sauing that the autho doth alledge it as a fort in those daies bled for a defense.

The besieging and taking of the citie of Dublin.

Chap. 17.

Keimond being aduertised, and hauing perfect aduertisement that they of Dublin had procured & stocked all or the most part of the land to come to aid, helpe and to defend them; and that they had lated all the waies, passages and streits about the citie, whereby no man could passe that waie, he left all those waies; and passing through the mounteines of Glundoloch, he brought his whole armie safe to (1) Dublin. And such was his mortall hatred towards the Dublinians, that he could not forget the iniuries done to himselfe, and the shamefull reproch done to his father. For his father being on a time at Dublin, and there sitting at the doore of a certain ancient man of the citie, they did not onelie there murder him; but for a further satisfieng of their malice, they cast him and buried him with a dog: and therefore about all others he most mortallie hated them. The citizens much mistrusting themselves, they send messengers to intreate for peace; and in the end by the mediation and meanes of Laurence then the archbishop of Dublin, a parlay and a treatie was obtained: but whiles the old and ancient men were talking of peace, the younger sort were busie in weapons. For Keimond and Miles of Cogan, two lustie young gentlemen, but more desirous to fight vnder spars in the fields than

Two strange

to sit in counsell vnder Iupiter; and more willing to purchase hono^r in the warres, than gaine in peace. They with a companie of lustie yong gentlemen suddenly ran to the walles, & giuing the assalt, brake in, entred the citie, and obtained the victorie, making no small slaughter of their enemies: but yet the greater number of them, with Masculphus their capitaine, escaped awaie with such riches & iewels as they had, and recovered themselves vnto certeine ships which laie there, & so sailed to the north Ilands. At this time there happened two strange miracles in the same citie, the one was of a crosse or a rood which the citizens minding to haue caried with them, was not nor would be remoued; the other was of a peece of monie, which was offered to the same rood twice, & euer it returned backe againe, as you may see more thereof in our topographie. When the earle had spent a few daies in the citie, about setting and settling the same in good order, he left the same to the charge and gouernance of Miles Cogan: but he himselfe by the perswasion of Mac Morogh (who sought by all the waies he could, how to be reuenged vpon Morike king of Metch) intruded the borders of Metch, and wasted, spoiled, and destroyed the same. All Metch being in the end wasted by the sword and fire; Rothorike king of Connagh thought with himself what might hereof befall vnto him, bicause his neighbors house being set on fire, his was next to the like perill: he sent his messengers vnto Dermot Mac Morogh with this message. Contrarie to the order of the peace, thou hast procured, called, and flocked into this land a great multitude and number of strangers, and as long as thou dost staie and keepe thy selfe within thy owne countrie of Leinster, we bare therewith, and were contented. But forsomuch as now not caring for thy oth, nor regarding the safetie of thy hostages, thou hast so fowldie & lewdlie passed thy bounds: I am to requite thee, that thou doe retire and withdraue these excurses of strangers; or else without faile I will cut off thy sonnes head, & send it thee. Mac Morogh when he heard this message, full stoutlie answered, and said he would not giue ouer that which he had begun, nor desist from his enterprise, vntill he subdued all Connagh his ancient inheritance, as also he had recovered the monarchie of all Ireland. Rothorike being aduertised of this answer, was somewhat warmed and offended therewith, & forthwith in his rage commanded Mac Moroghs sonne, who was his pledge, to be beheaded.

(1) Dublin is the oldest and ancientest citie in all Ireland, and was builded by one Amclaus, the eldest of three brethren named Ossimen or Casserlings: which came first out of Norwaie, or (as some write) out of Normandie, and did inhabit the land. It was first named Aghalia, that is, the towne of hurdels; for it standeth somewhat low and in a marshy ground: and bicause when the same was first builded, the laborers were wont and did go vpon hurdels, it toke the name thereof. It was also called Doolin, which is to saie blacke water, for of that name is a certeine brooke, flowing not farr out of the towne, but now is called Dublin or Diuelin; it standeth vpon the riuer named Anelyphus or the Liffey, and it is a port towne, being the chiefeest citie and emporium of all that land. It is walled with stone round about, & at the east part thereof is a verie old castle, builded first by Henrie Londers archbishop of Dublin, about the yere 1212, which is now the quenes castell, & where in the lord deputie of that land most commonly lieth, as also wherein the courts for the common law at the vsuall termes are kept. The citie it selfe stands most on trade of merchandize, & is by that means of good wealth. The inhabitants are more Englishmen, but of Ireland birth. The gouernment thereof is vnder a maior and two shiriffes. And as concerning the order, gouernement, state, policies, and good seruices of the same, I shall more at large declare in my particular historie of this land.

The councill or synod kept at Armagh.

Chap. 18.

These things thus ended & compleated, there was a synod or councill of all the clergie called and assembled at Armagh: there to intreat and examine what should be the causes and reasons, why & wherefore the realme was thus plagued by the resort and repaire of strangers in among them. At length it was fullie agreed, and euerte mans opinion was, that it was Gods full plague for the sinnes of the people, and especiallie bicause they vsed to buie Englishmen of merchants and pirats, and (contrarie to all equitie or reason) bid make bondslaues of them: and God now to auenge and acquit this their iniquitie, plagued them with the like, and hath set these Englishmen & strangers to reduce them now into the like slaueerie and bondage. For the Englishmen, when their realme was at rest and peace, and their land in quiet estate, and they not in anie distresse, want, or penurie, their children and kinsmen were sold and made bondslaues in Ireland. And therefore it was most like, that God for the sin of the people would & did laie the like plague vpon the Irish people. It was therefore decreed by the said councill, and concluded by that synod, that all the Englishmen within that land, where soeuer they were, in bondage or captiuitie, should be manumitted, set free and at libertie.

The proclamation of king Henrie the second against the earle, and of the sending of Reimond to the king.

When tidings was caried abrode of the good successe which the Englishmen had in Ireland, & the news the further it went, the more it increased; and the king being aduertised that the earle had not onlie recovered Leinster, but had also conquered sundrie other territories, whereunto he had no title by the right of his wife, did set forth his proclamation, forbidding and inhibiting that from thenceforth no ship from out of any place, vnder his dominion, should passe or traffike into Ireland: and that all manner of his subiects which were within that realme, should retorne from thence into England before Easter then next following, vpon paine of forfeiture of all their lands, as also to be banished men for euer. The earle when he saw himselfe in this distress, being in perill to lose his friends, and in hazard to want his necessaries, taketh aduise and counsell what were best to be done. At length it was agreed and concluded, that Reimond should be sent ouer to the king then being in Aquitaine, with letters to this effect. My right honourable lord, I came into this land with your leaue and fauour (as I remember) for the aiding and helping of your seruant Dermot Mac Morogh. And what soeuer I haue gotten and purchased, either by him or by anie others, as I confesse and acknowledge the same from and by meanes of your gracious goodnesse: so shall the same still rest and remaine at your deuotion and commandement.

The departure of Reimond to the king, and the death of Dermot Mac Morogh.

Chap. 20.

Reimond (according to the order taken, and commandment given to him) made his repaire with all diligence to the king, & having deliuered his letters did await for his answer. But the king being in some dislike with the earle, and not fauourable allowing his successe, differred the time, and lingered to giue anie answer. About this time (1) Thomas the archbishop of Canturburie was murdered or slaine; and the yeare following about the kalends of Maie, Dermot Mac Morogh, being of a good age, and well stricken in yeeres died, and was buried at Fernes.

(1) The Romish or popish church make much ado about this man, affirming him to be a man of much vertue and holinesse, and that he was martyred for the defending of the liberties of holie church, and for this cause the pope canonized him to be a saint. But who so list to peruse and examine the course of the English histories, shall find that he was a froward and obstinat traitor against his master & soueraigne king and prince: as amongst other writers it appeareth in the booke of the Acts and Monuments of Iohn Fox. And forsomuch as the course of this chapter tendeth wholy in extolling of him, I haue omitted the same, and leaue to trouble the reader therewith.

The ouerthrow giuen to Hasculphus and the Easterlings or Normaien men at Dublin.

Chap. 21.

At this time about the feast of Pentecost or Whitsuntide, Hasculphus, who was sometime the chiefe ruler of Dublin, sought by all the waies he could how he might be reuenged for the reproch and shame which he had receiued when the citie of Dublin was taken, and he then bzauen to flee to his ship, and to saue himselfe. This man had bene in Portuake, and in the north Ilands to seeke for some helpe and aid; and hauing obtained the same he came with threescore ships well appointed, and full fraughted with lustie men of warre vnto the coasts of (1) Dublin, minding to assaile the citie, and hoping to recover the same. And without anie delais he landed and vnsipped his men, who were guided and conducted vnder a capteine named Iohn Wood or Iohn Mad, for so the word Wood meaneth. They were all mightie men of warre, and well appointed after the Danish manner, being harnessed with good brigandines, sacks, and shirts of male; their shields, bucklers, and targets were round, and coloured red, and bound about with iron: and as they were in armour, so in minds also they were as iron strong and mightie.

These men being set in battell arate, and in good order, did march on wards towards the east gate of the citie of Dublin, there minding to giue th assault, and with force to make entrie. Miles Cogan then warden of the citie, a man verie valiant and lustie, although his men and people were verie few, and as it were but a handfull in respect of the others: yet boldlie giueth the aduenture and onset vpon his enemies: but when he saw his owne small number not to be able to resist nor withstand so great force, and they still pressing & enforcing vpon him, he was bzau-

men to retire backe with all his companie, and with the losse of manie of his men, and of the more being verie well armed, yet was his thigh cut off cleane at a stroke with a Galloglasse are. But Richard Cogan brother vnto Miles, vnderstanding how hardlie the matter passed and had sped with his brother, suddenlie and secretlie with a few men issued out at the south postern or gate of the citie, and stealing vpon the backs of his enemies, maketh a great shout, and therewith sharpelie giueth the onset vpon them. At which sudden chance they were so dismayed, that albeit some fighting before, and some behind, the case was doubtfull, & the euent vncertaine: yet at length they fled and ran awaie, and the most part of them were slaine, and namelie Iohn Wood, whom with others Iohn of Kidenford toke and killed. Hasculphus fleeing to his ships was so sharpelie pursued, that vpon the sands he was taken, but saued; and for the greater honour of the victorie was caried backe alive into the citie as a captiue, where he was sometime the chiefe ruler and gouernour: and there he was kept till he should compound for his ransome. And then he being brought and presented to Miles Cogan, in the open sight and audience of all the people, and fretting much for this euill fortune and overthrow, suddenlie and in great rage brake out into these speeches, saying: We are come hither now but a small companie, and a few of vs, and these are but the beginnings of our aduentures; but if God send me life, you shall see greater matters insue and follow. Miles Cogan when he heard these words (for in the twong standeth both life and death, the lord abhorreth the proud heart, and verie badlie doth he ease his greafe which augmenteth his sorrow) commanded him to be beheaded. And so the life to him before courtouslie granted, he by his fondnesse did foolishlie lose it.

(1) The port or hauent of Dublin is a barred haueu, and no great ships do come to the towne it selfe but at a spring or high water, and therefore they do lie in a certaine rode without the barre, which is about foure or fife miles from the citie, and the same is called Kingwood; and from thence to Holie bed in Wales is counted the shortest cut betwene England and Ireland.

Rothorike prince of Connagh and Gotred king of Man do besiege the citie of Dublin.

Chap. 22.

After this, the Irishmen perceiuing that by reason of the kings late proclamation, the earles men and bittels did wast, decaye, and consume for want of their wanted supplies from out of England: all their princes assembled themselves, and did agree with all their power and force to besiege the citie of Dublin, being procured thereto by Laurence then archbishop there; who for the zeale and loue of his countrie, did verie earnestlie trauell herein: and joining with Rothorike the king of Connagh, they sent their letters to Gotred king of the Ile of Man, and to all others the princes of the Ilands, making earnest requests, vnto their persuasions, and promising liberall rewards, if they would come to helpe and aid them to besiege Dublin; they on the water, and the other at land: who were easilie to be persuaded thereto, and forthwith yelded to these requests, not onelie for the desire of gaines offered: but especiallie, because they doubted, and were afraid of the Englishmen, who hauing dallie good successe they feared least they in time time would giue the onset on them, and make a conquest ouer their possessions. And therefore they forthwith made themselves readie, and prepared their ships accordingly. And as soone as the next good wind serued, they came in thirtie ships of warre, verie well appointed, and arriued into the haven of Aneliffe, or port of Dublin: whose coming was verie thankfull and gratefull. For whie? Whose helps are best liked when men in their affaires haue those to inine with them which be or feare to be in the like perills and dangers? But the earle and his compaignie, who had bene shut vp now two moneths within the citie, and whose vittells failed, and were almost consumed, by reason that vpon the kings commandement a restraint was made (and therefore none could be brought vnto them out of England) were in a great dumpe and perplexitie, and in a manner were at their wits end, and wist not what to do. And in this their case see the course and nature of fortune, who when she frameth, sendeth not one euill alone, but heapeth mischæse vpon mischæse, and trouble vpon trouble. For behold Donald Mac Dermot came from out of the borders of Kencile, & brought newes that the men of Wexford & of Kencile to the number of three thousand persons had beseged Robert Fitzstephans and his few men in his castell of the Maareche, and wileste they did helpe and rescue him within three daies it would be too late; for they should and would else be taken. At this time there was with the earle within the citie Maurice Fitzgerald, and his cosine Reimond, who was latelie returned from the court; and these were not onelie now troubled in respect of their owne cause, but for the distress of others, and speciallie Maurice Fitzgerald, who tenderlie toke and was grieved with the distressed state of his brother Robert Fitzstephans, and of his wife and children, that they being in the middle of their enemies, should be in so weake a hold not able to keepe out such a compaignie: and so rising vp maketh this speech to the earle, and to such as were about him, as followeth.

The oration of Maurice Fitzgerald.

Worthy men, we came not hither, nor were we called into this countrie to be idle, nor to liue delictiouslie: but to trie fortune, and to seeke aduentures. We stood sometimes vpon the top of the wheele, and the game was on our side; but now the wheele is turned, & we cast downe: and yet no doubt she will turne againe, and we shall be on the top. For such is the mutabilitie of fortune, & such is the vncertaine state & course of this world, that prosperitie and aduersitie do interchangeable, and by course the one followe the other. After daie commeth the night; and when the night is passed, the daie returneth againe. The sun riseth, and when he hath spred his beames all the daie time, then he commeth to his fall: and as soone as the night is past, he is againe come and returned to his rising againe. We who before this haue made great triumphs, & haue had fortune at will, are now shut vp on euerie side by our enemies. We be destitute of vittells, and can haue no reliefe neither by land nor yet by sea: our friends cannot helpe vs, and our enemies readie to deuoure vs. Likewise Fitzstephans, whose valiantnesse and noble enterprise hath made waie vnto vs into this Iland, he now is also shut vp in a weake hold and feeble place, too weake and slender to hold and keepe out so great a force. Whie then do we tarry? And therefore do we so linger? Is there anie hope of reliefe from home? No no, the matter is other wise, and we in worse case. For as we be odious and hatefull to the Irishmen, euen so we now are reputed: for Irishmen are become hatefull to our owne nation and countrie, and so are we odious both to the one and to the other. Therefore forsomuch as fortune fauoreth the forward, and helpeth the bold; let vs not longer delate the matter, nor like sluggards lie still: but whiles we are yet lustie, and our vittells not all spent, let vs giue the onset vpon our enemies: for though we be but few in number in respect of them, yet if we will be of valiant minds and lustie courages, as we were wont to be, we may hapilie haue the victorie and conquest of these naked wretches and vnarmed people. These speeches he bled as the sicke man is wont to do, who in hope of reuerie of his health, doth manie times beare out a good countenance, and dissemble his inward greife and heauinesse. When he had fullie ended his talke and spoken his mind, Reimond, who was also in the like angust and heauinesse spake thus:

The oration of Reimond.

Famous, and worthy, & noble men, whose fame for valiantnesse and chualrie is carried and spread beyond and through the ocean seas: we are now to looke well vnto our selues, and to haue good regard to our hono: and credit. You haue heard how grauelie my vncke Maurice hath declared, how pithilie he hath aduised, and how prudentlie he hath counselled vs what we shall do in this our distresse and present necessitie. Therefore we are well to consider thereof, & to determine and resolve our selues what we will do. The time is short, the perills imminent, and the dangers great, and therefore no delates are now to be bled. It is no time now to sit in long counsels, nor to spend much time in speeches; but in present perills we must vse present remedies. We see the enemies both at sea and land round about vs, and no waie is there to escape; but we must either giue the aduenture vpon them like men, or die here like beasts: for our vittells faile vs, and our prouision wareth scant & short, and we know not how to renew the same. And how little comfort we are to looke for out of England, and what small helpe we shall haue from the king. I haue already at large declared vnto you. I know his excellencie dispraiseth not our aduities, but yet he fauoreth not our successes: he discommendeth not our valiantnesse, but yet enuieeth at our glorie: in words he reporteth well of our seruices, but he yet secretlie hindereth the same: he feareth that which we meane not, and doubteth of that which we thinke not. To trust therefore vnto them, who care not for vs; to looke for helpe from them, who mind not anie; and to wait for reliefe where none is meant; it were but a mere follie, and a lost labor on our parts, and in the end like to returne to our owne shame, reproch, & confusion. Therefore being out of all hope of anie further helpe or supplie; and out of all doubt of anie further comfort or reliefe: let vs as becommeth noble, lustie, and valiant men, trie the course of fortune, and proue the force of the enimie. Let it appere vnto them as it is knowne vnto vs, of what race we came, and from whom we descended. Camber (as it is well knowne) the first particular king of Cambria our native countrie, was our ancesto: and he the sonne of that noble Brutus, the first and sole monarch of all England, whose ancesto: was Troas the founder of the most famous citie of Troie, and he descended from Dardanius the sonne of Iupiter, from whom is deriued vnto vs not onlie the name of ancient nobilitie, but also a certeine naturall inclination of valliant minds, & couragious stomachs, bent to follow all exploits in prowesse and chivalrie, and therein all our ancestors haue bene vertie skillfull and expert. And shall we now like sluggards degenerate from so noble a race, and like a sort of cowards be afraid of these naked and unarmed rascalls, in whom is no valor of knowledge nor experience in armes? Shall such a rabble of sauages pinne vs vp within the walles of this little Dublin, and make vs afraid of them; when in times past all the princes of Grece kept warres for ten peares & od moneths continuallie against our ancestors in the famous cite of Troie, and could not preuaile against them, untill they vsed treasons and practised treacheries, which bred vnto them a more infamous victorie than a glorious triumph: Shall the honor of our ancestors be withered by our sluggishnesse, and the glorie of their prowesse be buried in our cowardnesse? Shall we be afraid of a few, and unarmed, when they withstood infinit multitudes of the most worthiest and valliantest personages then in all the world? Let it neuer be said, that the bloud of the Troians shall be stained in our pusillanimitie, and receiue reproch in our follie.

And what though our enemies be neuer so manie, and we in respect of them but a handfull; shall we therefore be afrated, as though victorie stood in multitude, and conquest in great numbers? No no, kings be not so faued nor princes do so conquer: for a few men well disposed and a small number well incouraged, are sufficient to encounter with a greater number, being wretches and sluggards. For fortune though she be purtraied to be blind, as one void of right iudgement; and to stand vpon a rolling stone, as being alwaies flaking and moueable: yet for the most part she helpeth such as be of bold minds and of valliant stomachs. If time did serue as matter is full and plentious, I could hereof recite manie pe a infinite examples. (1) Thomiris the Scythian queene, did not she with a few hundreds encounter with the great monarch Cyzus, hauing manie thousands, and toke him and slue him. Alexander with a few Macedonians, did not he overcome Darius the great monarch of the Persians, and take him, his wife, and daughters prisoners, & made a conquest of all Persia? (2) Leonides the Spartan, did not he with six hundred men breake into the campos of the mightie Xerxes, and there slae five thousand of them? Let vs come a little nêrer euen to our selues, who haue had in our owne persons, and in this land the like successes, namelie you my right honourable earle at Waterford, and my vncle Fitzstephans at Wexford; and I my selfe at Dundojogh: small were our companies, and little was our force in respect of theirs, and yet we few thorough our valliantnesse ouercame and conquered them being manie.

What shall I trouble you with the recitall of examples, fith time shall sooner faile than matter want: and shall we then giue ouer and be white liued? Shall we like cowards couer our progenie, our nation, and our selues also, with perpetuall shame and infamie? God forbid. My mind then and opinion is, that we do issue out vpon them, as secretly and as suddenlie as we maie, and boldly giue the onset vpon them. And forsomuch as Rothorike of Connagh is the generall of the field, in whom lieth the chiefe force, and on whom all the rest do depend, it shall be best to begin with him, and then if we can giue the ouerthrow vnto him, all the residue will flie, and we shall obtaine a glorious victorie: but if we shall fall into their hands and be killed, yet shall we leaue an honourable report and an immortall fame to all our posteritie. When Keimond had ended his speeches and finished his oration, euerie one so well liked thereof, as with one consent they gaue ouer, and yielded to his resolution and opinion.

(1) Cyzus the sonne of Cambises the first monarch of Persia; after that he had subdued all Asia, he minding to doe the like in Scythia did invade the same: Thomiris being then queene thereof. And on a certeine time hauing pitched his tents in a faire and pleasant soile, suddenlie as though he had bene afrated of his enemies he fled, and left his tents full of wines and bittels. Which when the queene heard, she sent hir onelie sonne a yong gentleman with the thirde part of hir host and armie to follow and pursue Cyzus: who when he came to the forsaken tents, and finding there such abundance & plentie of wine and bittels, wherevnto the Scythians had not before bene accustomed, they fell so hungerlic to their bittels, and dranke so liberallie of the wines, that they were ouerladen and ouercommed with surfetting. Which when Cyzus heard of, he suddenlie and secretly in the night came vpon them, and finding them all asleepe, killed them all. Thomiris hearing of this, was not so much grieved with sorrow for the death of hir sonne, as inflamed with the desire to be reuenged. And she likewise faining hir selfe to flie, Cyzus by pursuing of hir was brought into certeine narrow streits, where she taking the aduantage of him, toke him, killed him, and slue all his companie, to the number of two thousand: insomuch that there was not one left to returne with message to declare the same.

(2) Leonides was king of Sparta or Lacedemonia, who being aduertised that the mightie monarch Xerxes minding to continue the warres with his father Darius had appointed and begun against all Grece, & that he had made preparation therefore five peares togither, doth also prepare himselfe to withstand the same. And notwithstanding that Xerxes had in his armie three hundred thousand of his owne subiects, and two hundred thousand of strangers: yet Leonides hauing gotten Xerxes within the streits of Thermopolis, and he hauing but foure thousand soldiers gaue the onset vpon the monarch, and fought the battels three daies togither with him, and at length gaue him the ouerthrow.

How Rothorike of Connagh, and all his whole armie was discomfited.

Immediatlie vpon the foresaid persuasions, euerie man with all speed had made him selfe readie and got on his armor, thinking it too long yer they did bicker with the enimie: and being all assembled and in good arrate, they diuided them into three wings or wards, though in number they were verie few. In the first was Keimond with twentie gentlemen and his few soldiers. In the second Miles Cogan with thirtie gentlemen and his other few soldiers. And in the third was the earle and Maunce Fitzgerald with fortie gentlemen and all their soldiers. And in euerie ward were some of all the citizens, sauing such as were appointed for the gard and safetie of the cite. Thus all things being set in an order, they suddenlie in the morning about nine of the clocke issued out, but not without some contention and controuersie: for they strined among themselves, who should haue the fore ward, and giue the onset vpon the enemies, who were in number about thirtie thousand: neuertheless they in the end agreed and appointed in order how all things should be done: and forthwith issued out and gaue the onset vpon upon their enemies, who then were out of array and order, being unware of their coming. Desmond among the first being the first was foremost, & gave the first adventure, and striking two of his enemies through with his lance or staffe slew them both. Pelletus also and Gerald and Alexander the two sons of Maurice, although they were in the rearward; yet they were so hot upon the spur, and followed in such lustie manner, that they were as forward as the foremost, and right valiantly did overthrow and kill many of the enemies.

The like valiant minds were in all the whole residue, who now strived & served all for the best game: and so lustily they acquitted themselves, that the enemies being afraid, were faine to take their heels and to run awaie. But they still followed and pursued them even untill night, still murdering & spoiling them. Rothorike the king himselfe trusted so much in the great troops and multitudes of his people; that he thought nothing lesse, than that so small a number as were within, would issue out and give the onset upon so many as were without. And therefore taking his pleasure and pastime, he was then a bathing: but when he heard how the game went, and how his men were discomfited & the most part fled or slayd awaie, he neither tarried for his chamberlaine to apparell him, nor for his page to help him: but with all the hast and post hast he could, he turneth a faire paire of heels and runneth awaie: and albeit he were verie sharpe pursued, yet (though hardlie) he escaped. At night all the companie being returned, they recovered themselves into the citie againe: not onelie with the honor of the field, but also with great booties and prizes of vittels, armor, and other trash. Immediately also were dispersed the other camps, namelie the archbishops, Macslaghlin, Maccheleton, Gillemeholcke and Mkenelos, who had all the force of Leinster, saving a few of Kencile and Wexford: and these were incamped on the south side. Likewise Morike of Meth, Darrell of Triell, Macshaghlane and Macdiffe which were incamped on the north side raised their camps and shifted for themselves. On the morrow, all things being set in good order, and good watch appointed for the safe keeping and custodie of the citie, they march towards Wexford, and take the higher waie by Drogheda.

After this good successe, fortune who cannot continue firme in one staie, doth now change hir course, and interlineth aduersitie with prosperitie. For whie, there is neither faith firme, nor felicitie permanent upon the earth. For the Wexford men and they of Kencile, forgetting their promise, and nothing regarding their faith which they had before made and assured unto Robert Fitzstephans, do now assemble themselves to the number of three thousand, and do march toward the Karecke, there to besiege the same, where Robert Fitzstephans was then: who mistrusting & fearing nothing, had but few gentlemen and a few archers about him. The enemies give the assault, & not prevailing at the first, do renew the same againe and againe: but when they saw that all their labours were lost, because that Fitzstephans and his companie though they were but a few in number, yet they were verie nimble and verie readie to defend themselves, and especiallie one William Spott, who in this service did verie well and worthily acquit himselfe; they now do seeke to practise their old subtil-ties and guiles. They leauing therefore to use force and violence, do now under colour of peace come toward the Karecke and bring with them the bishop of Kilbare, the bishop of Wexford, & certeine other religious persons, who brought with them a masse booke, Corpus Domini, and certeine reliques: and after a few speeches of perswasion had with Fitzstephans, they to compass their matter, took their corporall othes, and sware upon a booke, that the citie of Dublin was taken: and that the earle, Maurice, Desmond, and all the Englishmen were taken and killed; that Rothorike of Connagh, with all the whole power and armie of Connagh & Leinster, was coming towards Wexford for the apprehension of him: but for his sake, and for the good will which they bare unto him, because they had alwaie found him a courteous and a liberall prince, they were come unto him to conuete him awaie in safetie, and all his over into Wales, before the coming of that great multitude, which were his extreme and mortall enemies. Fitzstephans giving credit to this their swearing and assurances, did forthwith yeld himselfe, his people, & all that he had unto them and their custodie: but they forthwith most traitorously, of them that thus yelded into their hands some they killed, some they beat, some they wounded, and some they cast into prison. But as soon as newes was brought that Dublin was false, and that the earle was marching towards them; these traitors set the towne on fire, and they themselves with bag and baggage and with their prisoners gat them into the Island Begorie, which they call the holie Island, and which lieth in the middle of the haven there.

The description of Robert Fitzstephans.

A noble man, the onelie patterne of vertue, and the example of true industrie and labours: who having tried the variableness of fortune, had tasted more aduersitie than prosperitie! A worthy man, who both in Ireland and in Wales had traced the whole compass of fortunes wheele, and had endured whatsoever god fortune or euill could give! A Fitzstephans, the verie second an other (1) Marius, for if you do consider his prosperitie, no man was more fortunate than he: and on the contrarie, if you marke his aduersitie, no man was or could be more miserable. He was of a large and full bodie, his countenance verie comelie: and in stature he was somewhat more meane: he was bountifull, liberall, and pleasant, but yet sometimes somewhat about modeltie given to wine and women. The earle (as is aforesaid) marched with his armie towards Wexford, fast by Drogheda, which was a place full of streits, passes, and bogs, and verie hardlie to be passed through: but yet the whole power, force, and strength of all Leinster came thither, and met him and gave him the battell, betwene whom there was a great fight, and manie of the enemies slaine. But the earle with the losse of one onelie youngman recovered himselfe in safetie to the plaines, and there amongst others, Pelletus shewed himselfe to be a right valiant man.

(1) This Marius was named Caius Marius, his father was borne in Arpinum, & from thence came to Rome, and there dwelt, being a poore artificer and handicrafts man, but much relieved by Metellus a noble Roman, in whose house, and under whom, both the father and the sonne were servants: but being giuen altogether to martiall affaires, he became a verie valiant man, and did as good seruice to the citie of Rome as anie before or after him. Affrica he conquered, and in his first triumph Jugurtha and his two sonnes were bound in chaines, and caried captiues to Rome before his chariot. The Cambizians, Germans, and Tigurians wanting habitations, and thinking to settle themselves in Italie, trauelled thitherwards for the same purpose; but being denied by the Romans, they made most cruell warres vpon them, and slue of them at one time fourescore thousand souldiers, and threelcore thousand of others, wherewith the state of Rome and of all Italie was so broken, and ouerthrowne, that the Romans much bewailed themselves, & did thinke verelie that they should be vtterlie destroyed. In this distresse Marius toke the matter in hand, and meeting first with the Germans, gaue them the battell, slue their king Teutobochas, and two hundred thousand men, beside fourescore thousand which were taken. After that he met with the Cambizians, and slue their king Belcus, and an hundred and fortie thousand with him, as also toke fortie thousand prisoners. For which victorie he triumphed the second time in Rome, and was named then the third founder of Rome. Againe in the ciuill wars which grew by the means of Marius, all Italie was then in armes, and the Romans in euerie place had the worse side (for all Italie began to forsake them) and in this distresse Marius hauing gotten but a small power in respect of the enemies, giueth the onset vpon the Mariians, and at two times he slue fourescore thousand of them: which so quailed the Italians, and encouraged the Romans, that the Romans recovered themselves and had the maistrise. As in the warres so otherwise was Marius verie fortunate: for being but of a base stocke, yet he married Julia, a noble woman of the familie of the Julies, and aunt vnto Julius Cesar: he passed thorough the most part of the offices in Rome: he was first Legatus a senatu, then Præfatus equitum: after that Tribunus plebis, Prætor, Aedilis, and seuen times was he consul. And as fortune seemed to fauour and countenance him above all other in Rome; so did she also checke him with great reproches, & burdened him with great miseries. For his pride was so excessive, and his ambition so intollerable, that the best and most part of the Romans deadlie hated and enuied him: and therefore when he laboured to be Aedilis, Prætor, & Tribune, he was relected; he was accused for ambition, and proclaimed a traitor and an enemic to the common-wealth: he was inforced to forsake Rome and sie into Affrike. Also being at the seas, the mariners cast him on land among his enemies, and drave him to shift for himselfe. When he was pursued by his enemies, he was faine to hide himselfe in a bog, and couered himselfe with dirt & mire because he would not be knowne. Neuerthelesse he was taken and deliuered to a slau to be killed. Many other stormes of aduersitie and miserie did he abide and indure, and therefore it was said of him, that in miserie no man was more miserable, and in felicitie none more fortunate and happie than he.

The description of the earle

Strangbow.

Chap. 28.

The earle was somewhat ruddie and of sanguine complexion and freckle faced, his eyes greie, his face feminine, his voice small, and his necke little, but somewhat of a high stature: he was verie liberall, courteous and gentle: what he could not compasse and bring to passe in deed, he would win by good words and gentle speeches. In time of peace he was more ready to yield and obeye, than to rule and beare swaie. Out of the campe he was more like to a souldior companion than a capteine or ruler: but in the campe and in the warres he caried with him the state and countenance of a valiant capteine. Of himselfe he would not aduenture anie thing, but being aduised and set on, he refused no attempts: for of himselfe he would not rashlie aduenture, or presumptuously take anie thing in hand. In the fight and battell he was a most assured token and signe to the whole companie, either to stand ballantlie to the fight, or for policie to retire. In all chanches of warre he was still one and the same manner of man, being neither dismayd with aduersitie, nor puffed up with prosperitie.

The earle leauing Wexford vpon the newes that Fitzstephens was in hold, went to Waterford, and from thence sailed into England, & was reconciled to the king.

Chap. 29.

As the earle was marching towards Wexford, and was come to the borders thereof, certeine messengers met him, and shewed to him the mischance happened vnto Robert Fitzstephens, and of the setting on fire the towne of Wexford: adding moreouer, that the traitors were fullie determined if they trauelled anie further towards them, they would cut off all the heads of Fitzstephens and his companie, and send them vnto him. Wherevpon with heauie cheare & sorrowfull hearts they change their minds, and turne towards Waterford. Where when they were come, they found Bernie now latelie returned from the king with a message and letters from him vnto the earle, perswading and requiring him to come ouer into England vnto him. Wherevpon the earle prepared and made himselfe readie, and as soone as wind and weather serued he toke shipping, and caried Bernie along with him. And being landed he rode towards the king, and met him at a towne called Newham nere vnto Gloucester, where he was in redines with a great armie to saile ouer into Ireland. Where after sundrie & manie alfercations passed betwene them, at length by means of Bernie the kings displeasure was appeased, and it was agreed that the earle should sweare allegiance to the king, and yeld and surrender vnto him the citie of Dublin, with the cantreds therunto adioining, as also all such towne and forts as were bordering vpon the sea side. And as for the residue he should haue and retine to him and his heirs, holding the same of the king & of his heirs. These things thus concluded, the king with his armie marched along by Seuerne side, & the sea coasts of (1) Westwales, vnto the towne (2) of Penbroke, where he taried vntill he had assembled all his armie in (3) Spilford haue there to be shipped.

(1) Westwales in Latine is named Demetia, and is that which is now called Penbrokeshire. It reacheth from the seas on the north vnto the seas on the south. In the west part thereof is the bishops see of Meneue named saint Dauid: and on the east side it bordereth vpon Southwales named Debenbart. In this part were the Flemmings placed first.

(2) Penbroke is the chiefeest towne of all Demetia, and lieth on the east side of Spilford haue, wherein was sometimes a verie strong castell builded (as some write) by a noble man named Arnulph Spontomer.

The Conquest of Ireland.

(1) Milford is a famous and a goodlie harborough lying in Demetia, or West Wales. The Welshmen name it the mouth of two swords. It hath two banners or armes, the one showing hard to Haverford west, and the other thorough the countrie named Wolfa.

Ororike prince of Meth besieging Dublin, is driven off by Miles Cogan, and hath the worst side.

In the meane time Drozike, the one eled king of Speth, watching the absence of the earle as also of Richmond, the one being in England, and the other at Waterford, he mustered a great number of soldiors, and upon a sudden about the kalends of September, laich siege to the citie of Dublin: within the which there were then but few men, but yet they were valliant and berie men indeed. And as the flame can not be suppressed, but that it will breake out: euen so vertue and valliantnesse can not be shut up, but that it will (when time and occasion serueneth) shew it selfe. For Miles Cogan and all his companie upon a sudden issue out upon the enimies, and withwares taking them napping, made a great slaughter of them: among whom there was the sonne of Drozike, a lustie pong gentleman, and he slaine also. And at this time the king of England, lying at Penbroke in Wales, he fell out with the noblemen and gentlemen of the countrie: because they had suffered the earle Richard to take his passage among them from thence into Ireland, And removing such as had anie charge or keeping of any forts there, he placed others therein: but at length his heat being cooled, & his displeasure quailed, they were reconciled againe to his good fauour and grace.

Whilest the king late there, he had great pleasure in hauking, and as he was walking abroad with a gosshawke of Porwaite upon his fist, he had espied a falcon sitting upon a rocke; and as he went about the rocke to view and behold him, his gosshawke hauing also espied the falcon, bated vnto him, and therewith the king let him flie. The falcon seeing hir selfe thus beset, taketh also wing: and albeit hir flight was but slow at the first; yet at length she maketh wing and mounteth vp of a great height: and taking the advantage of the gosshawke hir aduersarie, commeth downe with all hir might, and striking hir she claue hir backe asunder, and fell downe dead at the kings foot: wherat the king and all they that were then present had great maruell. And the king hauing good liking, and being in lone with the falcon, did peacelie at the breeding and disclosing time send thither for them: for in all his land there was not a better and a more hardie hawke.

The comming of king Henrie into Ireland.

Chap. 31.

These things thus done, and all prepared in a readinesse fit for such a noble enterprise, and for which the king had staied a long time in Wales, he went to Saint Davids church, where when he had made his praiers and done his deuotion, the wind and the wether well seruing, he took shipping and arriued vnto Waterford in the kalends of November, being Saint Lukes date: hauing in his retinue five hundred gentlemen of seruice, and of bolwomen and horsemen a great number. This was in the seuenteenth yeare of his reigne, the one & fortieth of his age, and in the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred seauentie & two, Alexander the third then pope, Frederike then emperor, and Lewis then French king. And now was fulfilled the prophesie of Merlin, that A fire globe shall come out of the east, and shall deuour and consume all Ireland round about: and likewise the prophesie of Saint Polin, that Out of the east shall come a mightie hurling wind, & rush thorough to the west, and shall run thorough and ouerthrow the force and strength of Ireland.

Propheties of Merlin and Polin fulfilled.

The citizens of Wexford present vnto the king Robert Fitzstephans, and sundrie princes of Ireland come and submit themselves to the king.

Chap. 32.

The king being thus landed at Waterford, and there resting himselfe, the citizens of Waterford, vnder colour and pretense of great humblenesse and dutie, and in hope of some thanks, they brought Robert Fitzstephans bound as a captiue and a prisoner, and presented him to the king as one who deserued small fauor or courtesie, that he had without his consent & leaue entered into Ireland, & giuen thereby an occasion to others to offend and to doe euill. The king not liking of him, fell out with him, and charged him verie deepe and sharplie for his rash and hastie aduentures, and that he would take vpon him to make a conquest of Ireland without his assent and leaue: and forthwith commanded him to be handlocked and fettered, with an other prisoner, and to be safelie kept in Kenold tower. Then Dermot Mac Arth prince of (1) Corke came to the king of his owne free will, submitted himselfe, became tributarie, and toke his oath to be true and faithfull to the king of England. After this the king removed his armie and marched toward (2) Lismore, and after that he had tarried about two daies, he went to (3) Cashill, and thither came vnto him at the riuer of (4) Sure, Donold prince of (5) Limerike: where when he had obtained peace, he became tributarie and swore fealtie. The king then set (of his men) rulers and keepers ouer the cities of Corke and Limerike.

Then also came in Donold prince of Ossois, and Macleighlin & Felin prince of the Decies, and all the best & chiefe men in all Downe, & did submit themselves, became tributaries and swore fealtie. Whome when the king had verie liberallie rewarded, he sent them home againe: and he himselfe returned backe againe to Waterford through (6) Wexford. When he came to Waterford, Fitzstephans was brought before him, & when he had well beheld him, and considered with himselfe the valliantnesse of the man, the good seruice he had done, & the perils & dangers he had bene in: he began to be moued with some pitie and compassion vpon him, and at the intercession & by the mediation of certeine noblemen, he heartilie forgane him, and released him from out of bonds, and restored him wholie to his former state and libertie, sauing that he reserued to himselfe the towne of Waterford, with the territories and lands thereunto adioining: & not long after some of those traitors, who thus had betrated him, were themselves taken and put to death.

(1) Corke, in Latine named Corcagium, is an ancient citie in the prouince of Downe, and builded (as it should appeare) by the Casterlings or Porwaits. It standeth now in a marsh or a bog, and vnto to it floweth an arme of the seas, in the which are manie goodlie receptacles or harboroughs for ships, & much frequented as well for the goodlie commodities of fishings therein, as also for the trade of merchantrie, by the which the citie is chieflie maintained: for the inhabitants are not onlie merchants & great trauellers themselves; but also great store of strange merchants doe daillie resort & traffike with them. It is walled round about, and well fortified for a sufficient defense against the Irishie. In it is the bishops see of that diocesse, being called by the name of the bishop of Corkie. The citie is gouerned by a maior and two bailiffes, who vsing the gouernement according to the lawes of England, doe keepe and mainteine the same in verie good order. They are verie much troubled with the enimie, and therefore they doe continuallie, as men lying in a garison, keepe watch and ward both daie and night. The prince of that countrie did most commonlie keepe a staie himselfe in all troubles within that citie, vntill the time the same was conquered by the Englishmen, who euer since haue inhabited in the same.

(2) It flemore in times past was as fatre a towne as it is ancient, and standeth vpon a goodlie riuier, which floweth vnto Poughall, and so into the maine seas. It was sometimes a bishopprike, but of late vnto the bishoppricke of Waterford, and so it lieth in the countie and diocesse of Waterford, but the soile it selfe was within the countie of Corke.

(2) Cathill is an old ruinous towne, but walled, and stanneth upon the river Sure. In it is the see and cathedrall church of the bishop, bearing the name thereof, who is one of the foure archbishops of that land, and under him are the bishops of Waterford, Cork, and seven others.

(4) The Sure is a godlie and a notable river, and one of the chiefest in that land. It hath his head or spring in a certeine hill called Blandina, but in Irish Sloghblome, for the pleasantnesse thereof. Spanie god townes are seated and buldoed vpon the same, & it is nauigable more than the one halfe. It fleetheth from the spring or head fast by the towne of Tholeis, whereof the earle of Ormond is baron: from thence to the holie crosse and so to Clomnell, & from thence to Carig Mac Griffith, where is an ancient house of the earles, sometime named the earles of the Carig, but now earles of Ormond; and from thence flæting by Tibzach, it commeth to Waterford; and flæting by the wals thereof, it runneth into the seas.

(5) Limerike is one of the first cities builded by the Norwages or Casserlings, named sometimes Ossomen: the founder whercof was the yongest of thre brethren whose name was Pruozus. It standeth vpon the famous and noble riuer of Shenin, which goeth round about it, the same being as it were an Island. The seat of it is such, as none can be more faire or more statelie. It lieth in the maine land with in the prouince of Hounsser, called the north Hounsser, and is from the maine seas aboute fortie miles, and yet at the wals euen the greatest ship at the seas maie be discharged and vnladen, and pcerlie so there are: for the citie it selfe is chieflie inhabited by merchants. It is gouerned by a maior and balliue. It is after and according to the English lawes and ordres. It was in times pass vnder a particular prince of it selfe, but euer since the conquest it hath bene inhabited by the Englishmen, who doe so still continue therein.

(6) Tibbary is an old towne, which in times past was rich and verie well inhabited, it lieth vpon the north side of the Sure, and about two miles from Carrig Mac Briffith. In it is a great stone standing, which is the bound betwene the counties of Kilkennie and Down.

Rothorike OConnor the monarch and all the princes in Ulster submit and yeeld themselues vnto the king, as he passeth towards Dublin.

Chap. 33.

10 These things thus don at Waterford, the king left Robert Fitzbarnard there with his household, and marched himselfe to Dublin through the countrie of Ossio: and stateng somewhat by the wate in his tournie there came and resorted vnto him out of euerie place there the great men & princes, as namelie Macelan Apelan prince of Ossio, Pache Talcio, Dhuwe, lie Gillemeholoch, Achadese, & Carell of Triell & Ozioke of Meth: all which yelded & submitted them selues to the king in their owne persons, & became 20 his vassals, & swoze fealtie. But Kothorike the monarch came no neerer than to the riuer side of the (1) Shenin, which diuideth Connagh from Meth, & there Hugh de Lacie and William Fitzaldeline by the kings commandement met him, who desiring peace submitted himselfe, swoze allegiance, became tributarie, and did put in (as all others did) hostages and pledges for the keeping of the same. Thus was all Ireland sauing Ulster brought in subiection, and euerie particular prince in his proper person did 30 peeld and submit himselfe, sauing onelie Kothorike, the then monarch of all Ireland; and yet by him and in his submission all the residue of the whole land became the kings subiects, and submitted themselves. For indeede there was no one nor other within that land, who was of anie name or countenance, but that he did present himselfe befoze the kings maiestie, and yelded vnto him subiection and due obedience.

And then was fulfilled the old and vulgar prophesie of S. Polin ; Before him all the princes shall fall downe, and vnder a dissembled submission shall obtaine fauor and grace . Likewise the prophesie of Merlin ; All the birds of that Island shall flie to his light, and the greater birds shall be taken & brought into captiuitie, and their wings shall be burned . Also the old prophesie of Merlin Ambrose ; Five positions shall be brought into one , & the first shall breake and ouerthrow the walles of Ireland . That which Ambrose nameth here the first, Celidonius nameth the first, as appeareth in his booke of prophesies . Now when the feast of Christmasse did approach and draw neere, manie and the most part of the princes of that land resorted and made repaire vnto Dublin, to see the kings court ; and when they saw the great abundance of vittells, and the noble seruices, as also the eating of cranes, which they much lothed, being not before accustomed there vnto , they much wondered and marvelled thereat : but in the end they being by the kings commandement set downe, did also there eat and drinke among them . At this time there were certeine soldiors, being women, leashed at Fin glas, and they helued and cut downe the trees which grew about the churchyard, which had bene there planted of old time by certeine good and holie men : and all these soldiors suddenlie fell sicke of the pestilence and died all : as is moze at large declared in our topographie.

(1) The Sherin is the chieffest and most famous river in that land, and doeth in a manner intire and inclose all Connagh, & divideth it from the provinces of Downe and Deth: his head and spring is in the hill named Therne, which bordereth upon the of the Banne in Ulster, and in length is supposed to be about a hundred and twentie English miles. It is increased with sundrie brooks, and diuerse riuers run into the same; the chiefeft whereof is that which riseth and cometh out of the lough or lake Foile. In it are manie loghs or lakes of great quantitie or bignesse, which are maruelouslie replenished and stored with abundance of fish: the chiefeft of which are the lough Rie, and the lough Derigid. It is nauigable aboue thre score miles, and vpon it standeth the most famous citie of Limerike. There is onlie one bridge ouer it, builded of late yeares at Alone, by the right honorable sir Henrie Sidene knight, then lord deputie of the realme.

The councell or synod kept at Cashill.

Chap. 34.

The realme beeing now in good peace and quietnesse, and the king now hauing a care and a zeale to set forth Gods honoz and true religion, summoned a synod of all the clergie vnto Cashill, where inquirie and examination was made of the wicked and lose life of the people of the land and nation: which was registred in writing, and sealed vnder the seale of the bishop of Lisemore, who being then the popes legat was president of that councell. And then & there were made and decreed sundrie good and godlie constitutions, which are yet extant; as namelie, for contracting of marriage, for payment of tithes, for the reuerend and cleane keeping of the churches; and that the vniuersall church of Ireland should be reduced in all things to the order and forme of the church of England. Which constitutions were forthwith published throughout the realme, and doe here follow.

Constitutions made at the councell of Cashill.

Chap. 35.

In the yere of Christs incarnation 1172, & in the first yere that the most noble king of England conquered Ireland, Christianus bishop of Lisemore, and legat of the apostolicke see, Donat archbishop of Cashill, Laurence archbishop of Dublin, and Catholikus archbishop of Thomond with their suffragans and fellow-bishops, abbats, archdeacons, priors, deanes, & manie other prelates of the church of Ireland, by the commandement of the king did assemble themselves and kept a synod at Cashill: and there debating manie things concerning the wealth, estate, and reformation of the church, did prouide remedies for the same. At this councell were also for and in the behalfe of the king, whom he had sent thither, Rafe abbat of Buldetwais, Rafe archdeacon of (1) Landasse, Nicholas the chapleine, and diuerse other good clearks. Sundrie good statutes and wholesome laws were there deuised, which were after subscribed and confirmed by the king himselfe, and vnder his authoritie, which were these that follow. First, it is decreed that all good faithfull and christian people, throughout Ireland, should forbear and shun to marrie with their nere kinsfolke and cousins, & marrie with such as lawfullie they should do. Secondarilie, that children shall be catechised without the church doore, and baptised in the font appointed in the churches for the same. Thirdlie, that euerie christian bodie do faithfullie and trulie paie yerelie the tithes of his cattels, corne, and all other his increase and profits to the church & partly where he is a parishioner. Fourthlie, that all the church lands and possessions, throughout all Ireland, shall be free from all secular exactions and impositions: and especiallie that no lords, earles, nor noble men, nor their children, nor familie, shall extort or take anie coine and luerie, coheries, nor custodies, nor anie other like custome from thenceforth, in or vpon anie of the church lands and territories. And likewise that they nor no other person doe henceforth 10 extort out of the said church lands, old, wicked, and detestable customes of coine and luerie, which they were wont to extort vpon such towne and villages of the churches, as were nere and next bordering vpon them. Fiftlie, that when carike or composition is made among the late people for anie murder, that no person of the cleargie, though he be kin to anie of the parties, shall contribute anie thing therevnto: but as they be guiltlesse from the murder, so shall they be free from payment of monie, for anie 20 such carike or release for the same. Sixtly, that all and euerie good christian being sicke & weake, shall before the priest and his neighbors make his last will and testament; and his debts and seruants wages being paid, all his mouables to be diuided (if he haue anie children) into thre parts: whereof one part to be to the children, another to his wife, and the third part to be for the performance of his will. And if so be that he haue no children, then the goods to be diuided into two parts, whereof the one moitie to his 30 wife, and the other to the performance of his will and testament. And if he haue no wife, but onelie children, then the goods to be likewise diuided into two parts, whereof the one to himselfe, and the other to his children. Seuenthlie, that euerie christian being dead, and dieng in the catholike faith, shall be reuerendlie brought to the church, and to be buried as apperteineth. Finallie, that all the diuine seruice in the church of Ireland shall be kept, vsed, & obserued in the like order and maner as it is in the church of England. For it is meet and right, that as by Gods 40 prouidence and appointment Ireland is now become subiect, and vnder the king of England: so the same should take from thence the order, rite, and maner how to reforme themselves, and to liue in better order. For whatsoeuer good thing is befallen to the church & realme of Ireland, either concerning religion, or peaceable gouernement, they owe the same to the king of England, and are to be thankfull vnto him for the same: for before his coming into the land of Ireland, manie and all sorts of wickednesses in times past flowed and reigned amongst them: all which now by his authoritie and godnesse are abolished. The primate of Armagh, by reason of his weaknesse and great age, was not present at the synod: but afterwards he came to Dublin, and gaue his full consent to the same. This holie man (as the common saieng was) had a white cow, and being fed onelie by his milke, he was alwaies carried with him wheresoeuer he went and trauelled from home.

The tempestuous and stormie winter.

Chap. 36.

The seas, which a long time had beene calme, began now to swell, and to be full of continuall storms and tempests, which were so raging, and so great, that in all that winter there arriued scarselie anie one ship or barke from anie place into that land: neither was there anie news heard from out of anie countrie during that winter. Wherevpon men began to be afraid, and thinke verelie that God in his anger would punish them.

them, and be reuenged for their wicked & sinfull life, and therefore had sent this plague vpon them. At this time in Southwales by reason of the extreme and continuall tempests, the sea sides and shoies, which had manie yeares bene couered with great sand ridges, were now washed and carried awaie with the seas, and then there appeared the former fast and firme earth, and therein a great number of trees standing which did in times past grow there: and by reason they had bene so long couered, & as it were buried vnder the sands, they stood as trunked and polled trees, and were as blacke as is the Ebente. A maruelous alteration, that the place sometimes couered with seas, and a waie for ships to passe, is now become a soile of ground and drie land. But some suppose that this was so at the first, and that those trees were there growing before or shortly after the flood of Noah. The king remained at Worcester, still longing to heare news from beyond the seas: and thus lieng solitarie he practised by all the means and sleights he coulde, how he might sleeke and procure vnto him Reimond, Miles Cogan, William Mackerell, & other of the best gentlemen; that he being assured of them to be firme of his side, he might be the stronger, and the earle the weaker.

The conspiracie made against the king by his sonnes, and the ambassage of the legat from the pope vnto him.

Chap. 37.

After violent the wind being easterlie, there came and arriued into Ireland certeine ships, as well from out of England, as also from out of Aquitaine in France, which brought him verie ill & bad newes. For there were come into Normandie from pope Alexander the thirde two cardinals in an ambassage, the one of them being named Albertus, and the other Theodinus, to make inquirie of the death of Thomas archbishop of Canturburie. They were thought and taken to be iust and good men, and therefore were chosen of trust and of purpose for this matter: but yet for all that they were Romans, and who were fullie determined to haue interdicted, not onelie England, but also all the whole dominions subiect vnto the king, if he himselfe had not the sooner come and met with them. Besides this, there was worse newes told him, and a worse mishap befell vnto him (for commonlie good lucke commeth alone, but ill haps come by heapes and by huddels) which was, that his eldest sonne whom he loued so deerie, and whom he had crowned king, as also his two yonger sonnes, with the consent and helpe of sundrie noble men, as well in England as beyond the seas, had confederated themselves, and conspired against the king in his absence. Which newes and secret conspiracie when he heard and vnderstood, he was in a maruelous perplexitie, and for verie anguish and greafe of mind did sweat. First it grieved him that he should be suspected and infamed of the crime thereof he was guiltlesse. Also he feared of the great troubles which would grow and issue hereby to his kingdome, & all other his dominions. Yea, and it grieved him verie much, that he being minded and determined the next summer then following to settle Ireland in some good state, and to fortifie the same with holds and castels, he should now be compelled and dzenen to leaue the same broken. Wherefore sending some before him into England, as well to aduertise his comming homewards, as also of the safetie he had taken for Ireland, he be- thought himselfe, as also toke good aduise and counsell, what was best to be done in these his weightie causes.

The king returneth homewards through Westwales, and of the speaking stone at saint Dauids.

Chap. 38.

The king being minded and determined to returne into England, let his realm of Ireland in good order, and left Hugh de Lacie (vnto whom he had given in fee the countrie of Gwent) with twentie gentlemen, & Fitz-Stephans & Maurice Fitzgerald with twentie other gentlemen, to be wardens and conestables of Dublin. Likewise he left Humfrey de Bohune, Robert Fitzbarnard, and Hugh de Gundenille, with twentie gentlemen, to keepe and gouerne Waterford. Also he left William Fitzalbine, Philip of Hastings, and Philip de Buse, to be gouernors and rulers of Worcester: they hauing also twentie gentlemen of seruice appointed vnto them. And on the monday in the Easter weeke, earlie in the morning at the sunne rising, he toke shipping without the barre of Worcester; and the wind being westerlie and blowing a good gale, he had a verie good passage, and arriued about the nonetide of the same daie vnto the baie of saint Dauids: where he being set on land, he went on foot with a staffe in his hand in pilgrimage, and in great deuotion vnto the church of saint Dauids; whom the cleargie in procession met at the gate called the white gate, and with great honour receiued him. And as they were going verie orderlie and solemne in procession, there came vnto him a Welsh or a Camber woman; and falling downe at his feet, she made a great complaint against the bishop of that place: which being by an interpreter declared vnto the king, albeit he vnderstood it well, yet he gaue hir no answer.

She thinking that hir sute was not regarded, dolozing hir fits, and cried out with a loud voice: Reuenge vs this day O Lechlanar, Reuenge vs I say, our kindred, and our nation, from this man. And being willed by the people of that countrie, who vnder-stood hir speech, to hold hir peace, as also did thrust hir out of the companie; she cried the more, trausting and alluding to a certeine blind prophesie of Merlin, which was; that The king of England the conqueror of Ireland, should be wounded in Ireland by a man with a red hand, and in his returning homewards through Southwales should die vpon Lechlanar.
This Lechlanar was the name of a certeine great stone which laie ouer a brooke, which fleteth or runneth on the north side of the churchyard, and was a bridge ouer the same: and by reason of the often and continuall going of the people ouer it, it was verie smooth and slipperie. In length it was of ten foot, in breadth six foot, and in thickeesse one foot. And this word Lechlanar, in the Camber or Welsh tongue, is to saie, The speaking stone. For it was an old blind satieng among the people in that countrie, that on a time there was a dead corps caried ouer that stone to be buried, and the said stone spake, and forthwith broke and claued asunder in the middle, and which clift so remaineth vnto this daie. And therevpon the people of that countrie, of a verie vaine and barbarous superstition, haue not since, nor yet will carie anie more dead bodie ouer the same.

The king being come to this stone, and hearing of this prophesie, paused and staid a little while; and then vpon a sudden, verie hastily he went ouer it: which done, he looked backe vpon the stone, and spake somewhat sharpelie, saieing: Who is he that will beleue that lieng Merlin anie more? A man of that place standing thereby, and seeing what had happened, he to excuse Merlin, said with a loud voice; Thou art art not be that shall conquer Ireland, neither doth Merlin meane it of thee. The king then went into the cathedrall church which was dedicated to saint Andrew and to saint David: and having made his prayers, and heard diuine seruice, he went to supper, and rode after to Banerford west to bed, which is about twelue miles from thence.

(1) The wynter hereof (of verie purpose) in the ycare 1575, went to the foresaid place to see the said stone, but there was no such to be found; and the place where the said stone was said to lie, is now an archyd bridge, vnder which steth the brooke aforesaid, which brooke doth not diuide the churchyard from the church, but the churchyard & church from the bishops and prebendaries houses, which houses in times past were verie faire and good hospitalitie kept therein. But as the most part of houses are fallen down, and altogether ruinous, so the hospitalitie is also there with decayed. And for the veritie of the foresaid stone, there is no certeinie affirmed, but a report is remaining amongst the common people of such a stone to haue bene there in times past.

The submission of king Henrie to the pope, and his reconciliation, as also the agreement betweene him and the French king.

Chap. 39.

The king then tooke his iourne from Banerford homewards along by the sea side, euen the same waite as before he came thither; and forthwith in all hast he taketh shipping, and sailed into Normandie: and immediately vnderstanding where the popes legats were, he repaired vnto them, and presented himselfe in most humble manner before them. Where before whome after sundrie altercations passed to and fro betweene them, he purged himselfe by his oth, that he was gilty of the death of the archbishop Thomas: neuertheless he was contented to do the penance inioined him, for although he did not kill, nor yet know, nor consent to the murdering of him, yet he denied not but that the same was done for his sake. The ambassadors & legats hauing thus ended with the king, with much honour returned backe, and homewards to Rome. And then the king travelled and went to the marches of France, there to talke and haue conference with Lewis the French king, betwene whome then was discorde and debate. But after sundrie speeches past betwene them, at length by the means and intercession of sundrie good men, and especiallie of Phillip earle of Flanders (who was but then returned from Compostella, where he had bene in pilgrimage vnto saint James) the same was ended; and the displeasure which he had conceiued about and for the death of the archbishop of Canturburie was clerelie released. And by these means, the great malice and secret conspiracies of his sonnes and their confederats was for this time suppressed and quailed, and so continued vntill the ycare following.

(1) They which do wyrite and intreat of the life and death of this archbishop, do affirme that the king after the death of this man, did send his ambassadors to pope Alexander at Rome, to purge himselfe of this fact. And notwithstanding that he tooke a corporall oth, that he neither did it nor caused it to be done, nor yet gave anie consent, or was prute thereof, nor yet was gilty in anie respect, sauing that he confessed he did not so well fauour the bishop as he had done in times past: yet could not his ambassadors be admitted to the presence and sight of the pope, vnless he had yielded himselfe to his arbitrement and iudgement: which was that he should do certeine penance, as also to performe certeine intunacions which were as followeth. That the king at his proper costs and charges should keepe and susteine two hundred soldiers for one whole ycare, to defend the holie land against the Turke. That he should permit, and that it should be lawfull to all his subiects as often as them list to appeale to the see of Rome. That none should be accounted themselves to be lawfull king of England, vntill such time as he were confirmed by the Roman bishop. That he should restore to the church of Canturburie all such goods and possessions as were taken and detained from the same since the death of the archbishop. That he should suffer all such people as were fled or banished out of the realme for his sake, to returne home without delate or let, and to introy and haue againe all such goods and lands whatsoever they had before. Other things this Romish antichrist did demand, and which the king was compelled to grant vnto before he could be released: whereby it doth appeare how much they do varie from the calling of Christs apostles; and how that (contrarie to the rule of the gospel) their onelie endeavour was to make and haue princes and kingdoms subiect to their becke and tyrannie.

Intunacions by the pope to the king of England.

The vision which appeared vnto the king at his being at Cardiffe.

Chap. 40.

At before we do proceed anie further, it were not amisse to declare what happened and befell vnto the king in his returning through Wales, after his coming from Ireland. In his iourne he came to the towne of Cardiffe on the saturday in the Easter weeke, and lodged there all that night. On the morrow being sunday, and commonlie called little Easter daie or Low sunday, he went somewhat earlie to the chapel of saint Bertan, and there heard diuine seruice, but he staid there in his secret prayers behind all his companie, somewhat longer than he was wont to do: at length he came out, and leaping to his horse, there stood before him one hauing before him a stake, or a post pitched in the ground. He was of colour somewhat yelowish, his head rounded and a leane face, of stature somewhat high, and aged about forty yeares; his apparell was white, being close & downe to the ground, he was girded about the middle, and bare footed. This man spake to the king in Dutch, saying; God saue the king, and then said thus vnto him: Christ and his mother Marie, John baptist, and Peter the apostle do salute thee: and do strallee charge and commaund thee, that thou do forbid, that henceforth throughout all thy kingdome and dominions, there be no faires nor markets kept in anie place vpon the sundays: and that vpon those daies no maner or person do anie bodilie worke, but onelie to serue God, sauing such as be appointed to dresse the meat. If thou wilt thus do, all that thou shalt take in hand shall prosper, and thy selfe shalt haue a happie life. The king then spake in French to the gentleman, who held his horse by the bridle, and whose name was Phillip Bertros, a man borne in those parts, and who told me this tale: Aske him whether he dreame or not. Which when he had so done, the man looking vpon the king said: Whether I dreame or not, marke well and remember what date this is: for if thou do not this, and speedilie amend thy wicked life, thou shalt before the ycare come about heare such euill news of those things which thou louest be it, and thou shalt be so much inquieted therewith, that thou shalt not find anie ease or end untill thy dieng daie. With this word the king put spur to the hourse and rode awaite towards the towne gate, which was at hand: but thinking vpon the words, resigned his hourse and said; Call me yonder fellow againe. Whereupon the foresaid gentleman as also one William, which stood were onelie then attending vpon him, first called and then sought him in the chappell, and finding him not there, sought him throughout the court, the towne, and in all the Iris, but could not find him. The king being verie sad and sozie that he had not throughlie talked with the man, went abroad himselfe to seeke him, but finding him not, called for his hourses and rode from thence by Kempinbodge to Newberie. And as this man had before threatened and said, it so came to passe before the yeare was ended: for his eldest sonne Henrie, and his two yonger sonnes Richard earle of Aquitaine, and Gessreie erle of Britaine, in the Lent following forsooke and shooke from him, and went to Helmes the French king. Whereof grew and ensued vnto him such veneration and inquietnesse, as he had neuer the like before, and which by one means and other neuer left him untill his dieng daie. And suerlie it was thought the same by Gods iust iudgement to befall vnto him: for as he had bene and was a disobedient sonne to his spirituall father, so his carnall sonnes should be disobedient and rebellious against their carnall father. Manie such forewarnings the king had by Gods mercie and goodnesse sent vnto him before his death, to the end he should repent and be conuerted, and not be condemned: which would to God that euerie prince and other man did not forwardlie and obstinatlie condemne, but rather with an humble and a penitent heart they would (as they ought to do) receiue and embrace the same! And therefore I haue and mind to write more at large in my booke, concerning the instruction and institution of a christian prince.

The treason and killing of Ororike prince of Meth.

In the meane time Ireland was in good rest and peace, vnder such as vnto whom the charge thereof was committed. And now on a time it happened, that the one eied Ororike of Meth, being at Dublin, complained vnto Hugh de Lacie of certaine injuries done vnto him, praieing redress: whereupon the daie and a place of (1) parlee was betwene them appointed for the same. The night next before the daie of this parlee, a yong gentleman named Griffith, the nephew of Robert Fitzstephans, and Maurice Fitzgerald, being the sonne to their eldest brother named William, dreamed in his sleepe that he saw a great heard of wild hogs to rush and run vpon Hugh de Lacie and his uncle Maurice; and that one of them being more horrible and greater than the rest, had with his tusks rent and killed them: if he had not with all his force and strength rescued them, and killed the hore. On the morrow according to appointment, they came to the place appointed for the parlee, which was a certaine hill called Morikes hill: but before they came to the verie hill it selfe, they sent messengers the one to the other, requirring assurance and safetie: and hauing sware on each part to keepe faith and truth, they came to the place appointed and there met, but yet a small companie on either side. For it was agreed vpon on both parties, & by couenant excepted, that on each part they should bring but a few and the like number, and they to be all unarmed; the swords on one side and the spars on the other side, and for all the residue of the people and companie to stand aloofe and a farre off. But Griffith, who came to the said parlee with his uncle Maurice, was verie pensife and much troubled, concerning the vision which he saw in his sleepe; and doubting of the worst, made chosse of seven of the best gentlemen of his kindred, whom he knew to be valiant, and in whom he had a speciall trust and confidence. These he dreweth to the one side of the hill, but as nere to the place of parlee as he could, where euerie of them having his sword, spar and shield; kept and mounted vpon to their hourses, and ranging the fields they made sundrie carriers and lustie turnaments, vnder the pretense and colour of plesantnes and pastime; but in verie deed to be in a readinesse if need should so require.

Hugh de Lacie and Maurice this meane while were talking and discourting of manie things, but concluded not of anie thing; neither did Maurice meane anie such thing. For hauing a traitorous mind, and watching his time when he might best pounce out his venem, sained himselfe to go out and abroad to make water, and vnder that colour beckened vnto his men, with whom he had concluded and agreed before, that with all hast they should come awaite vnto him; and they forthwith in all hast so did, and he also then with a pale, grim, and murderous countenance, hauing his ar or spar vpon his shoulder, returned backe againe. Maurice Fitzgerald, which was before warned by his cousine Griffith and aduertised of his dreame, gaue god eie and watched the matter verie narrowly; and therefore all the parlee time, he had his sword readie drawne about him: and espieng the traitor to be fullie bent and about to strike Hugh de Lacie, he cried out vnto him, willing him to looke vnto himselfe, and to be at defense with himselfe; wherewith the traitor most violentlie strake vnto him, thinking verelie to haue murdered and dispatched him. But the interpreter of the parlee stepping in betwene, saued Hugh de Lacie; but he himselfe was wounded to death, and his arme cleane cut off.

When Maurice Fitzgerald with a lowd voice cried out to his companie, who with all hast came awaite; and then began a hot and a sharpe bickering of the English swords against the Irish spars. In which skirmishing Hugh de Lacie was twice felled to the ground, and had suerlie bene killed, if Maurice had not valiantlie rescued him. Likewise the Irishmen who were manie in number, they hauing espied the becking of the traitor, they came running in all hast out of the ballies with their weapons, thinking verelie to haue made a cleane dispatch and a full end of Hugh de Lacie and of Maurice Fitzgerald. But Griffith and his companions, still watching for that which indeed did happen, were at the first call of Maurice in a readinesse, and being on horsebacke they came awaite with all speed: which thing when the traitor saw, he gan to distrust, and thought to shift himselfe awaite and so to escape. But as he was leaping to his hourse, Griffith was come, and with his staffe or lance strake downe and ran through both hourse and man: who being thus stricken downe and killed, as also three other of his men, who brought him his hourse and were in this bickering, they cut off his head from the bodie, and sent it ouer into England to the king. The residue of the Irishmen fled forthwith and ranne awaite, but being hardlie pursued even to the verie woods, there was a great discomfiture and slaughter made of them. young gentleman, did well acquite himselfe, and deserved great commendation for his good service.

(1) The manner of the Irishie was ever, and yet is, that when so ever there is any controuersie amongst them, they will oftentimes appoint places where to meet and assemble themselves for conference; which commonlie is upon some hill distant and farre from any house, and this assemble is called among them a parlée or a parlement. And albeit the pretense hereof is of some quietnesse and reuerence: yet experience teacheth that there is not a worse thing to be used among them. For lightlie and most commonlie there are most treacheries and treasons, most murders and robberies, and all wickednesse imagined, devised, and afterwards put in practise among them: and for the most part there is no parlée among them, whereof insueth not some mischief.

(2) This hill lieth in the prouince of Meath, about twentie miles from Dublin, and is now called the Baragh: some thinke this to be the middle part or nauill of that prouince; it is a verie pleasant and a fertile soile, and also for the most part champion.

Sundrie examples concerning visions.

WHETHER so much as there be sundrie opinions and iudgments concerning visions, it shall not be much amisse, or impertinent to our matter, to recite a few examples & true reports of the same. Valerius Maximus in his first booke and sequenth chapter writeth, that two men of Arcadia, iournieng together in companie towards a towne named Megara, when they came thither, the one of them lodged himselfe with his friend, but the other at a common Inn. He who late in his friends house being in bed and asleepe, dreamed that his companion came vnto him, and requested him to helpe him, because his host did oppresse him; wherewith he awoke, but verie shortly he fell asleepe againe, and dreamed that his said companion came againe vnto him being verie sore wounded, and prayed him that although he would not at the first time come and helpe him, yet that he would now reuenge his death, declaring that his host had taken his head and corpe, and put it into a cart to be carted to the dunghill, and there to be buried. This man being awaked, and much troubled with this dreame, arose and sought for his fellow, and finding his dreame to be true, caused the host to be taken and apprehended, who for that his fact was executed and put to death. Aterius Rufus a gentleman of Rome likewise, being on a time at Stracusa, he dreamed that he was killed by a maister of fense, which came so to passe: for on the morrow after he was present at the plaie or game of swordplayes or maisters of defense, whereas a netcaster was brought in to fight with a swordplaier. Whereupon Aterius offering his dreame to him that sat next by him, would haue gone and departed awate; but being perswaded to the contrarie, did staie to his owne destruction. For the netcaster hauing overthrowne the swordplaier, and thinking to haue pearced him through with his sword, missed him and strooke Aterius, who sat in place next therevnto, and so was he slaine. Also Simonides the poet, being on a time set on land vpon the sea shore, he saw there a dead man lieng vnburied. The night following he dreamed that the said dead man did aduise and admonish him, that he should not take ship the daie following: but his felowes minding not to lose any time, and the weather seeming then to be faire, they went all aboard, and hoised by their sailes; which Simonides refused to do, and tarried at land. It was not long after but that the weather warded to be fowle, and the seas to be high, and in the end both the ship and men to be all lost: but Simonides crediting his dreame, was saved. Moreover Calpurnia, the wife vnto Julius Cesar, the night before her husband was slaine, dreamed that she saw him greatly wounded to lie in her lap: wherewith the being afraid did awake, and told Julius her dreame, requesting him that he would forbear to repaire to the senat house that daie: but he giuing small credit to a womans dreame, followed his mind, and was slaine by the senators. But to leaue these examples fetched from out of other nations, let vs come nere home to our selues. A brother of mine named Walter Barrie, a lustie young gentleman, making himselfe ready on a time to serue in a certeine hosting against his enimie; the night before he should take his iournie, he dreamed that my mother who was dead on long before, did come vnto him, and aduise & warne him, that if he loued his life he should in any wise refraine and forbear that iournie. She in deed was not his naturall mother, but his mother in law, and yet loued him in her life time as intirely as her owne child. When he had told this his dreame to his father and mine, for indeed we were both brothers by one father, though we had not one mother: he also gaue him the like aduise and counsell, but he of his presumptuous mind, not regarding the same, followed his owne mind, and the same daie was killed by his enimie.

(2) As dreames sometimes are god forewarnings to men to eschew evils which are towards, yet they are not alwaies to be so receiued, as prognostications infallible. For sometimes the same fall out to the contrarie, as dooth appere by Augustus the emperor; who hauing warres against Brutus and Cassius, and he by reason of his sicknesse carried in a litter, his physician Arterius dreamed that the goddesse Minerua did appeare vnto him, willing him to aduise and counsell the emperor, that he should not by reason of his sicknesse come into the field, nor be present in the battell, which he did. But the emperor notwithstanding entered into the field, being carried in his litter, and toke marvellous great pains. And albeit Brutus taking the emperors tents, seemed to haue the victorie; yet was he for all that vanquished, and the emperor had the conquest. Likewise in west Wales, of late yeares, it happened a certeine rich man dwelling on the north side of a certeine mountaine, he dreamed three nights together, that there was a chaine of gold hidden in the head stone, which couered and laie vpon a certeine well or founteine, named faint Bernaces well, and that he should go and fetch it. This man at length, somewhat believing the dreame, and minding to trie the same, went to the place, and did put his hand into the hole or place: but his hand was no sooner in, but that it was bitten, stung, and enuened with an adder. Wherefore a man may see hereby what credit is to be giuen to dreames, and I for my part doo so credit of them as I doo of rumors. But concerning such visions as God dooth send by his angels to his prophets and holie men, we must otherwise thinke of them; because the effect of them is most vndoubted, certeine, and assured.

pose, wherein the people might sit to view and behold the same. Of these plaies or games some were of cruell beasts the one fighting with the other, some of men fighting with beasts, and some of men fighting the one with the other, and these plaies were called ludi gladiatorij, games of sword plaies or fighting: for as in combates in England, so they being unharnessed, did fight with their swords or weapons in the open sight of the people, incenouring each one to kill the other, which were spectacles of crueltie to harden the peoples hearts against killing in the warres. Of these some were called Mirmillones, which were such as chalenged the fight; some were called Gladiatores, and these were such as we doe name masters of defenses, because they used onelie or cheslie the sword; and some were called Retiarij, and these besides their weapons did use a certeine kind of net, which in fighting they were wont to take and intrap their enemies, and such a one was this man, who fighting with a challenger, did by chance misse him and kill Aterius.

(2) In the old and first ages, men were much given to dreames and visions: and oftentimes great forewarnings and prognostications were given thereby, as doth appeare in the holie scriptures, as also in prophane histories. For Joseph the son of Jacob, king Pharaos, king Nabuchodonosor, Pardocheus, Daniell, Judas Machabeus, Hercules, Pyrrhus, Cicero, Cassius, Parmensis, & manie others dreamed dreames, and the same came to passe. But yet these being but particular examples, and which it pleased God for some secret cause to use: they are not to be drawn for presidents and examples to be daile or in these daies used; but rather we must have a respect and a regard to Gods speciall commandment, who by the mouths of his prophets hath utterlie forbidden vs to listen to anie dreamer, or to give credit unto his words. Thou shalt not (saith he) hearken to the words of a dreamer of dreames, for dreames have deceived manie a man, and they have failed them who have put their trust in them: for whie, they are full of deceits and guiles, and invented either for the maintenance of superstition and error, or for the increasing of some filthie lucre and gain. Pharozius therefore inveighing against the Chaldeans, who were a people which were wont to relie much upon dreames, willety and aduisey that no dreamer or interpreter of dreames should be sought or dealt withall. For (saith he) if they tell thee of anie good thing, and in the end doe deceiue thee, thou shalt be in miserie to hope in vaine for the same. If they tell thee of some misfortune, and yet doe lie, yet shalt thou be in miserie, because thou shalt be still in feare lest it may happen. And likewise if they shew thee of euill haps, and the same doe so follow, thou shalt be in miserie and vnquieted, that thy fortune and destinie is so euill. But if they tell thee of good things, and it be long yer the same doe happen, thou shalt be much vnquieted to loke so long for it; and alwaies in feare lest thine expectation shall be frustrated: wherefore in no wise doe thou seeke anie such persons, nor giue anie credit unto them.

The description of Maurice Fitzgerald.

This Maurice was a man of much nobilitie and worthip, but somewhat shamefast and yet verie well coloured, and of a good countenance, of stature he was indifferent, bring seemlie and well compact at all points, in bodie and mind he was of a like composition, being not too great in the one, nor proud in the other; of nature he was verie courteous and gentle, and desired rather so to be in deed, than to be thought or reputed so to be: he kept such a measure and a moderation in all his doings, that in his daies he was a patterne of all sobrietie and good behauiour; a man of few words, and his sentences more full of wit and reason than of words and speeches; he had more stomach than talke, more reason than speech, and more wise, dome than eloquence. And when so ever anie matter was to be debated, as he would take god leasure, and be aduised before he would speake: so when he spake he did it verie wiselie and prudentlie. In martiall affaires also he was verie bold, stout, and valiant, and yet not hastie to run headlong in anie aduventure. And as he would be well aduised before he gaue the attempt and aduventure, so when the same was once taken in hand, he would stoutlie pursue and follow the same. He was sober, modest, and chaste, constant, trustie, and faithfull: a man not altogether without fault, and yet not spotted with anie notorious crime and fault.

The first diffention betweene the king and his sonnes.

Chap. 44.

In the moneth of Aprill then next following, the yong king sonne to king Henrie the elder, being no longer able to conceale or suppress the wickednesse he had deuised against his father: he (I saie) and his two brethren the earls of Aquitaine and of Britaine suddenlie stole awaie into France, unto Helwes the French king his father in law: for he had married his daughter, that hauing his aid he might ouer-run his owne father, and shorten his old yeares. And for his further helpe he had procured unto him and on his side manie noble men both French and English, who openlie, but manie more, who secretlie did some with him to aid him. The elder king the father was verie much troubled and vnquieted for and about these and manie other sudden troubles, which on euerie side did grow upon him; but yet he bare it out with a good face and countenance, dissembling that outwardlie which he conceiued inwardlie. And to stand firme and assured, he got and procured by all the meanes he could all such aid and helpe as was to be gotten and had. He sent into Ireland for his garrison, which he had left there; and being at home he committed the charge and government of all Ireland unto the earle Richard; but joined Keimond in commission with him, because the earle without him would not doe anie thing, nor take the charge upon him. And then the king of his liberalitie gaue also unto him the towne of Waterford with the castell of Gaskillo.

Of the victories of king Henrie the second.

The king hauing indured more than twell wars two whole yeares together aswell in England as in Aquitaine, in great troubles, much wachings, & painfull travels, yet at length most valiantlie he preuailed against his enemies; & surelie it was more of Gods goodness, than by mans power, and (as it is to be thought) for the reuenge of the disobedience & wrongs done by the sons against against the father. But forsomuch as a mans owne household are commonlie the worst enemies; and of all enemies, the household & familiar enemy is most dangerous: there was no one thing, which more troubled and grieved the king, than the gentlemen of his private chamber, and in whose hands in a manner late his life or death, would euerie night secretly and with treacherous minds run and resort to his sonnes, and in the morning when they should do him service, they were not to be found. And albeit these warres in the beginning were verie doubtfull, and the king himselfe in great despaire: yet his hard beginning had a good ending, and he in the end had the victorie to his great honor and glorie. And God, who at the first seemed to be angry with him, and in his anger to powze vpon him his wrath and indignation: yet now vpon his amendment and conversion, he was become mercifull vnto him, and well pleased. And at the castell of Sandwich, whereof Melnulle Glandeuill was then gouernor; who was a wise man, and alwaies most faithfull and true to the king, there was a generall peace proclaimed, and all England in rest and quietnesse.

In this warre the king had taken prisoners the king of Scots, the earles of Chester and of Leicester, besides so manie gentlemen and good seruants both English and French, that he had scarce anie prisons for so manie prisoners, nor so manie fetters for so manie captiues. But forsomuch as in baine doth a man triumph of the conquests vpon others, who cannot also triumph of the conquering of himselfe; and although the king had indured and abiden manie sorowes, great inquietnesse, and much trouble; and at length hauing overcome both them and his enemies, he might the sooner haue been weakened and auenged of them: yet setting apart those affections euen in the middle of his triumphs vpon others, he also triumphed ouer himselfe; vsing such kinds of courtesies & clemencies as before had not bene heard. For suppressing his malice and reuenging mind, he gaue honor to his aduersaries, & life to his enemies. And the warres thus after two yeares ended, and all the great sorowes overcome, he granted peace to all men, and forgane ech man his offense and trespass. And in the end also his sonnes repenting their follies, came and submitted themselves, with all humblenesse yelding themselves to his will and pleasure.

The description of king Henrie the second.

If were not now amisse, but verie requisite that we should (for a perpetuall remembrance of the king) describe and set forth as well the nature and conditions of his inward man as of his outward; that men which shall be desirous hereafter to learne and read his most noble acts in chivalrie, may also as it were before their eyes conceiue his vertue nature and liuelie portraiture: for he being so noble an ornament to this time and our history; we might not well, neither doth this history permit vs to omit and passe him ouer in silence. Wherein we are to craue pardon that we may plainelie declare and tell the truth: for in all histories the perfect and full truth is to be alwaies opened, and without it the same wanteth both authority and credit: for art must follow nature. And the painter therefore, whose profession and art is to make his portraiture as liuelie as may be, if he swarue from the same, then both he and his worke lacke and want their commendation. And albeit no man be borne without his fault, yet is he most to be borne withall who is least spotted: a him must we account and thinke to be wise, who knowledgeth the same: for wile, in all worldlie matters there is no certaintie; and vnder heauen is no perfect felicitie, but euill things are mixt with good things, and vices ioined with vertues. And therefore, as things spoken in commendation either of a mans good disposition, or of his worthie doings, do deliight and like well the hearer: euen so let him not be offended, if things not to be well liked be also recited and written. And yet the philosophers are of the opinion, that we ought to reuerence to the higher powers in all manner of offices and duties, as that we should not prouoke nor moue them with anie sharpe speeches or disordered languages. For (as Terence saith) faire words and soothing speeches breed friendship, but plaine telling of truth makes enemies. Wherefore it is a dangerous thing to speake euill against him, though the occasion be neuer so iust, as who can forthwith auenge the same. And it is a matter more dangerous, and he aduentureth himselfe verie far, which will contend in manie words against him, who in one or few words can breake the same. It were suerlie a verie happie thing, and that which I confesse passeth my reach, if a man intreating of princes causes might tell the truth in euerie thing, and yet not offend them in anie thing. But to the purpose.

Henrie the second, king of England, was of a verie good colour, but somewhat red: his head great and round, his eyes were fierie, red, and grim, and his face verie high coloured; his voice or speech was shaking, quivering, or trembling; his necke short, his breast broad and big, strong armed, his bodie was grosse, and his bellie somewhat big, which came vnto him rather by nature than by anie grosse feeding or surfeit. For his diet was very temperate, and to save the truth, thought to be more spare than comelie, or for the state of a prince: and yet to abate his grossenesse, and to remedie this fault of nature, he did as it were punish his bodie with continuall exercise, and did as it were keepe a continuall warre with himselfe. For in the times of his warres, which were for the most part continuall to him, he had little or no rest at all; and in time of peace he would not grant vnto himselfe anie peace at all, nor take anie rest: for then did he giue himselfe whole vnto hunting, and to follow the same he would verie erlie euerie morning be on horsebacke, and then into the woods, sometimes into the forrests, and sometimes into the hilles and fields, and so would he spend the whole daie vntill night. In the euening when he came home, he would neuer or verie seldome sit either before or after supper: for though he were neuer so wearie, yet still would he be walking and going. And forsomuch as it is verie profitable for euerie man in his life time, that he do not take too much of anie one thing; for the medicine it selfe which is appointed for a mans helpe & remedie, is not absolutelie perfect and good to be alwaies used: euen so it befell and happened to this prince; for partlie by his excessive trauels, and partlie by diuerse humors in his bodie, his legs and feet were swollen and sore. And though he had no disease at all, yet age it selfe was a breaking sufficient vnto him. He was of a reasonable stature, which happened to none of his sons; for his two eldest sons were somewhat higher, & his two younger sons were somewhat lower and lesse than was he. If he were in a good mood, and not angry, then would he be verie pleasant and eloquent: he was also (which was a thing verie rare in those daies) verie well learned: he was also verie affable, gentle, and courteous; and besides so pitifull, that when he had overcome his enemy, yet would he be overcome with pittie towards him.

In warres he was most valiant, and in peace he was as prouident and circumspect. And in the wars mistrusting and doubting of the end and euent thereof, he would (as Terence writeth) trie all the waies and meanes he could deuise rather than wage the battell. If he lost anie of his men in the fight, he would maruellously lament his death, and seeme to pitie him more being dead than he did regard or account of him being alieue, more bewailing the dead than fauoring the liuing. In times of distresse no man more courteous, and when all things were safe no man more hard or cruell. Against the stubborne & vnrulie no man more sharpe, nor yet to the humble no man more gentle; hard toward his owne men and household, but liberall to strangers, bountifull abroad, but sparing at home: whom he once hated, he would neuer or verie hardlie loue; and whom he once loued, he would not lightlie be out with him, or forsake him: he had great pleasure and delight in hauking and hunting. Would God he had bene as well bent and disposed vnto god deuotion!

It was said that after the displeasure growne betwene the king and his sonnes, by the meanes and thorough the intising of the queene their mother, he neuer accounted to keepe his word and promise, but without anie regard or care was a common breaker thereof. And true it is, that of a certeine naturall disposition he was light and inconstant of his word: and if the matter were brought to a narrow streit or pinch, he would not sticke rather to couer his word, than to denie his deed. And for this cause he in all his doings was verie prouident and circumspect, and a verie byright and a seuerer minister of iustice, although he did therein graue and make his friends to smart. His answers for the most part were peruerse and froward. Justice which is God himselfe is free and without rewards to be ministered. And albeit for profit and lucre all things are set to sale, and do bring great gaines as well to the clergie as to the laitie: yet they are no better to a mans heires or executors, than were the riches of (2) Gehazi the seruant to Elizeus, whose greedy takings turned himselfe to vtter ruine and destruction.

He was a great peacemaker, and a carefull keeper thereof himselfe: a liberall almes giuer, and a speciall benefactor to the holie land, he loued humilitie, abhorred pride, and much oppressed his nobilitie. The hungrie he refreshed, but the rich he regarded not. The humble he would exalt, but the mightie he disdaind. He vsurped much vpon the holie church, and of a certeine kind of zeale, but not according to knowledge; he did intermingle and confound the prophane with holie things; for why, he would be all in all himselfe. He was the child of the holie church, and by hit aduanced to the scepter of his kingdome, and yet he either dissembled or vtterlie forgot the same: for he was slacke alwaies in comming to the church vnto the diuine seruice, and at the time thereof he would be busied and occupied rather in counsels and in conference about the affaires of his commonwealth, than in deuotion and prayer. The liuelihoods belonging to anie spirituall promotion, he would in time of vacation confiscat to his owne treasure, and assume that to himselfe which was due vnto Christ. When anie new troubles or wars did grow or come vpon him, then would he lath & poure all that euer he had in store or treasure; and liberallie bestow that vpon a roister or a soldier, which ought to haue bene giuen vnto the priest. He had a verie prudent & forecasting wit, and thereby foreseeing what things might or were like to insue, he would accordingly order & dispose either for the performance, or for the preventing thereof: notwithstanding manie times the e-uent happened to the contrarie, and he disappointed of his expectation: and commonlie there happened no ill vnto him, but he would forgettell thereof to his friends and familiars.

He was a maruellous naturall father to his children, and loued them tenderlie in their childhood and yong yeares: but they being growne to some age and ripenesse, he was as a father in law, and could scarcelie bryoke anie of them. And notwithstanding they were verie handsome, comelie, and noble gentlemen: yet whether it were that he would not haue them prosper too fast, or whether they had enill deserued of him, he hated them; & it was full much against his will, that they should be his successors, or heires to anie part of his inheritance. And such is the prosperitie of man, that as it can not be perpetuall, no more can it be perfect and assured: for why, such was the secret malice of fortune against this king, that where he should haue receiued much comfort, there had he most sorrow: where quietnesse & safetie, there vniquietnesse and perill: where peace, there enmitie: where courtesie, there ingratitude: where rest, there trouble. And whether this happened by the meanes of the (3) marriages, or for the punishment of the fathers sinnes: certeine it is, there was no good agreement, neither betwene the father & the sonnes, nor yet among the sonnes themselves.

But at length, when all his enemies and the disturbers of the common peace were suppressed; and his brethren, his sonnes, and all others his aduersaries as well at home as abroad were reconciled: then all things happened and befell vnto him (though it were long first) after and according to his owne will and mind. And would to God he had likewise reconciled himselfe vnto God, and by amendement of his life had in the end also procured his fauour and mercie! Besides this, which I had almost forgotten, he was of such a (4) memoize, that if he had once seene and knowne a man, he would not forget him: neither yet what soeuer he had heard, would he be vnmindfull thereof. And hereof was it, that he had so readie a memoize of histories which he had read, as a knowledge and a maner of an experience in all things. To conclude, if he had bene chosen of God, and bene obsequious and carefull to liue in his feare and after his lawes, he had excelled all the princes of the world: for in the gifts of nature no one man was to be compared vnto him. Thus much brieflie, and yet not much besides the matter, I haue thought good to delineate, that hauing in few words made my entrie: whether writers maie haue the better occasion more at large to discourse and intreat of this so worthie an historie. And therefore leauing the same to others, let vs returne to our Ireland, from whence we digressed.

(1) The words are oculis glaucis: which some doe English to be greie eyes, like the colour of the skie, with specks in it: but some doe English it a bright red, as is the colour of a lions eye, which is commonlie a signe or an argument of a man which will be soone warmed & angrie: & so it is to be taken in this place: for the words, which follow, be: Ad iram torrens, which is to saie, grim looking eyes disposed to anger: which eyes were answerable to the complexion and disposition of this king.

wetous mind, and angrie that his master had refused such rich presents, secretly he ran after the Syriac; and overtaking him, did aske of him in his masters name a talent of siluer, & certeine garments: which he receiued doubled, and returned therewith. But he was no sooner come home, but that his countenell was rewarded, and he plagued with the leprosie of Naaman; which cleue vnto him as white as the snow.

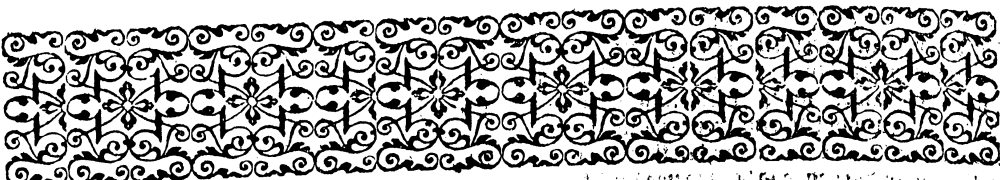

(3) The king married Cleonor the daughter and heire to the erle of Poitiers (who before was married to Helues the eight and king of France, but diuorced from him for barrenesse of blood) and after that he had continued with hir sundrie yeares, and receiued by hir six sonnes and three daughters, he fell in loue with a yong wench named Mosamund; and then waxed wearie of his wife. And she to be a wisehead, did not onelie in continuance of time find the means to find out this Mosamund, who was kept secret in a house builded like a labyrinth of purpose for hir safe keeping at Woodstocke, where when the queen had found hir, Mosamund liued not long after: but also for a further reuenge, she by means of hir sonnes who were noble & valiant gentlemen, caused warres to be stirred and raised against the king to his great vnquietnesse: and this is one of the marriages of which this autho: meaneth. The other was of his son named Hentie, whom he did not onelie make and crowne king in his life time, but also for a confirmation of a peace to be had betwene him and Helues the eight then French king, he married his said sonne to the ladie Margaret daughter to the said French king. By reason whereof his said sonne being once come to yeeres of age, and thinking it too long yet he could haue the sole gouernment, as also being by the queene his mother intised, and taking hir part, he fled to the French king his father in law; and by his aid, as also of sundrie other noble men both English and French, who ioined with him, made warres vpon his said father: which bred vnto him no little trouble and vnquietnesse.

(4) There is not a more commendable & more ne-

cessarie vertue in a king, than is the gift of a quick and good memorie: for by it knowledge doth increase and experience is perfected. And therefore saith Cicero, that memorie is the treasure of all good things, and most necessarie to the life of man: wherein the more the gouernor excelleth, the more prouident is his gouernment. For why, as Plutarch writeth, the remembrance of things past are speciall presidents and examples of things to come. Diuers and sundrie men haue bene famous, and much commended for their excellencie in this vertue. Pythidates king of Pontus in Asia had vnder his dominion two and twentie nations, and he was of such singular memorie, that he did not onelie vnderstand their seuerall languages, but also spake them perfectlie; and in iudgements would heare each man to speake in his owne language, and answer them in the same. Cyrus king of Persia, the sonne of Cambises, so excelled in memorie, that hauing an exceeding great multitude of men in his host, he would call euerie man by his proper name and surname. Cineas an ambassador from king Pyrrhus to the Romanes, was not in Rome aboue one whole daie, before he could salute euerie of the senators, and euerie noble man of Rome by his particular name. Likewise Julius Cesar and Adrianus the emperors of Rome were of such excellent memories, that euerie of them at one instant could both read and write, as also speake and heare. The like also is said of the famous and most excellentlie learned man Erasmus Roterodamus, who hauing alwaies for the most part sundrie and diuers clearks writing at one time and instant, of sundrie matters, would walke vp and downe among them, and indite to euerie one what he should write. And this thing is so necessarie in all princes, that in the old ages they were euer wont to haue about them such men as were of a speciall memorie; to put them in mind of all such things as to them should be meet and requisite, and these were called Nomenclatores. Whether this king had any such attending vpon him or not, it is certeine that he himselfe was of an excellent good memorie.

Thus far the first booke of the Conquest of Ireland.

SYLVESTER GIRALdus Cambrensis, his second booke of the vaticinall historie of the Conquest of Ireland.

The Proheme of the author.

*W*E haue thus farre continued our historie, in as perfect and full order as we could, hauing omitted nothing worthie the memorie, as farre as the matter seemed to require: but being occupied and busied with the generall and necessarie causes in religion, although we had not sufficient leasure and time to follow and prosecute this our enterprise and matter begun, yet did not we thinke it meet to giue the same ouer, and to leaue it halfe vndoone. We haue therefore, and yet doo continue the historie but breesfelie, not in anie high or eloquent stile; but in a common phrase and plaine speeches, giuing rather thereby an occasion to our posteritie for them to set foorth this historie, than to doo it our selues. For indeed our leasure is verie small, and such as it is, it is turned to troubles and vnquietnesse, our loue and zeale into hatred, our ioy into sorrow, and our rest to molestations.

For now flourish not the honest exercises of studies, but the busie policies of warres: now the good studies of the mind are contemned, and the lusts of the bodie imbraced: now we haue no leasure to serue the Muses, but to be hammering with weapons: quiet minds are not now at leasure, but glistering weapons and armors are in euerie mans hands. Wherefore let not the reader looke now at our hands for anie good order, eloquence, or pleasantnesse in this our writing: for place must be giuen of necessitie vnto time. And as the same is now verie troublesome, so can the same bring foorth but troublesome matters. In these troubled times, and wanting conuenient leasure and quietnesse, I haue trauelled with the more paines to absolue and end this my worke: not after the maner of a student, but as a traeller; whose nature and condition is, that when he dooth set foorth on his iournie verie slacklie and slowlie, then dooth he make the more hast, and trauell the more speedilie. How soeuer it shall please God to deale with vs in the seruices now in hand, I haue as diligentlie as I can compiled this my historie as also my topographie, leauing the same as a monument of our will, to remaine to our countrie and posteritie for euer.

THE SECOND BOOKE

of the Conquest of Ireland.

The earle is sent backe againe into Ireland, and is made generall of the land, and Reimond is ioined in commission with him.

Chap. 1.

Richard, being now returned into Ireland, the people there being aduertised of the great troubles which were beyond the seas, they being a people constant on-lie in inconstancie, firme in wavering and faithfull in vn-truths; these I say

and all the princes of that land, the earle at his com-ming found to be revolted and to become rebels.
For the recouerie and suppressing of whom, the earle then wholie bestirred himselfe; and at length hauing spent and consumed all his treasure, which he had brought ouer with him, his soldiors who were under the guiding of Herneie being then constable, lacked their wages and were vnpaid: and by reason of the emulation betwene Herneie and Reimond, the seruice and exploits to be don against the Irishie was verie slacke and slender; and by that meanes they wanted such prizes and spoiles of neat and cattell as they were wont to haue for their vittels. The soldiors in this distresse, wanting both monie for their wages and vittels for their food, assembled themselues and went vnto the earle, vnto whom with one voice they exclaimed and said; that vnlesse he would make and appoint Reimond to be their capitaine againe, they would without all doubt for-saake him, and would either returne home againe, or (that which is worse) would go and serue vnder the enimies.

In this distresse was Reimond appointed the captaine, & forthwith hauing mustered his souldiers, he made a rode or iourneie into Dhalia vpon the rebels there, where he tooke great prizes, and were well recovered as well in horse as in armor. From thence they marched to Lismore, where when they had spoiled both the towne and countrie, they returned with great booties, taking the waie vnto Waterford by the sea side: and being come to the sea shores, where they found thirtene botes latelie come from Waterford, as also others of other places; all these they laded with their prizes, minding to haue passed by water vnto Waterford. But tarieng there for a wind, the men of Corke, who had heard of their doings, and being but fiftene miles from them, do prepare two and thirtie barks of theire owne towne, and do well man and furnish them, being wholie determined to set vpon Reimond, and if they can to giue him the ouerthrow; which they did: betwene whom was a cruell fight, the one part giuing a fierce onfet with stones and spaths, & the other defending themselues with botwes and weapons. In the end the men of Corke were ouercome, and their capteine named Gilbert Mac Turger was there slaine by a lustie young gentleman named Philip Welch. And then Adam Herford, who was the generall or admerall of that nauie, being well increased and laden with great prizes, sailed with great triumph to the citie of Waterford.

But Reimond himselfe was not present at this fight vpon the water, and yet hearing thereof, he came in all hast and marched towards them, taking his waie by the sea side, hauing in his companie twentie gentlemen, and thre score horsemen. And by the waie in his iourneie he met with Dermond Mac Artie prince of Desmond, who was comming with a great band of men to helpe and rescue the men of Corke where they fought togither: but in the end Mac Artie had the worse side, and was ouer-throwne; and then Reimond hauing preyed and taken about foure thousand head of neat, he marched and came to Waterford. About this time also as they marched homewards, certeine Irishmen in those parties lieng skulking & lurking in the woods, when the prizes and cattell passed by, they issued out, tooke and carried a waie certeine of the cattell into the woods, where vpon the crie was vp, and came as farre as Waterford. Wherevpon the souldiers and most part of the garison issued out, among whom Speilerius was the best and most forward. For he being come to the woods, and hauing in his compa-nie then onelie one souldier, put spur to the horse, and aduentured in the woods, following the Irishmen (by the abetting of the souldier who was with him) euen to the furthest & thickest part of the woods: where he was so farre entered, that he was in danger of the enimie: and the souldier being not able to retire was there taken, killed and hewed in peeces.
Speilerius then seeing himselfe to be incircled round about with the enimies, and he in the like perrill as the other was, bicause he alone against a thousand was neither able to rescue his man, nor helpe himselfe, but in danger to be taken as was the other, like a valiant gentleman draweth his sword, and with a lustie courage, euen in despite of their teeth maketh waie through them. And such as set vp on him he spared not, but cut off an arme of this man, a hand of that man, a head of one, and a shoulder of another, & he escaped throughout them without any harme or hurt to his owne bodie, sauing that he brought two darts in his shield, and thre in his horse.

The overthrow giuen by the Irishmen against the souldiers which came from Dublin; and what the Ostomen were, of whom mention is made here and elsewhere.

Chap. 2.

When these things werethus done, & the souldiers well refreshed by the booties and preies taken vpon the water and the land, Reimond being aduertised that his father William Fitzgerald was dead, he toke shipping and passed ouer into Wales, there to take seison, and to enter into the land descended vnto him. And in his absence Heruie was againe made lieutenant of the armie: who in the absence of Reimond, thinking to do some seruice and notable exploit, bringeth the earle vnto Cashill; and for their better strength and further helpe, sent his commandement vnto Dublin, that the souldiers there should come and meet them: who according came forth; and in the iourneie they passed thorough Droie, where on a certeine night they lodged themselves. Donald then prince of Limerike, a man verie wise in his nation, hauing vnderstanding by his priuie espials of their coming, suddenlie and vnwares berie earle in the morning with a great force and companie stale vpon them, and slue of them foure gentlemen which were captains, and foure hundred (1) Ostomen in this soe discomfiture.

The earle as soone as he heard hereof, with great fearow & heauinesse returned vnto Waterford. By means of this mishap, the Irishmen in euerie place toke such a heart and comfort, that the whole nation with one consent and agreement rose by against the Englishmen, and the earle as it were a man besieged, kept himselfe within the wals and citie of Waterford, and from whence he moued not. But Rothorike Deconoz prince of Connagh, comming and passing ouer the riuer of Shenin, thinking now to recouer all Aeth, inuadeth the same with sword and fire, and spoileth, burneth, and destroueth the same, & all the whole countrie euen to the hard walles of Dublin, leauing no castell standing or vnderstroied.

(1) These Ostomen were not Irishmen, but yet of long continuance in Ireland. Some saie they came first out of Norwaye, and were called Ostomen, that is to saie Easterlings, or Easterne men, because that countrie lieth East in respect of England and Ireland. Some thinke they were Saxons and Normans; but whatsoeuer they were, they were merchants and vsed the trade of merchandize, and in peaceable maner they came into Ireland; and there being landed, they found such fauour with the Irishrie, that they licenced them to build haven towne wherein they might dwell & vse their traffike. These men builded the ancientest and most part of the cities and towne vpon or nere the sea side within that land; as namelie Dublin, Waterford, Cork, Limerrike, and others. And albeit they in proceesse of time grew to be mightie and strong, and for their safetie did build towne and castels: yet they durst not to dwell among the Irish people, but still continued and kept themselves within their owne towne and forts, and thereof they are and were called since townesmen. And of them there were these, being the inhabitants of Dublin, which came to meet the earle, and were thus slaine.

The returning of Reimond into Ireland, and how he married Basilia the sister vnto the earle.

Chap. 3.

The earle then seeing himselfe to be now in great distresse, and in a narrow streit, taketv aduise with his friends and counsellors what were best to be done. At length, as vnto his last refuge, he sendeth his letters to Rei-mond being yet in Wales, to this effect. As soone as you haue read these our letters, make all the hast you can to come awaie, and bring with you all the helpe and force that you can make: and then according to your owne will and desire, you shall assuredlie and immediatlie vpon your comming haue and marrie my sister Basilia. Reimond, as soone as he had read these letters, he was forthwith in hast to be gone, and thought it long yer he could be gone; not onlie in respect of the faire ladie, whom he had long wooed, loued, and desired; but also that he might helpe and succour his lord and master in this distresse and necessitie. Wherefore he maketh preparation accordingly, and by means of friendship and otherwise, he had gotten thirtie lustie young gentlemen of his owne cousins and kindred, and one hundred horsemen; as also thre hundred footmen and bowmen of the best and chosen men in all Wales: all which were in a readinesse to go with him. And as soone as the shipping for the m was readie, and the wind seruing, he and his cousin Speilertus, with all the said companie toke the seas, and shortly after arriued in twentie barks vnto (1) Waterford.

At the verie same time the townesmen of Waterford, being in a verie great rage and furie against the Englishmen there, were fullie minded and determined to haue killed them all wheresoeuer they could find them. But when they saw these barks comming in with their flags, hanging to their top masts, which to them were vnknewe, they were assonied at their sudden comming, and their deuises were dashed.
Reimond forthwith entered the towne with all his companie; and when all things were quieted and appeased, he & the earle went from thence vnto Waterford, with all their force and strength, leauing behind one (2) Decell or Durcell his lieutenant at Waterford. But he verie shortly minding to follow after the earle, toke a boat, and as he passed ouer the riuer of the Surre, the maister of the boat and his companie which were townesmen of Waterford, slue this Durcell, and those few whom he had then attending vpon him. Which murder when they had thus done, they returned to the citie, and there without all pittie or mercie, spared neither man, nor woman, nor child; but slue as manie as they could find in the streets, houses, or anie other places. Howbeit the citie it selfe was safelie kept by such as were then in Reimonds tower, who droue the traitors out of the citie, as also in the end compelled them to yeld and submit themselues, and to intreat for peace, which they hardlie ob-teined, both with an euill credit and harder conditions.

But Reimond still mindfull of the promise made vnto him, and he languishing untill the same were performed, would not depart from out of Waterford, untill messengers were sent to (3) Dublin to fetch and bring his louer Basilia to (4) Waterford to be maried vnto him. Which being done, and he married, they spent all that daie and night in feastings & passimes.
And as they were in their most solitie, newes was brought vnto them, how that Rothorike prince of Connagh had destroued, wasted, & spoiled all Aeth, and was entred into the borders of Dublin. Whereupon Keimond on the next morrow, setting apart and giuing ouer all wedding pastimes, mustreth all his souldiours, and without anie delaings marcheth towards the enimies. But Rothorike who had before tried his valiantnesse, and experimented his force, hearing of his comming, and not minding to trie or abide the same, retireth backe, and getteth him to his owne home and countrie. Then Keimond recouereth againe all those countreies, and forthwith causeth all the forts and castels then before pulled downe and defaced, to be now reedified and repaired, as also the castels of Trim, and of Dunlences in Meth, of which Hugh Trell was before the constable, and for want of rescue and helpe compelled to leaue and forsake them. And thus by the means of Keimond, all things being recovered and restored to their former and pristine estate, the whole land for feare of him continued a good time in peace and rest.

(1) There is great varietie in such booke and examples as I haue, and which I do follow in this point: some writing that Keimond did not land at Waterford, but at Wexford; and the tumult there being appeased, he went from thence vnto Waterford, and brought the earle vnto Wexford. Some write againe (as is aforesaid) that he landed at Waterford, and not at Wexford: but hauing saluted the earle, appeased the tumult, and set all things in order, he conducted the earle and the whole armie ouer land vnto Wexford. Although there be some variance in the exemplars, yet concerning the substance of the historie it is not materiall.

(2) There is also a varietie in the exemplars of this name; some write Fricellus, and some write Pricellus, and some Pricellus, or Purcell; it is like to be Purcell, for they of that name were seruitors in this conquest, and for their god seruice they were rewarded with lands and territories, and who are yet remaining about or nere the citie, and in the countie of Waterford.

(3) It is certeine that this Basilia abode at Dublin, but whether she were there married or at Wexford it is doubted. Some hold opinion, that Keimond after that he had met and also saluted the earle, they forthwith hearing the countreies in Leinster, and especially about Dublin to be in an vppore, marched thither straitwaie without anie traie. And there Keimond as a lustie soldior in his armoz married the ladie Basilia, and they issued with aduantage vpon the enimie. But the writer of best credit saith that the marriage was at Wexford.

The secret practise of Herueie against Reimond.

Chap. 4.

Wat Herueie seeing the honoz and credit of Keimond daily to increase more & more, and he much græued therewith, deuileth all the means he can how to stop and hinder the same: and forsomuch as he could not compasse the same by anie open attempt, he practiseth it secretly, and by secret deuises. Wherefore he is now a suter to marrie the ladie Nesta, daughter to Maurice Fitzgerald, and consine germane to Keimond; that vnder the colour of this new affinitie, aliance, and vnbained friendship he might take Keimond in a trip. Well, his secret deuises being to himselfe, and no such thing suspected nor mistrusted as he meant; he by his earnest sute obtaineth this gentlewoman, and marrieth hir. And Keimond also to make friendship on all sides to be the more firme, procured that Aline the earls daughter was married to William eldest son of William Fitzgerald. And to Maurice Fitzgerald himselfe, who was lastie come out of Wales, there was giuen the halfe cantred of Mphelan, which he had before of the kings gift, as also the castell of Guindoloke: and Peilerius because he was the better marcher had the other halfe cantred. But the cantred of land which was next towards Dublin, and which the king had once giuen vnto Fitzstephans, was now bestowed vpon the two Herfordes.

The obtaining of the priuilege at Rome.

Chap. 5.

In this meane time the king, though he were in great troubles, & much vniquieted with the wars, yet was he not vnmindfull of his realme of Ireland, as also of the orders made and deuised at the councill of Cashill, for the redresse and reformation of the filthie and lose life of the Irishie. And thereupon sent his ambassadores vnto Rome to pope Alexander the third, of and from whom he obtained certeine priuileges, and vnder his authoritie; namelie, that he should be lord ouer all the realme of Ireland; and by his power and authoritie they to be reduced and brought to the christian faith, after the maner and order of the church of England. This priuilege the king sent ouer into Ireland by one Nicholas Wallingford then prior, but afterwards abbat of Malmeburie, and William Fitzaldelm. And then being at Waterford, they caused an assemblee and a synod to be had of all the bishops and clergie within that land; and then in the open audience of them, the said grant and priuilege was openlie read and published: as also one other priuilege before giuen and granted by pope Adrian an Englishman borne, at the sute of one John of Salisburie, who was made bishop of Barnocens at Rome. And by this man also he sent vnto the king for a token, and in signe of a possession thereof, one gold ring, which together with the priuilege was laid vp in the kings treasure at Winchester. The tenure of both which priuileges it shall not be amisse here to insert. And concerning the first, these are the wordes thereof.

Adrian the bishop, the seruant of the seruants of God, to his most deere sonne in Christ the noble king of England sendeth greeting, and the apostolike benediction. Your excellencie hath bene verie carefull and studious how you might enlarge the church of God here in earth, and increase the number of his saints and cleas in heauen: in that as a god catholike king, you haue and do by all meanes laboz and trauell to enlarge and increase Gods church, by teaching the ignorant people the true and christian religion, and in abolishing and rooting by the wordes of sin and wickednesse: and wherein you haue and do craue for your better aid and furtherance the helpe of the apostolike see, wherein the more speedlie and discretlie you do proceed, the better successe we hope God will send. For all they which of a feruent zeale, and loue in religion, do begin and enterprisse anie such thing, shall no doubt in the end haue a good and prosperous successe. And as for Ireland and all other lands where Christ is knowen, and the christian religion receiued, it is out of all doubt, and your excellencie well knoweth, they do all aperseine and belong to the right of saint Peter, and of the church of Rome. And we are so much the more redie, desirous, & willing to sow the acceptable seed of Gods word, because we know the same in the latter daie will be most feuerelie required at our hands. You haue (our welbeloued in Christ) aduertised and signified unto vs, that you will enter into the land and realme of Ireland, to the end to bring them obedient unto law, and vnder your subiection, and to root out from among them their foule sins and wickednesse, as also to yeld and paie pærelie out of euerie house a pearelie pension of one penie vnto saint Peter: and besides also will defend & haue the rites of those churches whole and inuolate. We therefore well allowing and fauouring this your godlie disposition & commendable affection, do accept, ratifie, and assent vnto this your petition: and do grant that you for the dilating of Gods church, the punishment of sin, the reforming of maners, planting of vertue, and the increasing of christian religion, you do enter to possesse that land, and there to execute according to your wisdom whatsoeuer shall be for the honoz of God, and the safetie of the realme. And further also we do stricte charge and require that all the people of that land do with all humblenesse, dutifulnesse, and honoz receiue and accept you as their liege lord and soueraigne, reseruing and excepting the right of the holie church, which we will be inuolably pæserued; as also the pærelie pension of the Peter pence out of euerie house, which we require to be trulie answered to saint Peter, and to the church of Rome. If therefore you do mind to bring your godlie purpose to effect, intend to trauell to reforme the people to some better order and trade of life: and that also by your selfe, and by such others as you shall thinke meet, true, and honest, in their life, maners and conuersation, the church of God may be beautified, the true christian religion sowed and planted, and all other things to be done, that by anie meanes shall or may be to Gods honoz, and the saluation of mens soules: whereby you may in the end receiue at Gods hands the reward of an euermore life, as also in the meane time, and in this life carrie a glorious fame, and an honorable report among all nations. The tenure and effect of the second priuilege is thus.

Peter pence.

The second priuilege.

Alexander the bishop, the seruant of the seruants of God, to his dærelie beloued son the noble king of England sendeth græting, grace, and the apostolike benediction. Forso much as things giuen and granted vpon good reasons by our predecessors, are to be well allowed of, ratified, and confirmed; we well considering and pondering the grant and priuilege, for and concerning the dominion of the land of Ireland to vs appertaining, and latelie giuen by Adrian our predecessoz; we following his steps do in like maner confirme, ratifie, and allow the same: reseruing and sauing to saint Peter and to the church of Rome the pærelie pension of one penie out of euerie house as well in England as in Ireland. Provided also, that the barbarous people of Ireland by your meanes be reformed and recovered from their filthy life and abominable conuersation; that as in manie so in maners and conuersation they may be christians: that as that rude and disordered church by you being reformed, the whole nation also may with the profession of the name be in acts and life followers of the same.

The titles of the kings of England vnto Ireland.

Chap. 6.

Let then the enuious & ignorant cease and giue ouer to quarrell, and anouch that the kings of England haue no right nor title to the realme of Ireland. But let them well vnderstand that by fine maner of waies, that is to saie, by two ancient titles, and three latter they haue to anouch and defend the same, as in our to pographie is declared. First it is eident and agreed by the histories of England, that Gurguntius the sonne of Belin king of Britaine, as he returned with great triumph from out of Denmarke, he met at the Isles of the Orkades a nauie (1) of a certeine nation of people, named Baldenses, now Balions, and those he sent into Ireland, appointing vnto them certeine guides and leaders to conduct & direct them thither.

Likevise the same histories do plainlie witnesse, that king Arthur, the famous king of Britaine, had manie of the Irish kings tributarie to him: & he on a time holding & keeping his court at Westchester, Gellomarus king of monarch of Ireland, with other the princes thereof, came & presented themselves before him. Also the Irishmen came out of (2) Balon, the chiefe citie in Wiscate. And forsomuch as men, be they neuer so free, yet they maie renounce their right and libertie, and bring themselves into subiection: so it is apparet that the princes of Ireland did frelie, and of their owne accord, submit & yeld themselves to king Henry of England, & swore vnto him faith and loialtie. And albeit such men of a kind of a natural lightnesse and inconstancie, be not ashamed nor afrated to denie and renounce their faith: yet that can not so release and discharge them. Euerie man is at his owne chosse and libertie how to contract and bargaine with anie one, but the same once made he can not det nor swarue from it. And finally the holie pope, in whom is the effect of perfection, and who by a certeine prerogative and title requireth & claimeth all Islands, because by him and by him and by his meanes they were first reduced and recovered to the christian faith; he I saie hath ratified and confirmed this title.

(1) The historie is this, that Gurguntius the son of king Belin made a viage into Denmarke, there to appease the people, who were then in rebellion against him: and hauing preailed and ouercommed them, he in his returning homewards by the Isles of the Orkades, there met him a fleet of a nauie of thirtie or (as some saie) thre score sailles of men and women latelie come and exiled from out of that part of Spaine, called then Baldensis, whereof Balon was the chiefe citie, but now it is a part of the countrie of Gascoigne, whose capteine named (as some write) Bartholomew, did present himselfe before Gurguntius, and discoursing vnto him the cause of their trauels, besought him to consider of their distresse, and to grant vnto them some dwelling place, and they would become his subiects. Which their request the king granted, and taking their oth of allegiance sent and caused them to be conducted into Ireland, where as his subiects they remained and continued.

(2) These people were named Iberi, & before that they came to seeke vnto Gurguntius for a land to dwell in, they dwelled in that part of Spaine, whereof Balon is the metropole, which is now part of Wiscate, and this countrie before and long after the time of Gurguntius, was still subiect to the kings of Britaine, now called England.

The rebellion of Donald prince of Limerike, and of the taking of the citie of Limerike.

Chap. 7.

In the meane while, Donald O Byin prince of Limerike waied verie insolent, and nothing regarding his former promise and oth made to the king, began & did with draw his fealtie and seruice. Whereupon Keimond mustered his armie, gathered and picked out the best and lustiest men which he had. And hauing twentie and six gentlemen, three hundred horsemen, and three hundred bowmen and footmen in readinesse and well appointed, about the kalends of October marched towards Limerike to assaile the same. When they came thither, the riuer of the Shenin, which runneth round about the citie, they found the same to be so deepe and stikie, that they could not passe ouer the same. But the lustie yong gentlemen who were greedie to haue the pzeie, but more desirous to haue the honoz, were in a great agonie and grieue, that they were thus abarred from approaching to assaile the citie. Wherevpon one (1) Dauid Welsh so named of his familie and kindred, although otherwise a Camber or a Welshman bozne, and nephue unto Reimond, who was a lustie and vallant yong soldior, and a verie tall man aboue all the rest, was verie hot and impatient, that they so long lingered the time about nothing. Wherevpon hauing a greater regard to win fame and honoz, than fearing of anye perill or death, taking his horse and putting his spurres to his sides aduentureth the water, which being verie stikie and full of stonies and rocks was the more dangerous: but yet he so wiselie marked the course of the streame, and so aduised and guided his horse, that he passed the riuer, and safelie recovered the further side: and then he cried out aloud to his companie, that he had found a forde: but for all that there was neuer a one that would follow, saving one Giffrete.

But they both returning backe againe to conduct ouer the whole companie, the said Giffrete, his horse being carried awaie with the violence of the streame, they were both drowned. Which when Appelerins (who was also come thither) did see, he began to fret with himselfe, partly for that his consine & kinsman of so noble an enterpryse had so bad a successe: partly also disdainning that anye should attempt to honoz but himselfe. Wherevpon being mounted vpon a lustie strong horse, setteth spurres to his side, and being neither dismayed with the stiklenesse and danger of the water, nor afrated with the mishap fallen to the gentleman, who was then drowned, more rashlie than wiselie aduentureth the riuer & recouereth the further side & bankes. The citizens some of them watching and meeting him at the waters side, and some standing vpon the towne wals fast by the riuer side, minding and meaning to haue driuen him backe againe, or to haue killed him in the place, hurled stonies a good pace vnto him. But this noble and lustie gentleman, being thus sharpelie and hardlie beset in the middle of perils and dangers, his enemies on the one side hardlie assailing, and the riuer on the other side stopping and closing him vp from all rescue, standeth to his tackle, and as well as he could couering his head with his shield, defendeth and saueth himselfe from his enemies. Whilost they were thus bickering there was great shovoting and noise on both sides of the water. But Reimond being then the generall of the field, and in the reuerward, knowing nothing hereof, as sone as he heard of it, came in all hast through the campe vnto the waters side. Where when he saw his nephue on the other side, to be in the middle of his enemies, and like to be vtterlie cast awaie and destroyed unless he had some speedie helpe and succour, was in a marvellous grieue & agonie, & verie sharpelie crieth and calleth out to his men, as followeth.

(1) This Welsh was so called, the same being the name of his familie and kindred, and not of the countrie of Wales, wherein he was bozne. He was a worshipie gentleman, and of his race there are yet remaining manie good and worshipie gentlemen, who are chieftie abiding in the prouince and citie of Waterford: for there were they first planted.

The oration and speech of Reimond vnto his companie, and of the recouerie of the citie of Limerike.

Chap. 8.

Ye worshipie men, of nature vallant, and whose prowesse we haue well tried, come ye awaie. The waie heretofore not knowne, and the riuer hitherto though not passable, by our aduentures a forde is now found therein: let vs therefore follow him that is gone before, and helpe him being now in distresse. Let vs not suffer, nor see so worshipie a gentleman, thus for our common cause and honoz oppressed, to perish and be cast awaie before our eyes and in our sights for want of our helpe, and by meanes of our sluggishnesse. It is no time now to vse manie words, nor let sure serueth to make manie speeches. The shortnesse of the time, the present necessitie of this noble gentleman, & the state of our owne honozs together expedition, & requirith hast. And euen with these words he put spurres to the horse, and aduentureth the riuer: after whome followed the whole companie, euerie one striving who might be foremost. And as God would they passed all safe ouer, saving two soldiors and one gentleman named Gubbo, who were drowned. They were no soneer come to land, but that their enemies all fled and ran awaie, whome they pursued, and in the chase slue a number of them, as also entered and toke the towne. And hauing thus gotten both the citie and the victorie, they recouered their small losse with great spoiles & riches, as also reaped great honoz and fame.

Now reader, which of these three thinkest thou best vallant, and best worshipie of honoz? Him who first aduentured the riuer, and taught the way? Or him who seeing the losse of his companion, the perill of the riuer, and the multitude of the enemies, did yet (not fearing death nor perill) aduenture himselfe in the middle of his enemies? Or him who hastilie setting all feare apart, did hazard himselfe and all his hoast to saue the friend, and to aduenture vpon the enemy? And this one thing by the waie is to be noted, that on a tuesday Limerike was first conquered, on a tuesday it was againe recouered, on a tuesday Waterford was taken, on a tuesday Waterford was gotten, and on a tuesday Dublin was wonne. And these things came not thus to passe, as it were by a set match, but euen of a common course of fortune, or by Gods so appointment. And it is not altogether against reason, that martiall affaires should haue good successe vpon Mars his daie.

A note concerning tuesday or the daie of Mars.

The description of Reimond.

Chap. 9.

Reimond was big bodied and brode set, of stature somewhat more than meane, his haire yellow and curled, his eyes big, greie, and round; his nose somewhat high, his countenance well coloured, pleasant, and merie. And although he were somewhat grosse bellied, yet by reason of a certeine liuelinesse which was in him, he couered that fault: and so that which seemed to be a blemish in his bodie, he couered with the vertue of his mind. He had such a speciall care of his men and soldiors, that he would be a spie ouer his watchmen, and in his trauell that waie he watched manie whole nights, ranging and walking abroad in the campe. And in this he was verie happie & fortunate, that he would would neuer or verie seldome late violent hands vpon anie, of whom he had charge or were vnder his gouernement, although he had rather or vnadvisedlie ouerthrowne himselfe, & straited out of the waie.

He was verie wise, modest, and warie, being nothing delicate in his fare, nor curious of his apparell.
He could awake with all weathers, both hot and cold; and indure anie paines: he was also verie patient, & could verie well rule his affections. He was more desirous to be good to such as he gouerned, than to be glorious of his gouernement: for he would shew himselfe more like to be a seruant than a master. Fi-nallye and to conclude, he was a verie liberrall, wise, gentle, and a circumspect man. And albeit he were a verie valiant capteine, and a noble soldior: yet in all martiall affaires, he passed and excelled in wis-dome & prouidence. A man doubtles in both respects much to be praised and commended: hauing in him that soeuer appertained to a valiant soldior, but excelling in all things belonging to a good capteine.

The description of Meilerius.

Chap. 10.

Meilerius was a man of a browne henn and complexion, his eyes blacke, his loke grim, and his countenance solwe & sharpe, and of a meane stature; his bodie for the bignesse verie strong, broad breasted, & he was small bellied. His armes and other lims more sinewous than fleshie, a stout and a valiant gentleman he was and emulous. He neuer refused anie aduenture or enterpryse which were either to be done by one alone, or by mo; he would be the first that would enter the field, and the last that would depart from the same.
In all seruices he would either haue the garland or die in the place, and so vnpatient he was in all exploits, that he would either haue his purpose, or lie in the dust: and so ambitious and desirous he was to haue honoz, that to attaine therevnto, there was no means nor mild thing but that he would suerlie haue the same either in death or in life: for if he could not haue it and liue, he would suerlie haue it by dieng.
And verelie both he and Keimond haue been woorthie of too much praise and commendation, if they had bene lesse ambitious of worldlie honozs, and more carefull of Christes church, and deuout in christian religion, whereby the ancient rights thereof might haue bene preserved and kept safe and sound: and also in consideration of their so manie conquests and blondie victories, and of the spilling of so much innocent blood, and murdering of so manie christian people, they had bene thankfull to God, and liberal-lie contributed some good portion for the furtherance of his church and religion. But what shall I saie? It is not so strange but much moze to be lamented, that this vnthankfulness euen from our first comming into this land, vntill these presents, this hath bene the generall and common fault of all our men.

The commendation and praise of Robert Fitzstephans, and of his consins.

Chap. 11.

What shall we speake or saie, how well Robert Fitzstephans and his sonnes haue deserued? What of Maurice Fitzgerald?
What shall I saie of Robert of Barrie, a man verie honest and valiant, whose woorthie commendations by the premisses are to be knowne?
What shall be said of Miles of Cogan, the nephew vnto Fitzstephans and Maurice, who as he came ouer with the first, so in commendation and for his seruice deserueth to be the chiefe and first: What shall we saie of Robert Fitzhenrie, & the brother vnto Pellerius, who if he had not so sone bene dead and cut, he would doubtlesse haue bene nothing behind his brother: What shall we speake of Keimond of Bantune & of Robert Barrie the yonger, they both were verie woorthie, tall, handsome, and woorthie men: What also shall be said of Keimond Fitzhugh, who although he were but of a little stature, yet for his honestie & proudence not to be forgotten: These three lastlie spoken of for their valiantnesse and prouesse done in the parties of Desmond, deserue great honoz and commendation, and great is the pittie that through too much hardnesse their daies were so shortened, and their time so cut off: What did also a number of our gentlemen of the same their kindred & countenage deserue, whose noble acts were such, and deserued such a perpetuall fame and memorie, that if I had a hundred tongues, a hundred mouthes, and so manie voces of yron; yet could I not vtter and at full declare their woorthinesse and deserts. A kindred, & nation, which in double respects art noble! for of the Troians by a naturall disposition thou art valiant, of the french nation thou art most expert and skilfull of armes and chualrie. A woorthie nation and kindred! which of thy selfe art sufficient and able to haue conquered anie nation, if enuie and malice had not maligned at thy woorthinesse. Well then Kei-mond had taken order for the keeping of the citie, and had well vittelled the same, he left therein a garison of his owne men, fiftie gentlemen, two hundred horsmen, and two hundred bowmen; ouer whome he appointed Miles of S. Davids his cosine to be lieutenant: and so as a noble conqueror he safelie returned into the borders of Leinster. But for the nature of enuie, who neuer ceaseth to persecute vertue. For Heruie of Mount Maurice, notwithstanding by meanes of the late affinitie he were thought to be a good frend, yet could he not forget his old malicious mind and wicked deuises: for still he secretlie from time to time sent his messengers and letters to the king of England, and full vntillie did aduertise the state, euent, and successe of all things, affirming that Keimond contrarie to the kings honoz and his owne allegiance, had determined to haue assumed and chalenged vnto himselfe not onelie the citie of Limerike, but also the whole land of Ireland. And to make this the more probable, and himselfe of more credit, he aduertiseth that Keimond had placed and appointed garrisons for the purpose; and had swozne the whole armie to obserue certeine articles by him prescribed, to the great pre-iudice of the king. Which his aduertisement being interlined with manie good words, the king so credited the same, that he belaued it to be most true: for as it is well sene, a little suspicion of an iniurie done or offered to be done vnto a prince, doth moze sticke in his mind, than manie benefits and good seruices before done. The king therefore after the winter following, sent ouer foure of his seruants in message to Ireland; namelie Robert Dobyne, Robert of Herloter or Herford, William Wendeger, and Adam of Gernemie: of which, two of them to come alwaie and to bring Keimond with them, and the other to carrie and remaine behind with the earle.

so ney at low, his armes and hands somthing long, he was broad breasted, but small in waste, though the same being big in others is thought to be commendable, his bellie was somewhat big and round, his thighes, legs, and feet being well proportionated and answerable to his bodie; of stature he was indifferant. But as in bodie he was well beset & compact, so on the contrarie, his mind, life, and conuersation were corrupt & disordered. For euen from his childhood he was giuen to lecherie, being readie and forward to performe in wanton & filthie actions, whatsoeuer liked him or anie others, who were of the like disposition: and therefore he forbore neither incest nor adulteries, nor anie other such like filthinesse. Besides, he was a pinte and an enuious accuser, and a double man, vncertaine, vaine, and altogether vnconstant, fauouring in inconstancie; a verie subtil man and a deceitfull: vnder his tong he had both milke and honie, but both of them were mixed with poison. He was sometimes in great prosperitie, and all things fell out according to his owne desire; and suddenly fortune turning his wheele, he had such a fall, that he did neuer recover the same againe. He was sometimes a verie good soldior, and had good experience in the feats of wars, after the maner vsed in France; but he was so suddenly altered & changed, that he became more skilfull in malice than valiant in prowesse, more full of deceit than renowned in honor, more puffed vp in pride than endowed with worship, more hastie than happie, and more full of words than abounding in truth.

The succouring of the garrison at Limerike.

Chap. 13.

Reimond hauing receiued the kings determination by the foresaid foure messengers, prepared all things in a readinesse for his passage ouer accordinglie, and nothing wanted thereunto but onelie a west wind. But before the same happened, messengers came from the garrison at Limerike, aduertising that Donold prince of Thomond had besieged the citie round about with a great armie, and that their vittells which they had in the towne, aswell that which they found at their comming thither, as also what so euer was else provided, were all spent and consumed; and therefore requested that they might with all speed be rescued and holpen. The earle, who was verie soie & pensif for these newes, and deuising all the waies he could to helpe them, caused a muster to be taken of all his souldiers; who were so greued for the going awaie and departure of Reimond, that they utterly denied and refused to go and to serue that waie, vnles Reimond were their capteine and lieutenant. Whereupon they toke aduise with the kings messengers what were best to be done in this distresse. At length it was thought best, that Reimond should take the enterprize in hand; and he though verie loth, yet at the request of the earle and the foresaid gentlemen, yielded himselfe to that seruice, and marched forth toward Limerike, hauing with him foure score gentlemen of seruice, two hundred horsmen, & three hundred archers, besides Morogh of Kencile, and Donold of Ossie, and certeine other Irishmen, who serued and attended him. And as he was marching and comming toward Cashill, tidings was brought him that the prince of Thomond had raised his siege, and was comming towards him to meet him, and was now come to the passe of Cashill: which passe although naturallie of it selfe it were verie strong, yet by means of new trenching, plashing of trees, and making of hedges, it was made so strong, that no horsmen could either enter or passe through the same.

The oration of Donold to his soldiers, the recouerie of the citie of Limerike.

Chap. 14.

Reimond being now almost come to the place where his enemies late, shutted his host or armie into three parts or companies, and determined to giue the onset or aduenture. Whereupon Donold prince of Ossie, who was a mortall enemy to the prince of Thomond, and now verie desirous that some good exploit shuld be done; and beholding the Englishmen now also set in god arate, for though they were but few in number in respect of the others, yet they were pikemen, valiant and couragions: he also to encourage them, to shew themselves like valiant men, vseth and maketh these speeches vnto them. Verie worthie, noble, and valiant conquerors of this land, you are this daie valiantlie to giue the onset vpon your enemies, which if you do after your old and accustomed maner, no doubt the victorie will be yours; for we with our spars; and you with your swords, will so sharplie them pursue, as they shall verie hardlie escape our hands, and auoid our force. But if it so fall out, which God forbid, that you be overthrombe and haue the worse side: be you assured that we will leaue you and turne to our enemies, and take part with them. Therefore be of good courages, and loke well to your selues, and consider that you are now far from anie fort or place of refuge, and therefore if you should be vtien to flee, the same will be long and dangerous to you: as for vs we may not trust vnto vs, for we are determined to stick to them who shall haue the victorie, and will pursue and be on the backs of them who shall flee and run awaie; and therefore be no longer assured of vs than whilst we be conquerors. Mellerus who had the foreward, hearing these words, being warmed with the same, suddenly like a hurling and a blustering wind entered into the passe, pulled downe the fastnesse, and brake downe the hedges, and so made waie, with no small slaughter of the enemies, whereby the passe was recovered and the enemies overcome. And they then marched without perill vnto Limerike, where they entered the third daie in the Easter weeke, being on tuesdaie. And as the first conquest of Limerike was vpon a tuesdaie, so was the second also, where for a time they staied, and restozed all things by the enemies before spoiled, & set the same in good order. The enemies finding themselves to be too weak, and that it was better to bowe than to breake, praied to haue a parlee and a communication with Reimond: & in the end the messengers of Kothorike king of Connagh, and of Donold of Thomond, did obtaine the same; and a parlee was appointed for them both, which was in one daie, but not in one place; for Kothorike of Connagh came by boates vpon the riuer of Sheinin, as far as the great loch of Dirigid, & there staied. And Donold not far from thence kept himselfe and his companie in a certeine wood. But Reimond chose a place not far from Killaloe, which is about seauentene miles from Limerike, and in the middle betwene them both. The parlee betwene these continued a pretie while, but in the end both kings submitted & yielded themselves, gaue hostages, made fealtie, and were sworn to be true from thenceforth for euer, to the king of England and to his heires.

These things thus done and concluded, Reimond returneth in great triumph and solitie vnto Limerike. And by and by there came messengers vnto him from Dermot Mac Artie prince of Desmond, praieing and requesting him to aid and helpe him, being being the king of Englands faithfull and leige man against his eldest sonne Cormion Olerhan, who went about to drine and expell him out of his land and dominion: & promised him god intertainment both for himselfe and for his souldiours for the same. Keimond nothing refusing the offer, and verie desirous of honor, taketh aduise of his friends and companions; and by all their consents, the sojourn to wards Cork was liked. Where vpon Keimond displayed his banner, and marcheth thither wards, and taketh by the waie great preles and booties of neat, cattell, and other things: of the cattels he sent a good portion backe vnto Limerike for vittelling of that citie; & in the end he conquered the whole countrie, subdued the rebellious sonne, and restored Derman the prince to his estate and right. And thus by reason of Keimond Mac Artie, he was restored and recovered, who otherwise had bene in vtter despaire, and out of all remedie. And now to recompense his son Keimach, who before this, by waie of a peace and an intreatie, both vnusellie & guilefullie had taken and imprisoned him, he to acquite guile with guile, and the like with the like, took his sonne and cast him into prison, and not long after smote off his head.

The death of the earle

Strangbow.

Chap. 15.

WHilest these things were thus aduancing in Desmond, there came a messenger in all hast from Dublin, with letters to Keimond from his wife Basilia, the effect whereof the messenger knew not. These letters Keimond forthwith deliuered to a familiar friend of his to read them vnto him secretlie, and apart from all others, the tenure of them was as followeth. To Keimond his most louing lord and husband, his owne Basilia wisheth health as to his selfe. Know ye my dere lord that my great cheeketoth, which was wont to ake so much, is now fallen out; wherefore if ye haue anie care or regard of me, or of your selfe, come awaie with all speed. Keimond hauing considered of this letter, did by the falling of the tooth fullie coniecture the death of the earle, for he late verie sicke at Dublin before his comming awaie from thence. But he being thus deceased, which was about the kalends of June, they at Dublin did what they could to keepe the same secret, for feare and in doubt of the Irishmen, vntill that Keimond were come with his band of souldiers vnto them. Keimond himselfe forthwith returned vnto Limerike: and notwithstanding he were verie forie and much græued with this newes, yet dissembling the same, and bearing it out with a good countenance, would not nor did vtter or disclose it to anie bodie, sauing to a few wise and discret men of his familiars and trustie counsellors. And then vpon good aduise and deliberation had among them, it was concluded and agreed vpon, that so much as the earle was dead, and that Keimond also was to depart awaie ouer into England; that the citie of Limerike which was so farre remoted and in the middle of manie enimies, should for the time be left, and the garrison to be conducted and brought from thence into Weimster, for the defense and safe keeping of the townes and forts vpon the sea coasts. Where Keimond full much against his will yelded to this their aduise and counsell, being much græued that hauing taken paines to recover the citie of Limerike, he was now neither able to keepe it himselfe, nor yet had any to leaue behind him, who would take charge vpon him. But at length he sent for Donald prince of Thomond, being the kings baron & swoorne subject, and vnto him he committed the custodie and charge of the citie: who forthwith pretending all truth and fidelitie was contented therewith; and did not onelie put in hostages, but also took a corporall oth, and was solemnlie swoorne for the safe keeping and the restitution of the same at the kings will and pleasure, as also in the meane time to keepe the peace.

Then Keimond and all his companie departed and went awaie: but they had not so longe passed ouer the one end of the bridge, but that the other end was forthwith broken downe, euen at their heeles; and the citie which was well walled, defended and vittelled, was set on fire in foure sundrie parts, which they saw and beheld with no small grieue of mind. The false traitor then openlie shewing and teaching that credit was to be giuen thenceforth to the Irish nation, who so wickedlie, impudentlie, and perfidiously did perjure themselves. The king of England not long after, being aduertised hereof, is said to haue thus said: Noble was the enterprise in the giuing of the first aduenture vpon the citie, but greater was the rescuing and recovering thereof againe: but it was onelie wisdom, when they left and forsake it. Keimond then returned vnto Dublin with his whole garrison in safetie, and then the erle, whose corps by his commandement was reserved vntill Keimonds comming, was buried in the church of the Trinitie at Dublin, before the rood there, by the appointment of Laurence the archbishop, who did execute all the funerall seruices and obsequies.

The comming of William Fitzaldelme and others ouer into Ireland.

THese things thus done, the kings messengers vpon these new changes and changes were to take new aduises; and hauing throughlie debated the state of the countrie, and the necessitie of the time, they thought it best and did conclude that Keimond should tarie behind, and keepe the countrie in good state and order; but they themselves to returne backe to the king. Who accordingly prepared themselves, and at the next westwlie wind then following, they took shipping and passed ouer into England; and being landed, did in post and with all the hast they could, make their repairs vnto the king; vnto whom they declared the death of the earle, & all other things concerning the state of that land. The king then vpon aduise and deliberation had in this matter, sent ouer William Fitzaldelme, with twentie gentlemen of his household, to be his lieutenant, & ioined John de Courcie in commission with him, who had attending vpon him ten men. Likewise Robert Fitzstephans and Spiles Cogan, who had noble serued him in his wars two yeeres, were also sent with them, hauing twentie men attending vpon them. These allone as they were arriued, and come to land, and Keimond hauing vnderstanding of the same, assemblie his companie and souldiers, which was a companie well beset, and marcheth towards Wexford, and there in the confines or marches of the same he met Fitzaldelme and the rest of his companie, whom he verie louingly saluted and embraced: and forthwith according to the kings pleasure, he yelded and deliuered vnto Fitzaldelme, then the kings lieutenant, all the citie and townes, as also all such hostages as he had within that land.

lustie a companie about Keimond, and well marking also Spellerius, and others the nephues of Keimond, about the number of thirtie persons, mounted upon their horses, verie lustie and braue, and well besene in like armoz, with their shields about their necks, and their staves in their hands, coursing by & downe after their maner about the fields. He enuied thereat, and turning backe to his men, said secretlie vnto them; I will shortly cut off this pride, and quail this brauerie. Which in the end it perillie so came to passe, for both he and all the rest which followed him in that office, did as it were by a secret conspiracie, enuie and maligne at Keimond, Spellerius, Fitzmaurice, sonnes to Fitzstephans, and all other of their race and kindred. For this was alwaies the lucke and fortune of this kindred and familie.

In all seruices of warres they were then the foremost, and had in best price, and in all martiall affaires they were the best and most valiant men; but when there was no such seruice in hand, and no need of them, then were they contemned and no account was made of them; but by a secret malice they were abased, relected and refused. And albeit great was their malice, yet was their nobilitie so honorable and great; that by no means, do what they could, was the same to be extirpated or rooted out. For euen at this date, such good successe hath their noble beginnings had, that their offspring hath euer since (1) continued in that land, in much honor, force and power. And to saie the truth, who persecuted the force of the enemies in that land? Euen the Geraldines. Who did best keepe & prefer the land in safetie? The Geraldines. Who made the enemies to go backe & be afraid? The Geraldines. Who be they which for their good deserts are most maligne and enuied at? The Geraldines. Suerlie, if it had pleased the prince to haue considered of them, according to their deserts and worthinesse; no doubt the whole state of Ireland long yer this had bene quieted and established. But causelesse were they alwaies had in suspicion, & their worthinesse still had in gelousie: and they put in trust, as in whome was neither valiantnesse of seruice, nor assurednesse of trust. But yet ye worthy and noble men, who for to attaine to honor, haue not bene afraid of death; and for to obtaine fame and renowne, haue not esteemed your selues; be not dismayd, though ye be uncourteouslie considered, and without your deserts disdained and maligne at: but go ye on wards, and proceed in your wonted steps of vertue. And if my pen can go according to worthinesse, I shall be happie, and receiue the guerdon of vertue & immortall fame: for vertue cannot faile nor die, but either in this life or in the life to come, or in both, shall haue his iust reward and desert. And albeit your valiant seruice and worthinesse, either by the slackenes of the king, or by means of other mens secret and enuious practises, haue not bene hitherto considered nor rewarded: yet shall not I faile, with my pen to publish, and in my writings to remember the same. And therefore thinke not now, neither do you giue ouer to labor and trauell from date to date to grow and increase in honor, fame and renowne. For the memorie thereof (farre surpassing all the treasures in the world) for a time through malice maie be couered, but neuer suppressed nor extind: but as fire long hid, shall in the end breake out into great flames, and for euer remaine in perpetuall memorie.

About this time was borne in Owendelocke a monstrous man, begotten by a wicked man of that countrie vpon a cow, a vice then too common in that wicked nation. It had the bodie of a man, but all the extreame parts of an ore, for from the ankles of the legs and the wrists of the armes, he had the hooves of an ore, his head was all bald, fauing a few small & thin heares here and there: his eyes great, round and blacke, like an ore; nose he had none but onelie two holes, speake he could not but onelie belowed like a cow. This monster did daile resort vnto the house of Maurice Fitzgerald, about dinner times, and such meate as was giuen him he would take in his hooves, and put to his mouth, and so feed himselfe, &c: but to returne to the matter. William Fitzaldeline, being now in high authoritie, and having the gouernement and charge of the land in his hands, marcheth along the sea coasts, and vieweth all the towines, forts and castles that waies: but for the inner countrie, the mounteines and hills vpon the maine land, and bordering vpon the Irishie, he neither cared nor passed for the same: but yet mistaked not the welth and riches thereof. For being a verie greedy and a couetous man, and expectallie hungry to haue gold and treasure, whereof was good store in that land, he greedilie scraped and scratched together whatsoeuer was to be gotten.

About this time, Maurice (2) Fitzgerald in the kalends of September died at Wexford, whose death was lamented, & his departure bewailed of all the countrie. For whie, he was a verie graue & a valiant man, & who for his constancie, truth, courtesie & lone left not his like behind. After his death, William Fitzaldeline sent for the sonnes of the said Maurice, and so dealt with them, that he neuer left them, vntill by one means or other he had craftilie gotten from them the castell of Guendoke. Howbeit afterwards he gaue them Fernes in exchange: which albeit it were in the middle of their enemies, yet like lustie and couragious gentlemen, they builded there a strong castell, which they kept & inhabited mangre all their enemies. Walter Almane, so called in name, and not for that he was ether in nature or stature an Almane, being nephue to William Fitzaldeline, was made seneschall of Wexford; who nothing degenerated from the maners & conditions of his uncle, but was one who was a corrupt man in all his actions & doings, being couetous, proud, malicious and enuious. And suerlie it is commonlie seene, that there is none lightlie worse, than when a beggerlie rascall from nothing, and from a base estate, is aduanced to wealth, credit and estimation. For such a one alwaies doubting and mistrusting all things, suppresseth all things, & thinking all things to be lawfull for him to do, vseth all extremities at his will and pleasure. There cannot be (I saie) a worse beast, than when a cruell rascall and proud begger is raised to estate, and made a ruler ouer his betters.

This Walter entered into acquaintance with Morogh prince of Bencile, and by him being corrupted with great bribes, did what he could to procure the utter destruction of Keimond, and all his foresaid cosins and kinsmen. And to begin the execution of their practises, the foresaid William first toke a waie from Keimond all his lands about Dublin, and about Wexford. And whereas he receiued letters of commandement from the king, to resort vnto Fitzstephans a cantred of land which he had in Wexlan, he being well bribed, detracted and lingered the execution thereof: but yet in the end appointed and assigned vnto them other places which were further off and remoter; and the same the more perillous, because they were in the middle of the enemies.

(1) It is verie true, that these Geraldines euen since haue continued in this land of Ireland, and did daile grow and increase to much honour: there being at this instant two houses aduanced to the the titles of earledoms, and sundrie to the estates of barons. And so long as they continued in the steps of their ancestors, they were not so honourable as terrible to the Irish nation: but when they leaning English government, liked the loose life of that vicious nation, then they brought in coine and luerie, and a number of manie other Irish and diuellish impositions, which hath bene the ruine of their honour, the losse of their credit, & in the end will be the overthrow of all their houses and families.

(2) This Fitzgerald was buried, and yet lesly in a monasterie of Greie friers without the walles of the towne of Wexford, which house is now dissolved, and the monument of his buriall almost destroyed: there wanting some good and worthy man to restore the same againe. He deserued well of his prince and countrie: and therefore lamentable it is, that in so unkind a countrie no one good man is to be found, that of so worthy a knight will not restore so worthy a monument.

The description of William Fitzaldelme.

Chap. 17.

This Fitzaldelme was a grosse and corpulent man, as well in stature as in proportion, but of a reasonable height; he was verie liberall and courtlike. And albeit he were of great courtesie, and would giue to anie man much honour and reuerence, yet was the same altogether with willes and guiles: for vnder honie he gaue venem, and his sugred words were mingled with poison. And as a venemous serpent couered with greene leaues, he with an outward shew of courtesie couered his mindfull trecherie. For to the outward shew he was liberall and courteous, but inwardlie full of rancoz and malice. In countenance pleasant, but in a stinking bzeast was hid a stinking vapoz: outwardlie as meeke as a lambe, but within as wilie as a fox: carieng vnder sweet honie most bitter venem. His words as smooth as oile, and yet indeed they were deadlie strokes: whome he honoured and reuerenced this daie, he would either spoile or destroye the next daie. A cruell enimie against the weake and feeble, and a flatterer vnto the rebell and mightie: gentle to the wild and sauage, and courteous to the enimie; but extreame to the good subiect, and cruell to the humble; and by that means he was not fearefull to the one, nor trustie to the other. A man full of flatterie, and yet altogether craftie and deceitfull. He was also much giuen vnto wine and to women. He was a greedie couetous man, and an ambitious flatterer, being altogether bent to the one and the other.

(1) This William was the sonne of Aldelme father to Burke erle of Kent (as some saie) and his son Richard was sent into Ireland, and there greatlie advanced: and of him (being lord of Connagh) descended the burgesses called Clanuicards, who were the best blod of the foresaid Richard, and these doe yet remaine in Connagh, of whom is the earle of Clanricke now liuing.

How Iohn de Courcie inuadeth Ulster.

Chap. 18.

Iohn Courcie, who (as is before said) was ioined in commission with William Fitzaldelme, when he saw the course and manner of his dealings, who as he was co-uetous, and did nothing but for monie; so was he timorous, and did all things in craft and deceit: as also that the enimie feared him not, and the good subiects and garrison at Dublin, by means of their capteins couetousnesse were vnpaid of their wages, and by reason of his slouth and sluggishnesse the vittels were scant, & none went & scouted anie more abrode as they were wont to get anie booties or prizes, he secretlie dealeth with some of them, and by his wise conference, and wittie persuations, allureth and inticeth vnto him euen such as were the valiantest, honestest, and chosen men of them all: who were content and verie glad to accompanie and follow him. And hauing so gotten into his companie two and twentie gentlemen, and about thre hundred others, he boldlie entred and inuadeth into the prouince of Ulster, a countrie which hitherto had not tried the force and strength of the English nation. And then was fulfilled the prophesie of Aperlun Celodine (as is said, howbeit I will not so affirme it) A white knight sitting vpon a white horse, bearing birds in his shield, shall be the first which with force of armes shall enter and inuade Ulster.

This Iohn Courcie was somewhat of a browne colour, but therewith somewhat whitish, and at that time he rode vpon a white horse, as also did beare in his shield thre painted (1) birds. After that he had passed thre daies iourneie through the countrie of Arrell, he came the fourth daie (being the kalends of Februarie) to the citie of (2) Downe, without anie resistance of the inhabitants thereof: he being an enimie and a ghest vnlooked for. And (3) Downe then the ruler of that countrie, being affrighted and amazed at their so sudden coming, fled awaie. The souldiers which before their coming from Dublin were halfe pined with famine, and hunger starued, hauing now recouered great booties and prizes of neat and cattels, were full and well refreshed.

At this verie present time, there was come thither out of Scotland a legat from Rome named Alufanus, & he toke great pains to intreat & make a peace betwene Downe & Iohn de Courcie, vRING all the persuations that he could, affirming that if he would depart and go awaie, there should be a yeerlie tribute paid to the king of England: but all his words auailed nothing. Downe seeing that words could little auaille, assembleth all the forces of the countrie: and within eight daies hauing gotten about ten thousand souldiours, with force inuadeth, & with great courage commeth to enter & bzeake in to the citie of Downe. For in Ireland, as it is commonlie also in all other lands, they which inhabit in the north, are more warlike and cruell than anie others in other parts. Iohn Courcie seeing the course and bent of the enimies, who not onelie vpon a hope and confidence of their great multitude against so few enimies; but also their valliant and courageous minds, who were fullie determined to inuade the citie: thought it better with his small companie (which though they were but few in respect of their aduersaries, yet they were souldiours valliant, coragious, and of good seruice) to issue out and aduenture the fight with them, than to be pinned & shut vp in a beggerlie ward made with turffes in a corner of the citie, and there for want of vittels to be famished. Wherefore he issued out and ioined the battell with them, where the fight was hot, the bolues a farre off on the one side, and the darts on the other side: then lance against lance, and the bill against the spar, and the sword against the skeine: who buckled so fullie the one against the other, that manie a man fell that daie to the dust. And in this terrible fight and buckling, he that had seene how valliantlie each man shewed shewed himselfe, and spectacillie how John Courcie most valiantlie with the stroke of his sword mangled manie a man, killing some, but wounded and maimed manie, would and must needs haue commended him for a right worthe, noble, and right valiant warrior.

(1) The giueth three birds as this author saith, which by heralds are thus blasoned. Argent three griths or geires gules crowned gold: this grith or geire is a kind of an eagle, but such as is rauenous, and feareth more vpon carrion than vpon anie soule of his owne preteng: & for his cowardnesse carieth neither the name nor praise appertaining to the true eagle.

(2) Downe is a towne lieng in the Ards, which is in Ulster, a profitable and a fertile soile: it is the see of the bishop of that diocese, who beareth his name of the said towne, being called the bishop of Downe.

(3) The Latine word is Dunlennus, which I do find to be Englished Dunell, which is the name of a great familie or nation in the prouince of Ulster; but whether this Latine be trulie so interpreted, I refer it to the reader, or such as be expert in such Irish names.

The commendation of Roger Power, and the victorie of John de Courcie, and of the propheties of Celodine.

In this fight there was manie a worthe man, which valiantlie acquitted himselfe: but if it might be said without offense, there was no one man who did more valiant acts than (1) Roger le Power, who albeit he were but a young man and beardless, yet he shewed himselfe a lustie, valiant, & couragious gentleman; & who grew into such good credit, that afterwards he had the gouernment of the countrie about Leighlin, as also in Downe. This fight was verie long & doubtfull, each partie manfullie defending themselves, and none yielding the one to the other. But as the common prouerbe is, be the date neuer so long, yet at the length it ringeth at enenlong: so likewise this fierce, long, and cruell fight had his end, and the victorie fell to John de Courcie, and a great multitude of the enemies were slaine in the field, as also vpon the woars of the seas as they were fleeing and running awaie. When was fulfilled the old prophesie of Celodine the Irish prophet, who foretelling of this battell said, that there should be such a great bloodshed therein of the Irish people, that the enemies perceiuing them should wade vp to the knees in blood. Which thing came so to passe, for the Englishmen perceiuing them and killing them vpon the woars, the same were so soft, that with the weight of their bodies they sunke downe vpon the hard knees or twisels, and so the blood fleeing and lieng vpon the woars, they were said to be therein vpon to the knees.

The same man also (as is said) did write that a poore stranger, and one come out from other countries, should with a small power come to the citie of Downe, and against the will of the gouernor thereof should take the same. Manie other things also he wrote of sundrie battells to be waged, and of the events thereof, which were all fulfilled in John de Courcie. This booke the said John had, and he so esteemed the same, that still he had it about him, and in his hands; and did manie times, yea and for the most part direct his doings by the same. It was also written in the same booke, that a young man with force and armes should breake and enter in through the wals of Waterford, and conquer the same with the great slaughter of the townsmen: moreover, that the same man should come to Waterford, & from thence to Dublin, where he should enter in without anie great resistance; & all these things (as is apparent) were fulfilled in earle Richard. Likewise he wrote in the same booke, that the citie of Limerike should be twise left and forsaken by the Englishmen: but the third time it should be kept, which thing came so to passe. For first (as is before written) Keimond had it and gaue it ouer: the second was, when the king had giuen the same to Philip de Buse, for he being brought thither by Fitzstephans, and Miles Cogan, to take and enter into the same, and being come to the riuer side of Shenin for the same purpose, was there bitterlie discozaged to proceed anie further, and so without anie thing done, leaueth the same as he found it, and came backe againe; as hereafter in his place it shall be shewed. And thus (according to this vaticine) twise it was left, but the third time it shall be kept.

But this is to be implied and meant of Hamon de Malognies the iusticiarie there appointed; in whose time the said citie being under his gouernment, was by treacherie and treason destroyed, and so forsaken and left; but afterwards recovered by Spellerius: euer since which time it hath remained and bene kept in the possession of the Englishmen. Well then to the battels of John de Courcie, first he had the victorie in two notable battels or fights at Dublin; the one in Februarie, and the other in Iulie: in which he hauing but a small companie of men, fought against sixtene hundred of his enemies, of whom he slue and ouerthrew a great number, and had the victorie. The third was at Ferlic about the taking of a preie, where by reason of the streit & narrow passages, he was too much and euerie estates ouerset by the enemies, and so had the worse; some of his men being killed, and some scattered and dispersed abroad in the woods and fields, so that he had scant eleuen persons left with him. And notwithstanding that he had thus lost his men and horses, yet was he of such a valiant mind and courage, that with those few which were left, he went through his enemies, and in spite of them all trauelled two daies and two nights on foot in their armour without meat or drinke thirtie long miles, vntill he was past danger, & so came safelie vnto his owne castell againe. The fourth battell was at Triell, where manie of his men were killed and manie fled. The fifth was at the bidge of Puno, after and vpon his comming from out of England, and yet therein he had the victorie and conquest. So in three battels he had the victorie, but in two he receiued both the losse and hurt; and yet in them did more annoie the enemy, than was hurted himselfe.

(1) The race & issue of the Powers hath euer since and yet doth remaine in Ireland, who nothing degenerating from this their ancestoz, haue for their part shewed themselves valiant and men of good seruice, for which they haue bene honorablie rewarded, and are now barons and peeres of the realme. Their habitation and dwelling is in the prouince or countie of Waterford, and not far from the citie of Waterford.

The description of John de Courcie,

Chap. 20.

In this John de Courcie was white and pale of colour, but verie fierce and arrogant, he was sinowous and a verie strong made man, verie tall and mightie, and of a singular audacitie: and being from his verie youth bent brant to the wars proude a verie valiant souldior. He would be the first in the field and foremost in the fight; and so ambitious and desirous he was of honor, that were the enterprise neuer so perillous, and the seruice neuer so dangerous, yet he would giue the adventure. And albeit he were the generall or capteine, yet setting the priuilege thereof apart, he would be as a common souldior, and serue in the place of a privat seruitor; and manie times being more rash than wise, and more hastie than circumspect, he had the worst side and lost the victorie. And although in seruice he were thus forward, earnest, and belement; yet in time of peace and rest he was verie sober, modest, and altogether giuen and disposed to serue God, and hauing the victorie of his enemies and good successe in his affaires, he would ascribe the honor vnto God, and be thankfull for the same. But as Tullius writeth, nature neuer made anie thing perfect and absolute in all points. And so it appeared in this man; for through his too much pinching and sparing, and by reason he was verie bracerie and vnconstant, his vertues (otherwise great, and deserving great praises and commendations) verie much imperished and blemished. He married the daughter of Gored king of Maime. And after that he had waged manie battels, and fought sundrie times with his enemies, he at length had the masteerie and conquest ouer them: and then hauing brought the whole countrie to a good peace and rest, he builded sundrie and diuerse castles throughout Ulster, in such mete and convenient places as he thought best. And by the way this one thing me thinketh is verie strange, that these three notable & the chiefest posts of Ireland, namelie Veruie, Richmond, and this John de Courcie, by Gods secret (but not vnjust iudgement) neuer had anie lawfull issue. I might also say the like of Mellerius, who as yet hath no lawfull issue by his wife. Thus much hauing brastie and by the waie spoken of the noble acts of John de Courcie, and leaning the same vnto others to be more at large set forth and described, we will now retorne againe to Dublin.

The councell or synod kept at Dublin; of Viuian the popes legat, and of Miles Co-gans issuing into Connagh.

Chap. 21.

In this meane time, Viuianus the popes legat remained still in Ireland, and held a synod at Dublin of all the clergie, in which he openlie confirmed and published the right which the king of England hath to the realme of Ireland, as also the popes ratification and confirmation of the same; commanding and charging euerie person, of what estate, degree, or condition soeuer he were, that vpon paine of excommunication he should not denie his loialtie, nor breake his allegiance vnto him. And moreover (1) forsomuch as the manner and custome was among the Irishie, that whensoever anie goods, coine, or vittels, were put and kept in anie church, no man would meele or deale to carrie the same awaie; yet neuerthelesse, he gaue licence and libertie to all Englishmen, that whensoever they went, or were to go in anie hostling, and could not elsewhere be prouided of anie vittels, that they might lawfullie take what they found in anie church: so that they left with the churchwardens, or such as had the charge thereof, the true and iust value of so much as they took awaie. These things thus done, Miles of Cogan, who was lieutenant of the bands of souldiors under William Fitzaldelme, as also constable of the citie of Dublin, he with 40 gentlemen, whereof 20 were vnder the conduct of Ralph the son of Fitzstephans, as also his lieutenant, and they hauing with them 200 horsemen & 300 footmen, passed ouer the riuer of Shenin, & invaded Connagh, which hitherto no Englishman had aduentured. The Connagh men forthwith set on fire and burned all the towne, villages, and churches, as also all such coine as they had in their baggards, and in their caues, and could not carrie with them. Likewise they took downe the images and crucifixes, and hurled them abroad in the fields. Neuerthelesse, the Englishmen marched on wards, till they came to the towne of Thomond, where they staid eight daies together; and finding the countrie forsaken of the people, and barren of vittels, they returned backe againe ouer the Shenin: and by the waie they met with Rothorke prince of Connagh, who late in a wood nere the Shenin waiting for them, and he had three great troops and companies with him of the best fighting men of Connagh. Betwene them there was a long and a cruell fight, in which Miles lost but three of his owne companie, but manie of his enemies were slaine. Which done, he recourted ouer the riuer, & so came safetie to Dublin.

(1) This vsage and custome is yet at this present obserued, and euerie church in the countrie stuffed and filled with great chests full of coine, which the husbandmen doe for safetie keepe therein: and this lieth safe at all times, euen in the verie warres among themselves: howbeit the same is not so religiouslie kept and obserued in these daies as in times past.

How William Fitzaldelme is sent from home into England, and Hugh de Lacie put in his place: and how Miles Cogan and Robert Fitz-stephans haue the kingdome of Conke giuen vnto them.

Chap. 22.

William Fitzaldelme, who during his abode and being in this land, had done nothing worthe the commendation, sauing that he caused the staffe called Johns staffe to be fetched from Armagh, and brought to Dublin; he (I saie) and Miles Cogan, with Robert Fitzstephans were sent for by the king to come home. In whose come the king sent ouer Hugh de Lacie, and made him his deputie ouer the whole land, joining in commission with him Robert Poole then seneeschall of Waterford and Waterford. The king, after the returne of the aforesaid Fitzaldelme and others, thinking and considering with himselfe the good seruice of Miles Cogan, Robert Fitzstephans, and others; as also how necessarie it were, that such noble seruitors and valiant men were placed among the Irish people, wherby to keepe them in good order and dutifull obedience; he gaue to Robert Fitzstephans, and to Miles Cogan in fee for euer to be equallie diuided betwene them all south Dounster (1) that is to saie, the whole kingdome of Conke, from the west part of the riuer at Leismore vnto the seas, sauing and reseruing the citie of Conke, and one cantred of land there vnto adioining. Also he gaue vnto Philip de Buse all the north Dounster, that is to saie, the kingdome of Limerike, sauing and excepting the citie of Limerike it selfe with one cantred ther vnto adioining, to haue vnto him and to his heires for euer in fee. These men thus rewarded, confederated themselves together to iointe and helpe one another, and euerie of them maketh the best preparation that he can. Which being in redinesse they took shipping and arrived into Ireland in the moneth of Nouember, and landed at Waterford: from thence they coasted sted along vnto Corke, where they were receiued with much honoz both by the citizens, and also by an English gentleman named Richard of London, who was depute there vnder Fitzaldelmie.

As soone as they had pacified and quieted Dermot (2) Mac Artie prince of Desmond, and the residue of the noble men and gentlemen in those parties, Fitzstephans and also Miles Cogan diuided betwene them the seauen cantreds, which were nearest to the towne: for these they kept and held in best peace and rest. Fitzstephans had the thre cantreds which laie in the east part, and Cogan had the foure which laie in the west, the one hauing the moze because they were the wooser, and the other had the fewer cantreds that were the better soile and ground. The citie it selfe remained in their ioint gouernement, and the residue of the cantreds being foure and twentie remained in common, and the profits thereof growing they equallie diuided betwene them. A cantred both in English and in Irish is so much land as containeth one hundred villages, as is in our topographie declared, which is commonlie called an hundred. These things thus done, they bying and conduct Philip de Buse vnto Limerike. Fitzstephans had with him twentie gentlemen and fortie horsemen, Miles Cogan had twentie gentlemen & fiftie horsemen, Philip de Buse had twentie gentlemen & thre score horsemen, besides a great number of bowmen & footmen, which they all had when they were come to Limerike, which was about fortie miles from Corke, & onlie the riuer of Sherin was betwene them and the citie: the same at their coming was set on fire before their eyes by the citizens themselves. Penethelless, Stephens and Miles offered to aduenture ouer the water, and to enter the towne; or if Philip thought it so good, they would there build a castell vpon the riuers side right ouer against the towne. But Philip albeit he were a valiant and a good man, yet considering with himselfe how dangerous the place was, being in the middle of the enemies, and farre remoted from all succors and helpe, without which he was not able with his small companie to defend and keepe the same, as also being partly persuaded by the counsell and aduise of his companie, thought it better to retorne home in safetie, than to dwell in the middle of his enemies in continuall perill and danger. And it is not to be much marvelled that in this iourneie he had so euill success: for whie he had gathered & retained to him the notablest murderers, theues, & seditious persons that were in all Southwales, and the marches of the same, and these were of best credit with him, and he most ruled by them.

About this time Amere duke Fitzstephans son, a lustie yong gentleman and a towarddie, died at Corke in March, to the great sorow and græse of all his friends. Here about this time was found and seene a great tode at Waterford, wherof was made much wondering, as is in our topographie declared. Also within the space of thre yeares there was seene thre eclipses of the sun, howbeit these were not vniuersall, but particular eclipses seene onlie in the land. After that Fitzstephans and Miles Cogan had quietlie and peaceablie gouerned and ruled the kingdom of Desmond fve yeres togither, and by their prudence and modestie had restrained the baslie forwardnesse, and rash disposition of their yong men, Miles and Kase the sonne of Fitzstephans a lustie yong gentleman, and who had married Miles daughter, went toward Lismore, there to meet & to haue a parle with Waterford men: as they sate in the fields waiting and looking for them, one Macture with whome they should and had appointed to haue lien at his house the next night following, suddenly and vnwares came stealing vpon them, and there traitorously slue them, and fve of their companie. By meanes wherof the whole countrie forthwith was in an vproare, insomuch that Dermot Mac Artie, and all the Irishie in those parties, as also the traitor Macture, were out: and denieng to be any longer the kings loiall subiects, made wars against Fitzstephans, who now once againe felt the course of fortunes disposition. And these so much annoyed him, that he could neuer recouer himselfe againe, vntill that his nephue Keimond, who succeeded him in the gouernement there, came and rescued him: yet that notwithstanding, he was neuer his owne man, neither could he be at a perfect peace and rest.

And by the waie this is to be noted and considered, that as the northerne men be warlike and valiant; so are the southerne men craftie and subtil, the one seeking honoz, the other deliting in craft & deceit; the one valiant, the other wille; the one of great courage, the other set all on treason and falshood. But to the matter. When Keimond had how fortune frowned vpon his vncle Fitzstephans, and what distresse he was in, being shut vp in the citie of Corke, and his enemies assailing him round about, forthwith assembled his companie, and hauing in readinesse twentie gentlemen, and one hundred of footmen and bowmen, he taketh shipping at Waterford, and sailing along the coasts, maketh towards Corke with all the hast he can, that he might relieue and comfort his friends, and be a terror vnto his enemies. And in the end hauing oftentimes incountered with the enemies, some he killed, some he drove out of the countrie, and some he compelled (which was the greater number) to submit themselves and to sue for peace: and thus in the end after great stormes and tempest followed a faire weather and a calme. Where shortly after Richard of Cogan, brother vnto Miles, & nothing inferior vnto him in valiantnesse, or any other respect: came into Ireland with a lustie picked companie and chosen men, being sent to the king to supplie his brothers roome. Also in the end of the same winter, and in the moneth of Februarie (3) Philip Barrie nephue to Fitzstephans, a verie honest and a wise gentleman, came ouer with a lustie companie of chosen men, as well for the aid of his vncle, as also for the recouerie of his land in Methan, which was perforce taken awaie (4) from Fitzstephans, as also afterwards from Kase Fitzstephans sonne. In the same passage also came Gerald an other nephue of Fitzstephans, and brother vnto Philip Barrie, who with his good aduise and counsell did verie much pleasure and helpe both his vncle and brother: for he was learned and a great trauelier, in searching to learne the site and nature of that land, as also the first origine of that nation, and whose name the title of the booke beareth. About this time Herrie of Mont Morris professed himselfe a monke in the monastrie of the Trinitie in Canturburie, and gaue to the same in franke and pure almes all his patronages and impropriations of all his churches, lieng by the sea coasts betwene Waterford & Waterford, and so became a monke, & liued a solitarie life in a religious habit: who as he changed his habit, so would God he had changed his mind! & as he hath laid awaie his secular weeds, had cast off his malicious disposition!

(1) The gift which the king gaue vnto these two gentlemen of this countrie is yet extant vnder his broad seale, and was giuen by the name of the kingdom of Corke, being bounded from the riuer which fleteth by Lismore towards the citie of Limerike, vnto Knocke Brendon vpon the seas on the west, to be holden of the king, and of his heires by thre score knights fees. The citie it selfe without cantred of land land was reserved to the king, saving that they two had the custodie thereof. This kingdome in course of time for want of heires male of them, came to two daughters. The one of them was married to Carew and the other to Courcie, & they in the right of their wives inioined the same during their liues; and after them their heires, untill such time as by a diuision growing amongst the Englishmen, the Irishrie expelled them, and recouered the countrie vnto themselves.

(2) These Mac Arties are yet remaining in the said province of Cozke, and they be now dispersed into sundrie families, but the chieftest of them is named Mac Artie More, and he in the time of king Henrie the eight was advanced to the honor and degree of an earle, being called the earle Clan Artie, which in common speech by interposition of the letter C is pronounced Clancartie.

(3) In this point there is a varietie among the writers, some writing that Fitzstephans should take alwaie the land from Philip Barrie, and giue it to his son Rafe; and to recouer this out of their hands, the said Philip came ouer with such power and force as he could make. Some write againe that the land after that it was giuen to Philip Barrie, he departing into England left it in the custodie and charge of Robert Fitzstephans, who when he listeth not or could not keepe it anie longer, deliuered the custodie thereof to his sonne Rafe: who as his father so was he wearie to keepe the same. And for that cause Philip Barrie minding to inioine, and to make the best thereof, with such force and helpe as he had gotten, came ouer both to helpe his vncke, & also to fortifie & build holds & castles vpon his said land, whereby he might be the better able to defend and keepe the same: and this seemeth to be the truth of the historie.

(4) This Philip of Barrie, hauing seized vpon lands and possessions in Ireland, his posteritie haue euer since continued in that land; and nothing degenerating from their first ancestor, haue from age and to age bene noble and valiant gentlemen, and who for their fidelitie and good seruices, were advanced to honour and made vicounts: and in that title of honor do continue still. But would to God they were not so nuzled, rotted, and altogether seasoned in Irishrie! the name and honor being onelie English, all the rest for the most part Irish.

How Hugh de Lacie builded castels, and fortified in Leinster and Meith.

Chap. 23.

Whilest these things were thus a dooing in Desmond, Hugh de Lacie a good and a wise man builded sundrie castels both in Leinster and Meith, and fortified the same verie stronglie: and among others he builded one at (1) Leighlin vpon the riuer of (2) Barrow besides Desfozic, a place naturallie of it selfe verie strong, which place Robert Poizze by the kings commandement had the charge of, untill he gaue the same ouer and forsooke it. What worthie champions and fit marchmen were this Poizze & Fitzaldelme, to be sent to dwell and rule in a nation, which is destituted and wanteth noble and valiant men! But a man maie see the course of fortune, who when she is disposed to smile, how she aduanceth and raiseth vp men from base estate to high degrees: for why, these two had moze pleasure in chambering and plaieng the wantons with yong girls, and to plaie vpon a harpe than to beare a shield or staffe, or to weare armour. And trulie it was to be marvelled, that so noble a prince could send such cowards to beare rule, and haue aphoritie in places of seruice. But to the matter. Hugh de Lacie being a verie wise man, all his care was to bring all things to a peace and quietnesse: and therefore such as were oppressed or diuened out of their lands and territories, he restored them, and with such courteous behauiour and gentle speeches he dealt with all men, that in a verie short time he drew vnto him the hearts of the people, who desirous to dwell vnder his gouernment, manured the grounds; which being then wast and untilled, was in short space full sowed and fraughted both with corne and cattell. And then for the safetie of the people and defense of the countrie, he builded towne and erected castels in euerie place, made orders & established lawes for the gouernment of the people. And by this it came to passe, that ech man inioined the labours of his owne hands, and euerie man liued in peace one with the other, and euerie bodie loued him, and he assured of all men. But hauing thus by his wisdom, policie, and good gouernment recouered that nation to good conformitie and obedience, behold enuie (which alwaies maligneth vertue) he was had in a gealouie and suspition, that his dist and policie was to appropriate the whole land to himselfe, and as the lawfull king and monarch would crowne himselfe king of Ireland. Which opinion was so receiued & false rumour so spred, that it was in a short time caried into England; which when it came to the kings eares, you maie not thinke that he at all liked thereof, or could brooke the same.

(1) This Leighlin standeth full vpon the riuer of Barrow, and it is a verie old & ancient castell called by the name of the Blake castell, a fort in those daies verie strong: it standeth in the baronie of Dore, which is the ancient inheritance of the Carews, who being barons of Carew in Wales, one of them married the daughter and heire of the baron of this Dore, & so the Carews became & were for the course of sundrie yeares, untill in the troublesome times, in king Richard the seconds time they were expelled, as all others or the most part of the English were. But being dwelling there, some one of them builded a religious house of Greie friers nere adioining to the said castell, which being since dissolved in king Henrie the eights time, the same fell into the kings hands, who made thereof a fort, and kept there a perpetual garison, and thus was it dissecured from the baronie. There is also one other Leighlin distant 50 from this about an English mile, where is the cathedrall church of that diocese, and whereof the bishop taketh his name being called the bishop of Leighlin; but for difference sake the same is called old Leighlin, and this other Leighlin bridge, by reason of a bridge builded of stone ouer the riuer at that place, and whereof the one end butteth vpon the foresaid Blake castell.

(2) The Barrow is a goodlie and a notable riuer, hauing his head or spring in the hill called Spons Blandina or Slogh Blome, in which also are the heads or springs of the two other notable riuers Sure and the other Coire. This Barrow keepeth & hath his course through the countie of Ler, and passeth by the market towne of Athie vnto Carlow, and from thence vnto Leighlin, and so to Kosse, a little about which towne it meeteth and ioineth with the Coire, and they together keepe their course about six miles, untill they meet with the Sure, which is nere vnto the late abbeye of Dunbradie: and as they all do spring and rise out of one mountaine, so after they haue taken their seuerall courses, they meet together and take one waie into the seas. They are all navigable, and all a like replenished with sundrie sorts and kinds of fishes.

The description of Hugh de Lacie.

Chap. 24.

If you will know what manner of man Hugh de Lacie was, you shall understand his eyes were blacke and deepe, and his nose somewhat flat, and the right side of his face from the chin upwards by a mischance was shewolke skalled: his necke was short, and his bodie haire, as also not fleshy but sinewy and strong compact; his stature was but small, and his proportion deformed, but in conditions he was verie sober, trustie, and modest. He was verie carefull in his owne priuat matters, but in causes of gouernment and in all publicke affaires he was most vigilant and carefull. And albeit he were a verie good souldier, and one of great experience in martiall affaires, yet in his sundrie adventures wherein he was sometimes rash and verie hastie, he sped not alwaies best nor had the best successe. After the death of his wife he was somewhat lose of life, being much giuen to women, of whom he made no great choise: he was verie greedie and covetous of wealth and possessions, but ouermuch ambitious of honour and reputation. At this time in Leinster florished Robert Fitzhenrie brother unto (1) Meilerius, who in his youthfull yeares was verie lustie like the flower of the garden, which when the winter draweth and is cold, doth wade and wither awaye. Likewise (2) Alexander and Geraldus the two sonnes of Maurice. And albeit Gerald were a man but of meane stature, yet verie wise, sober, and honest. Also Roger le Poivre conestable of Leighlin, Hugh de Lacie, and William le Poivre seneschall of Waterford, Robert Barrie the younger sonne of Philip Barrie, and both the Keimonds were of best fame and credit in these daies. About this time befell and happened the two strange wonders at Fother in Metch, whereof we haue spoken in our topographie; namelie, of the woman violentlie and perforce abused in a mill by a souldier, and of the otes there stolen and caried awaye.

(1) Pessa the daughter of the great Rhesus had thre husbands, by the first named Henrie she had a sonne, who being named after his name, was named Fitzhenrie, who was father to Henrie, Robert, and this Meilerius.

(2) This same Pessa had to hir thirde husband one Gerald of Windsoze, and by him had issue hir fourth son named Maurice, who was father to William Gerald and this Alexander. This Gerald was a valiant and a noble gentleman, and who had wars against Rhesus the father of this Pessa, and kept the towne and castell of Penbroke against him and all his force: but in the end after a peace concluded betwene them, he married this ladie, and had worthe issue by hir.

How Hugh de Lacie vpon a vaine suspicion was sent for into England, and of his returne againe from thence.

The suspicion conceiued of Hugh de Lacie daile increased more & more, and as is before said came to the kings eares, who as princes in such causes was verie gelous, and could not like thereof, and therefore forthwith sent for Hugh de Lacie by John conestable of Chester and Richard Pef, whom he appointed to carrie and serue in his place, & to be the gouernours or lordes iustices of the land. But before he should depart and go awaye, it was agreed by a common consent, that there should diuerse castels and sundrie fortis be builded in Leinster: for Metch was alreadie metlic well and indifferentlie fortified & incastelled. First therefore they builded two castels in Fotheret of Dunolan, the one for (1) Keimond, and the other for Griffith his brother: the thirde was at (2) Treldermont nere to Moxoghs countrie for Walter of Kidentford: the fourth for John (3) Clauill vpon the riuer of Barrow not far from Leighlin: the fift at Collach for John Herford. And as for Kildare, which with the countrie adioining was before by the earle in his life time giuen to Meilerius, was taken from him; & in exchange the countrie of (4) Ler was giuen to him, which was a wild and savage countrie, full of woods, pannes, and bogs, and in the middle of the enimies, as also from anie succour or rescue: howbeit not vnfit for this such a champion of Mars and so worthe a souldier.

These things being thus done in the summer time, Hugh de Lacie toke his passage ouer to England, and made his speedie repaire to the kings presence, where he so wiselie and dutifullie behaued himselfe, that the king not onelie was resolu'd of his truth and fidelitie, but also putting especiall confidence in him, he sent him backe againe. And calling home the foresaid John de conestable and Richard Pef, made him his generall and deputie of the land, and toke assurance of him for his truth in this behalfe: howbeit he ioined in commission with him one Robert of Salisbury, who should in the kings behalfe be a counsellor and a trustie assistant vnto him in all his doings. Now Hugh de Lacie being returned backe againe into Ireland, and there settled and placed, thinketh vpon his first deuises, how to fortifie the countrie and to keepe it in good order. And the more castels he builded, and the more Englishmen he did bestow and place therein, the soner and better did he thinke to bring the same to passe and effect. Among manie castels therfore which he builded, he made one at Tachmeo in Ler, which he gaue to Meilerius, as also gaue him his nece to wife; also one castell nere to Abotwie which he gaue to Robert Bigaret, and not farre from thence an other castell which he deliuered to Thomas Fleming. And not farre from thence he builded one other castell at the Moxach on the riuer of the Barrow, which Robert Fitzrichard had: besides in Metch he builded the castels of Dunach and of Kilaire, as also Adam Fuceport and Gilbert Mogens castels, and manie others, which were now too long to be particularlie repeted and recited.

And about this time was that strange talke and communication in a wood in Metch, betwene a priest and a wolfe, whereof we haue spoken in our topographie: which thing though it may seme verie strange & most incredible, yet the same is not to be discredited. For as S. Jerome saith, you shall find in scripture manie strange things, & which to a mans iudgement shall seme to be nothing true at all: and yet neuertheless they are most true. For nature can not preuaile nor do anie thing against the Lord of nature: neither ought anie creature to contemne or scorne, but rather with great reuerence and honour to consider the workes of God his creator. Not long after this king Henrie the younger, the son of king Henrie the elder, being seduced & caried (the more was the pittie) by lewd and naughtie counsels, rebelled the second time against his father, and had gotten vnto him the most part of the best noble men in all Poitiers, & the lustiest gentlemen in all France: besides his brother Geffreie the earle of Britaine the chiefe author and cause of this rebellion, and manie others of his confederates. But in the end, by Talke betwene a priest and a wolfe.

Gods

Gods iust iudgement and vengeance for his unnatural ingratitude against his father, who though he were a verie valiant and a lustie gentleman, yet against death nothing can helpe, and so died about June at Mares to the great sorrow of manie. And verie shortly after also the foresaid Gessreie, a noble and a valiant gentleman, & who for his worthinesse and prowesse might haue bene the sonne of Achilles or Achilles, who now reuolting the third time from his father, and rebelling against him, was by Gods iust iudgement about the kalends of August taken out of his life, and so died.

(1) Nessa the daughter of the great Khesus prince of Wales had thre husbands, the third of them was Gerald of Windsor, and these had to their first sonne William Fitzgerald the father vnto this Keimond, and Griffith.

(2) Cresseldermont is a castell about a fise miles from Catherlough, & sometimes a verie faire towne and walled round about, and bordering nere to the baronie of Mdone. The English wryters doe saie that this castell was not builded in this Cresseldermont, but at Kilken, a castell about thre miles from this, and both now belonging to the earle of Kildare. But the Latine bookes, which are of eldest writing and credit, and whom I doe herein follow, doe wryte it by expresse words, Cresseldermont.

(3) This castell of Clanill not far from Leighlin, is supposed to be that which is now called Carlough or Catherlough: howbeit the common fame of the countrie doth attribute this castell of Carlough to Gua the earls wife, and the ladie and heire of Leinster, and that she should build the same. But there appeareth no such things of hir doings, for by the course of the historie it is plaine, that the castels builded in Leinster were done by the Englishmen onelle, and for their defense and safetie.

(4) The countrie of Ler is parcell of Leinster, & lieth in the marches and extreme confines of the same by the west: it is verie strong and fast, being full of woods and bogs, and therefore a safe receptacle for rebels and outlawes. It is within the diocesse of Leighlin, and before now of late no thire ground, but inhabited by the Mores, who were alwayes rebels and traitors. But in hope to reforme the same it was made a countie of it selfe, by an act of parliament in the third and fourth yeares of Philip and Marie, and named the Quenes countie.

The death of Laurence archbishop of Dublin, and of Iohn Comin made arch- bishop in his place.

Chap. 26.

In this meane time Laurence archbishop of Dublin died at the castell of Angiers in Normandie, about the kalends of December 1180. He was a (1) iust and a god man, but somewhat in displeasure with the king, who had him in suspicion because he was at the counsell of (2) Laterane, and there inueighed much against the king of England and his honour; & for that cause in his returne homewards through Normandie was staied, and in the end there died, where he was buried in the high church of our ladie. After him Iohn Comin an Englishman borne, and a monke in the abbey of Euenham, was by the kings means elected orderlie by the clergie of Dublin archbishop, and afterwards confirmed by pope Lucius at Laterbe, where he was also made a cardinall. A man he was verie well learned and eloquent, and verie zealous in causes of the church, wherein he would haue done verie much good, if that he had not bene too woldie, & haue sought to haue pleased woldie princes, and to haue bene in the kings fauour.

(1) This one thing is and was a common obseruation in the Romish church, that if anie one had received the charact thereof, that although he were neuer so rebellious, nor so great a traitor against his prince; yet the same was to be interpreted to be in defense of the holie church, and such a one was counted a godlie and a holie man, though by the scriptures he who resisteth his prince is said to resist God himselfe.

(2) The counsell of Laterane is said to be one of the greatest synods or generall counells that hath bin, it was kept at Rome vnder pope Innocent the third An. 1204. Many decrees were there made for the aduancing of the Romish antichrist: but yet the counsell could not be brought to his full perfection by reason of the ciuill wars in Italie. But among other decrees this was concluded, that all controuersies betwene kings and princes, the correction thereof should appertine to the pope: as also no man should be counted emperour, except the pope had admitted him and crowned him.

The comming of Iohn the kings sonne into Ireland.

Chap. 27.

The king to aduance his younger sonne named Iohn had giuen him the dominion ouer Ireland, and he thereupon had taken homage of sundrie persons for the same: and now minding to bring the same to a finall end & perfect order, sendeth ouer into Ireland before his sonne Iohn the new archbishop of Dublin, who as a forerunner vnto his sonne should prepare all things in readinesse against his comming, who forthwith toke his iourne about the kalends of August, and sailed ouer into Ireland. Also in the moneth of September then next following, he sent ouer Philip of Worcester, a valiant souldier, a sumptuous and a liberall man, with fortie gentlemen, who was commanded to send ouer (1) Hugh de Lacie, and he to stae there as gouernour of the land untill Iohn his sonne came ouer. This Philip being thus placed in authoritie, the first thing he did he resumed and toke into the kings vse the lands in Mchabesse, and diuerse other parcels which Hugh de Lacie had before sold, and these he appointed to serue for the kings provision and diet. And after the winter was past, he assembled and mustered all his men and companie, & began to trauell from place to place; and in March about the middle of Lent he came to (2) Armagh, where when he had extorted and perforce exacted from the cleargie there a great masse of monie and treasure, he returned vnto the citie of Downe, and from thence to Dublin in safetie: being well laden with gold, siluer, and monie, which he had exacted in euerie place where he came: for other good he did none. In this iourne there happened two strange miracles, the one at Armagh concerning the great anguish and grieve of (3) Philip when he departed and went out of the towne, the other was of a (4) fornicie which Hugh Tirell toke away from the poore priestes at Armagh, as moze at large is declared in our topographie.

(1) This Hugh de Lacie albett he were thus sent for, yet he went not ouer, as it appeareth by the course of the histories of this time: he was about building of a castell at Deruagh, and there being among his labourers, what the bl-shops pati is.

Two str-

laborers, and seeing one not to frame verie well in his worke, taught him what he should do, taking his pickaxe in both his hands and brake the ground. This wicked Irishman when he saw his lord and master thus stooping and labouring, suddenlie came behind him, and with his ax or weapon strake him in the head and slue him, but his inheritance and possessions came & descended to his two sonnes Walter and Hugh.

(2) In Ireland there are foure archbishops, one at Dublin for the prouince of Leinster, another at Cashill for the prouince of Mounster, the third at Thomond for the prouince of Connagh, & the fourth at Armagh for the prouince of Ulster. The chiefest of them is the archbishop of this Armagh, for although euerie one of the others be named a primate of Ireland, yet this one alone is named primate of all Ireland; which title he hath partly because he is successeur to S. Patrike, who first conuerted Ireland to the christian faith, and had his see and church at this Armagh; one other cause is because this archbishop was the first that receiued a pall from the pope. This pall is a certeine inuesture of cloth, which the pope haloweth and giueth or sendeth to euerie archbishop, who weareth the same vppermost vpon his garment. The nature of this pall, of the first inuention thereof and the causes whie it is giuen to euerie archbishop, is not incident nor appertaining to the course and nature of this historie, and therfore I will omit it. This Armagh was sometimes a faire towne, and therein a faire cathedrall church, lieng farre and remote from all good neighbors, and in the middle of the Muel and other sauage people; the same hath bene and still is and lieth wast; and the archbishop removed to a house of his named Terseham, which lieth nere the towne of Drogheda, being a place of better safetie.

(3) The historie is, that this Willp of Worcester being well landed with great riches erected from the cleargie and departed, he was no sooner out of the towne, but that he was taken with a sudden pang, which for the time was so vehement, that it was supposed he would neuer haue recovered it.

(4) This Hugh Wrell among other the spoiles which he toke, he had a great bzuing forname or pan which serued for the whole house, for which his doing the priests cursed him, and he caried this along with him untill he came to the citie of Downe. And on a night he being in his lodging, the same was entred with fire, and the howles which drew the said pan, as also much goods which they brought with them, and a great part of the towne was burned. In the morning, when he saw the great spoile, and yet the said pan as nothing hurt nor perished, he began to repent and be soze, and so restozed the pan againe.

The coming of Heraclius the patriarch into England.

Chap. 28.

While these things were doing in Ireland, Heraclius the reuerend patriarch of Ierusalem, hauing gone a long iourneie from the east to the west, came into England about the beginning of Februarie; who brought with him the keyes of the holie citie and sepulchre, with the kings ensigne and martiall signe, in the behofe of all the states of the holie land, as well of the brethren of the order of the temple as hospitall: and with the consent of all the cleargie and laitie, making supplication to king Henrie the second, falling at his feet with teares, and humble desiring him, that he would be pitifullie moued to the aid of the holie land, and Christs patrimonie, desperatlie afflicted by the infidels: otherwise affirming (which within two yeares happened) that the whole kingdome would fall shortly into the hands of the Soldane of the Saracens and of Egypt. Wh what a glorie was it to this king and kingdome, that he passing so manie emperours, kings and princes, as though there were no helpe in the middle part of the world, should come into this corner of the earth, & as it were into an other world to requ're aid? How worthe, perpetuall and incomparable had the kings glorie bene, if he setting aside other businesse, and forsaking his kingdoms, had taken without delate (at this calling of Christ) Christs crosse, and haue followed him! Verelie, he should haue receiued of him the euerlasting kingdome, if he had serued him in this necessitie of whom he receiued his kingdome, and so glorious a grace of gouernement on earth. Wh if he would haue defended here (for his abilitie) the patrimonie of so worthe a kingdome in this point of necessitie, and this triall of deuotion, he might haue bene wortheilie fortified in earth by such a patrone and tutor, in all his affaires and necessities whatsoeuer.

The answer of the king to the patriarch.

At last for answer herof being appointed at last by the king at London, manie as well knights as of common sort, by the admonishments of the patriarch, as the sermons of Baldwin the archbishop were croised to the seruice of Christ. At the last the patriarch receiued this answer of the king, that it was not good to leaue his realme without defense and gouernement, & leaue open his lands beyond sea to the rapacitie of the Frenchmen that hated him: but as concerning monie, he would giue both that which he sent thither, to be reserued for him, and more also for the defense of the holie land. To whome the patriarch answered by following this aduise. O king you do nothing: and by this meanes you shall neither saue your selfe, nor reserue Christs patrimonie. We come to seeke a prince, and not monie. Euerie part of the world almost sendeth vs monie, but none sendeth vs a prince. Therfore we desire a man that may want monie, and not monie that may want a man. But, when the patriarch could get no other answer of the king, he taketh an other deuise: he desireth him to giue to their aid one of his sonnes, and if none other, yet his yongest sonne John, that the blood descending from the Anlowes might in a new branch raise by the kingdome.

John himselfe, albeit he was readie to passe into Ireland giuen him by his father, with a great armie, (prostrating himselfe at his fathers feet) desired (as they saie) that he might be sent to Ierusalem, but he obtained it not. So the patriarch seeing he could do nothing, and draw no oile out of the hard stone, he spake thus against the king, in the audience of manie, with a threatfull and propheticall spirit. O glorious king, thou hast reigned hitherto among the princes of the world with incomparable glorie, and your princelie honour hath hitherto daile increased to the type of highnesse. But now doubtlesse is this triall being forsaken of God, whom you forsake, and destitute of all heauenlie grace. From henceforth shall your glorie be turned into sorrow, and your honor to reproch so long as you liue. I would to God the king had auoided this threat by penance, like the king of Nininie, and had caused this sentence to be altered!

This was the saying of the Emisto clep.

J. i. The

The holie man spake this thing thirte, first at London, then at Dover, and lastlie at Chymon castell be-pound the sea. And I would to God the patriarch had bene a man without that propheticall spirit, & had rather spoken a lesing, that we may for more euidence touch such things byelie as were befoze spoken by that true sozspeaker, whiche we saw shortly to take effect. Whereas the king reigned thirtie and five yeares, thirtie yeares were granted him for worldeglorie, expectation of his conuersion, & triall of his deuotion; but the last five yeares fell vpon him, as vpon an vngratefull, reprobate, and abiect seruant, in reuengement, sorow, & ignominie. For in the two and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, immediatlie after the comming of the patriarch, his first enterprise of sending his sonne John into Ireland, both the labour and cost was frustrate and lost. The thre and thirtieth yeare, whereas he neuer lost land befoze, he lost to king Philip (being but a child) almost all Antio.
The foure and thirtieth yeare he lost the castell Rader, and welneere all Berie. The five and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, and the fourth yeare after the comming of the patriarch, not onlie king Philip of France, but his son Richard of Poitiers rising against him, he lost the cities of Towres and Haine, with manie castels, and himselfe also; according to that in saint Gregorie: Those that the Lord hath long forbore, that they might be conuerted, if they do not conuert, he condemneth them in the more greuouslie.

The croising of kings.

Chap. 30.

What perchance the king was reserued by heauenlie disposition to the victorie of deser-ued loue. How much greater is it to repare things cast downe, than to vnderprop things likelie to fall: And who had knowne Hector, if Troie had continued in prosperitie? By so much as aduersities is more instant and byged, by so much the glorie of valiantnesse will shine the brightier. For by the secret iudgement of God, within two yeares after the victorie was given to the pagans and Parthians, against the christians, either to reuenge the cold deu-otion of the east church, or to trie the deuout obedience of the westerne men; the worthie Richard earle of Poitiers hearing this ouerthrow, toke deuoutlie the croisere vpon him at Towres, giuing an example to other princes in that matter. Wherevpon the king of England, the earles father, and Philip king of France, who had bin befoze at variance (with Gods grace, and the archbishop of Towres perswasion) in that place and that houre, at their conference at Outsoz were croised, with manie other great men of the clergie and laitie. And as kings folowed the example of the erle, so after their example the emperor Frederike, through the perswasion of the duke of Alba, with manie states of Almane were croised in the lords court at Mentz. So as it is thought, the king of England being reserued more than all other to the restoring of the decayed state of the holie land, if he had finished his life in this victorie; doubtlesse that famous prophesie of Merlin Ambrosius had bene benefited in him. His beginning (saith he) shall wauer with wild affections, and his end shall mount to heauen.

The discord of the kings.

Chap. 31.

Sudden discord rose betwene the kings and that (which was worse) betwene the father and the earle, through the working of the old enemie, & their sinnes deseruing the same, to the great hinderance of their noble enterprise: as though they being vniit for it, the honoz thereof was reserued for other; or perchance according to the sentence of Gregorie: Aduersities, which is obiect against good bowes, is a triall of vertue, and not a signe of dispraise. Who is ignorant how happie a thing it was that Paule was driuen into Italie, and yet he suffered shipwacke: But the ship of his heart was safe among the surges of the sea. Likewise therefore as vertue is perfected in infirmities, and gold tried in the fire: so the constancie of faith that cannot be craized with tribulations, doth increase more as sinapis; and the courage of the mind is more valiant againe than troublous assaults of fortune. How much rather would I, that these kings accompanied with a few men acceptable to God, had taken vpon them this laborious, but yet a glorious iourneie, than to war proude for the great wealth that they had gathered of manie people to this end. Read ouer the whole bible, and consider these latter times, and you shall find, that victorie hath bene gained, not with force and humane power, but with Gods grace and force of vertues. For as Cassiodorus saith: An armed people without the Lord is vnarmed. And as Seneca saith, Not the number of the people, but the vertue of a few get the victorie. Of the foure befoze named, the emperor Frederike, albeit he was the last croised, yet in the execution thereof he was the first: whome therefore I account so much the more worthie of victorie in heauen, and glorie in earth, that he forsaking large kingdomes and his empire, delayed not out the matter.

A vision and exposition thereof.

Chap. 32.

Therfore I thought it not inconuenient to set downe a vision, which he that hideth much from wisemen & reuealeth it to babes visited me withall, being a most simple and vile wretch. In the miserie of this time, in that still and detestable discord betwene the king and the erle of Poitiers, I being with the king at Chymon castell the seventh ides of Maie: at night in my sleepe about the cocke crowing, me thought I saw a great multitude of men looking vp into heauen, and as it were wondering at somewhat. So I lifting vp mine eyes to see what the same was, I saw a bright light breake out betwene the thickenesse of the clouds, and the clouds being incontinentlie seuered asunder, and the lower heauen as it were being opened, and the sight of mine eyes pearling through that window to the empyreall heauen, there appeared the court thereof in great multitude, wide open as it were to be spoiled, all kinds of munition being bent against it. You might haue sene there a head cut from one, an arme from another, and some stri-ken through with arrowes, some with lances, and some with swords. And when manie of the beholders either for the brightnes, or terror, or pitie, had fallen flat on their faces: me thought that I (to see the end of the matter) did biew it longer than the rest. So they hauing gotten the victorie ouer all the other, the blondie slaues fell vpon the prince of the heauenlie orders, sitting in his throne as he was wont to be pictured, and drawing him from the throne on the right hand, hauing his breast naked, they thrust him through the right side with their lances, and immediatlie there folliowed a terrible voice in this manner, Woch, woch, Wholi-ghost! But whether it came fro heauen, or was uttered by the people beneath, I can not tell; and so the terror of this voice & the vision awakened me.

I call him here to witnesse, to whom all things are apparant and manifest, that immediatlie as I sat in my bed, & revolved these things in my mind, I was in so great an horroz both of bodie and mind, for halfe an houre and more, that I feared least I should haue fallen besides my selfe. But recourring deuotlie to the onlie refuge of humane saluation, & blessing my forehead with the crosse effstones, & fortifying my mind thereby, I passed the rest of the night without sleepe, & so through Gods grace returned fullie to my selfe: yet to this daie I can neuer remember that vision without horroz. What may be more terrible to a creature than to see his creator smitten through with weapons? What man without græfe can abide to see the seruants of God, & patrons of men to be murdered? Who can behold the Lord of nature to suffer, & doth not suffer therewith? What this vision portendeth, without p̄suidice to anie I will shew briefly. He that suffered once in his owne person for all, giueth vs to vnderstand, that he now suffereth againe, but that in his flocke. And he that by triumphing ouer the crosse, and ascending to the right hand of his father, hath victoriously entered his kingdome; his enemies now go about to dep̄sue him of his kingdome, and subuert his church, which he gathered vnto him by the shedding of his blood. Therefore, as I doe suppose, this passion did not appeare vpon the crosse, but his maiestie: as though the crosse now being taken astate, his enemies go about to take that glorie from him, which he got on the crosse. Else that his faithfull had suffered, not in the crosse, but with weapons in that holie land, which he after so manie miracles had consecrated with his blood. So likewise he declared this his passion which he for his susteined, not in the crosse, but in his maiestie: so he signified, that all the court of heauen suffered with the like compassion, mouing his to reuengement with the shewing of so great græfe. As concerning that voice beginning in a barbarous language and ending in Latine, what I thinke I will shew. Woch, woch, in the Germane tong, is a signe of græfe doubled. And where that wofull mourning voice began in the Germane tong, and ended in Latine, it maie be signified thereby, that onelie the Almans and the Italiens take this the affliction of their Lord more grienouslie than other nations, as their halting declareth. God forbid that the passion or lamentation be here vnderstood by anie slaughter of the christians and people in this expedition.

The memorable euent of our time.

Chap. 33.

I thinke it not impertinent to set downe here (by occasion) the aduentures and notable euent in England: and first of all, the sudden death of the detainers of the kingdome of England against the lawfull heire, the nephew of Henrie by his daughter Matild: as well the death of the worthie knight Eustathius the son of king Stephan, and son in law to Lewes the French king: as of his mother quene Matild the countesse of Bullogne. When the concord adoption made betwene king Stephan, and Henrie duke of Normandie. And then after the death of king Stephan, the marriage of quene Eliano, and the translation from crowne to crowne. Immediatlie, the aduancement of the duke to the kingdome, and the coronation of king Henrie the second. The assize of the castell of Widdogenorth vpon Seuerne, and the compulsion of the worthie knight Hugh Mortimer to dedition, to the terrible example of all. What nedeeth manie words? To confound the mightie, and to make euen the rugged, there were prosperous successes. And as destruction fell vpon the detainers of the kingdome, so likewise it fell vpon the peacebreakers of the same, as well of the brechren, as also of the sons.

The subduing of prince Dene at Colshull in Northwales in a waddie streit, not without the losse of manie knights. A sumptuous expedition to Tholouse, albeit it was unprofitable. An altercation & warre betwene the king of England and Lewes of France, through the doting of both parts. The yielding vp of prince Rhese by the means of his vncle Dene at Pencador in Southwales, the king of England comming thither. The unwilling & wrested confession onelie by word & by writing (as some say) of Thomas of Canturburie, and his suffragans at Clarendon, as concerning annates: when that prophesie of Merlin Ambrosius seemed to be fulfilled; The buls tongs shall be cut out. The inturious crying out of all the court at Northampton against the father, bearing the crosse, & maintaining the rights of the crucifix, and the priue departure of him to exile that night. The ambassage of Reinold archbishop of Cullen, & chancelor to the emperor, from the said emperor to the king of England: who was an effectuous persuader of marriage to be had betwene Henrie the emperors nephue duke of Saronie and Bauler, and Matild the kings eldest daughter: he moued also, but in vaine, to set cleare the Almans schisme. Not long after the publike persurie through out all the realme, by the kings proclamation against the se of saint Peter, and the archbishop of Canturburie. And incontinentlie the countie Gunceline, and other states of Saronie came from the duke into England for the kings daughter.

The coronation of king Henrie the third, son to king Henrie, solemnized in London by the archbishop of Porke, to the p̄suidice of the church of Canturburie. Ambassadors came from Spaine, and obtained the kings daughter Eliano, to be married vnto Ansaldo, king of Toledo and Castile. The comming of Dernicus (being expelled) to the king, and the sailing ouer into Ireland of Fitzstephans, & earle Richard. The expedition of the lord of Oswalstre in Wales, and his returne by occasion of raine: not without his hurtfull dismembzing of the legges, and great slaughter of his enemies. The martyrdom of Thomas. The often shining miracles. The departure of the noble Henrie bishop of Winchester, descended of the kings blood at Winchester. The biage of the king into Ireland. The conspiracie of the states against their prince, and the children against their father. The comming of two cardinals into Normandie, to make inquirie of the death of the martyr. The sudden returne of the king out of Ireland into Wales, and so into England, thence into Normandie; with an appealing of the said cardinals, and the French king. The first departure of the yong king with his two brethren from his father into France. The victorie of the count and two yeares warre, and the kings mercie towards the vanquished, as we haue shewed before. The comming of Huguntio Petie Leon cardinal of the title of saint Angelo into England, and the celebration of a councill vnder him of all the cleargie of England, at London, as concerning the contention of sup̄emasie betwene Richard archbishop of Canturburie, and Roger of Porke: but the allegations on both sides with fitts and stanes bzaie it off. The bishop of Capua, and Diaferus elect of Croia, and earle Flozius, came from William king of Sicill, to haue marriage betwene him and Joane the kings yonger daughter.

vision.

The ambassadores of the kings of Spaine, Castile, and Navar, came into England: who as concerning lands and castles (whereof they contended) promised altogether to stand unto the king of England arbitrement. Wherefore the king assembling at London all the lawyers & wise men in the land of both orders; when the cause was proposed, and the allegations heard on both sides, by famous advocats; among whom, Peter of Cardon, that came in the behalfe of the king of Navar, excelled in eloquence: the king vsing wise counsell, and intending to end the contention by transaction, that giving somewhat from one, and keeping somewhat from an other, he would hurt neither partie much. But as he was appointed iudge by both, so he was carefull for the commoditie of both as much as could be. So making a transaction, and ingrossing it in writing, he wrot the iudiciall examination for a prouiso; That if either part refused to stand to his arbitrement, the definitiue strife might be dirempted by sentence. The comming of Lewis king of France into England, who went on pilgrimage to Canturburie, to the martyr Thomas, to require his helpe deuoutlie, whom he in the time of his exile had helped: and offering a cup pretious both for matter & substance in the place where the holie bodie was buried, when he had declined a while prostrat on his face, and had laid his bare head a while in the right side hole of the marble stone that standeth thereby; at last, rising from his praier (that he might confirme the memorie of his pilgrimage with everlasting record) in the presence of the king of England, the earle of Flanders, the archbishop of the see, the prior of the couent, and other men of state, he gaue yearelie vnto Canturburie abbey an hundred tuns of wine.

The second defection of king Henrie the third, and earle Gesteire, with the sudden death of the yonger king at Marcell. The comming on pilgrimage of Godfrie archbishop of Cullen, and Philip earle of Flanders vnto Canturburie. The death of earle Gesteire. The comming of Heraclius the patriarch, and the sailing of earle John into Ireland. Almost all things as they be here set in order, chanced in our time, in no great distance betwene, in and about the space of three and thirtie yeares. How glorious had all these things bene, if they had sorted to a good end! Which surely would haue hapned, if he setting other things aside, had followed Christ, when he was called, of whom he receiued all these benefits; and had spent the last five yeares reigne in his seruice. But these things being before rehearsed by the way, let vs returne to the historie.

The recapitulation of fundrie acts, and of the comming of John the kings sonne to Ireland, with his successe there.

Chap. 34.

When omitting the building of three castles, one at Tipperarie, the other at Archphin, & the third at Lismore, after the comming of earle John, & speaking nothing of the euill fortune of three worthy yong men; Robert Barrie at Lismore, Keimond Fitzhugh at Dethan, and Keimond Cantinensis at Adona. Of part of the garrison of Archphin slaine in the wood there, by the prince of Limerike on Midsummer daie, & foure knights there killed, not without manfull defense. Of them of Limerike, and the noble man Dgraine slaine at Tipperarie. Of them of Archphin slaine, & gaine by those of Limerike in taking of a preie,

Of Dermuctus Mac Arthie prince of Desmond, with others slaine in a parlee nere Corke by them of Corke, and the garrison of Theobald brother to Walter. Of the slaughter of them of Kencolon, with their prince inuading Meth by the men there, of, & William Little, and one hundred of their heads sent to Dublin. Of the finding out of the bodies of Patrike, Wigld, & Columbe at Dundalke, & their translation from thence by the procurement of John de Curcie.

Of the heading of Hugh Lacie at Dornach, through the treason of his owne Irishmen. Of the killing of twelue noble knights vnder John de Curcie, in the returne from Connagh. Of the traitorous and lamentable slaughter of Roger Dolwe, and manie others in Mserie: and though that occasion, the priuie conspiracie of all Ireland against the Englishmen, manie castles being therewith destroyed. All which things are not vnworthy to be recorded, when the dominion was translated to the kings son. But assigning these doings to other writers, we will proceed to more profitable matters. How and wherefore this first enterprize of the kings son had no good successe I thought good to declare briefly: that this finall addition (albeit it can not be a cure to that which is past) yet it may be a caueat for things to come. ¶ This recapitulation followeth in a more absolute forme, pag. 53. which being deuiered out of sundrie copies, doo perfect one another.]

When all things meete and necessarie for so great a iournie or voyage were at the king his commandement and charges made readie; then John the kings yonger sonne a little before made lord of Ireland, was sent ouer; and in the Lent time (1) he tooke leaue of his father, and as he trauelled towards saint Pauls to take shipping, he passed and rode along by the sea coasts of Southwalis, and so came to (2) Penbroke. There brought and accompanied him vnto the ship a noble and a worthy man named Reinulfe Glanulle, one of the best his most priuie counsell in all weightie matters, as also chiefe iustice of England. And on wednesday in the Easter weeke, the wind being at east and blowing a good gale, he tooke ship in Millford haven, but for hast he left to do his deuotion and oblation at saint Pauls, which was but an euill halsoning: neuerthelesse on the next morrow about noontide he arriued in safetie vnto Waterford with all his companie, which were about three hundred gentlemen, and of bowmen, footmen, horsemen, and others a great number. Then was fulfilled the prophesie of old Merlin: A burning globe shall rise out of the east, & shall compass about the land of Ireland, and all the soules of that Island shall slee round about the fire. And hauing spoken these words of the father, he continueth his speech, and thus speaketh of his sonne: And of this fire shall rise a sparkle, for feare of which all the inhabitants of the land shall tremble and be afraid: and yet he that is absent shall be more esteemed than he that is present, and better shall be the successe of the first than of the second.

John at this his first arriual into Ireland was of the age of 12 yeeres, which was from the first arriual of his father thirtene yeares, of the landing of the earle Strangbow foureteene yeares, and from the first entrance of Robert Fitzstephans fifteene yeares, and the yeare of our Lord one thousand one hundred eightie and five, Lucius then Romaine bishop, Frederike the emperour, and Philip the French king. There passed ouer with the king in the same fleet manie good clerks, among whom (3) one was speciallie commended vnto this yong lord by his father, for that he was a diligent searcher of naturall hystories, as also had bene before two yeaeres in the same land, and there collected sundrie notes, and sufficient matter as well for his hystorie, as for his topographie: and which after that he was returned home, and attending in the court, did (as leisure serued him) digest and set in good order of a booke, the same being his laboꝝ of thre yeaeres. A trauell to him painefull, but to his posteritie profitable, although much mistaked and enuied at by such as then were liuing: the one liked it well, but the other dispraised it; the one reaped a benefitt and commoditie, but the other of a secret malice maligning the same, fretted in his humoꝝ, and was grauelled in his owne follie.

(2) Penbroke is an old and an ancient towne, builded by a noble man named Arnulph Montgomerie the ancestor of the Carews, whose names are Montgomeries, & lieth in Westwales named Demetia, but now of this towne is called Penbroke, shire. It standeth vpon a cræke of Milford haueu, about two miles from the castell Carew: of which castell the Montgomeries builded, and there dwelling toke the name thereof, & were called Carews, which name that familie doth yet retaine. In this towne of Penbroke standeth a goodlie and a strong castell, which hath bene in times past the seat and house of manie a noble man bearing the name of the earles of Penbroke. In this was king Henrie the seuenth boꝝne. It is now in great ruine and in decaye.

(3) This man ment here is Giraldus Cambrensis the authoꝝ of this booke, who (as it appeareth by this and other his woꝝks) was learned and much giuen to studie. He was archdeacon of saint Dauids, and descended from Girald of Windsoꝝe, and the ladie Isesta his wife, for he was the son of Imaurice, and the sonne of the foresaid Girald and Isesta: and so this Girald of Windsoꝝe was his Proauus or great grandfather.

The praise and commendation as also the excuse of Robert Fitzstephans and the earle Strangbow.

Chap. 35.

Robert Fitzstephans was the first who taught and shewed the waie to the earle, the earle to the king, and the king to his sonne. Great praise-worthie was he that gaue the first aduenture, and much was he to be commended who next followed and increased the same: but aboue all others he deserued best, who fulfilled, absolued, and ended the same. And here is to be noted, that albeit both Fitzstephans and the earle did helpe Wermont Mac Morogh to recouer his countrie of Leinster, as also defended and kept the same from robbers, theues, & enemies: yet they did it in diuerse respects. The one in respect of his faith and promise, the other for loue of Gria, & of the (1) inheritance, which by his shoulde grow and come vnto him. But as concerning the intruding vpon Waterford, and the conquests of sundrie territories as well in Desmond as in Meth, I can not excuse them. The earle, who in right of his wife was lord of Leinster, the fift part or portion of Ireland, surrendꝝed and yelded vpon all his right and title there vnto the king himselfe, and toke it againe to hold of him. The like also did all the princes of the land. Whereby as also by other old and ancient records it is apparant, that the English nation entred not into this land by wrong and inturie, (as some men suppose and deeme) but vpon a good ground, right, and title.

(1) The course of this hystorie in the beginning doth plainelie declare, how that Wermont after his departure from the king came to the citie of Waterford, and there hauing conference with Richard Strangbow erle of Chepstow, did offer vnto him his onelie daughter and heire in marriage, with the inheritance of all Leinster: conditionallie that he would passe ouer into Ireland, and to helpe him to recouer his land, which conditions were accepted and afterwards performed. Afterwards he lieng at saint Dauids for passage, there he met with Robert Fitzstephans, & did condition with him, that if he would passe ouer into Ireland to helpe him, he would giue him the towne of Waterford with certeine cantreds therevnto adioining, which conditions were then accepted and afterwards performed. Thus it appeareth that the one for loue of the gentlewoman, and the other in respect of his promise did passe ouer into that land and realme.

The causes of lets whie this conquest could not nor had his full perfection.

Happie and for euer happie had Ireland bene, which being ballantlie conquered, well replenished with townes, and fortified with castles from sea to sea of the first (1) aduenturers, who were then minded to haue established a good order and gouernment, had not they through the secret malice and treacherie of some men bene called awaie and sent from home. Pea happie had it bene, if the first conquerors (being noble and balliant men) might according to their deserts haue had the charge of gouernment committed vnto them. For whie, a nation which at the first comming ouer of our men, when they were galled with our arrows, and afraid of our foꝝce, they were then easie to be reclaimed. But partlie by meanes of trifling and delateng of time, which is alwaies dangerous, and partlie by reason that the best seruitors being called home from thence, new rulers toke too much ease, and liued in too much securitie; nothing was done to anie purpose: and therevpon the people of that countrie toke hart of grace, and practised our manners in shooting and the vse of our weapons: and by little and little they became so well expert and skillfull therein, that whereas at the first they were easie to be ouercommed, were now strong and hardie, and not onlie able to resist, but also readie to put vs in danger and hazard. And the causes herof whose listeth to search, shall easilie find out the same: for if you will read ouer the bookes of the kings & prophets, examine the course of the old testament, and well consider the examples of these our latter daies; you shall find it most certeine and true, that no nation, no state, no citie, no common-wealth was euer ouerthrowne by the enimie, nor ouercome by the aduersarie but onelie for sinne and wickednesse. And albeit the Irish people and nation for their sinfull and abhominable life did well deserue to be ouerthrowne and ouerrun by strangers; yet was it not Gods will and pleasure that they shoulde vtterlic be brought into subiection: neither was it his god will & pleasure that the Englishmen, though they had brought some of them into subiecti-

on, yet they should not therefore haue the whole empire and entire soueraintie ouer them: for both were sinfull people and merited not anie fauour at Gods hand, but deserued to be seuerellie punished, and therefore neither the one (albeit he were a conqueror, and had the ouer hand) could yet obtaine a seat (2) in Pallas castell, nor yet the other be fullie subdued & brought into perfect subiection. The Irish people are said to haue the foure men whome they account to be great prophets, and whome they haue in great veneration and credit (3) Merlin, Bracton, Patrike, and Columkill, whose books and prophesies they haue among themselves in their owne language, and all they intreating and speaking of the conquest of this land, doe affirme that the same shall be assailed with often warres, the strifes shall be continuall, and the slaughters great. But yet they doe not assure nor warrant anie perfect or full conquest vnto the English nation (4) not much before dooms daie. And albeit the whole land of Ireland, from sea to sea, haue for the most part bene in the power of the Englishmen, and by them fortified and replenished with sundrie and manie castels, though sometimes to their perilles and smarts: yet Bracton saith, that the king who shall make the absolute and finall conquest, shall come from out of the deserts and mounteins of saint Patrike, and vpon a sun daie at night shall with force breake into a castell builded in the fastnesse of Whahle: and untill that time the English nation shall from time to time be in continuall troubles with the Irishie, sauing that they shall hold and intote the whole land bordering vpon the east coasts of the seas.

(1) The course of this historie dooth at full declare in particulars, how the first aduenturers were maligne, & as much as might be discredited. First Robert Fitzstephens, whose seruice was counted notable, and his fidelitie to his prince and king trustie and assured: yet fell he into the kings displeasure, was cast into prison, and albeit deliuered out againe, yet the king conceiuing some gelousie of him, had him ouer into Normandie, where he serued two yeares in his warres: and although he were againe afterward sent ouer into Ireland, yet was he not in anie authoritie or office. The earle Strangbow although he came ouer with the king his speciall licence, yet his good successe was so enuided at, that the king made proclamation, that all his subiects being in Ireland with the earle, should returne & come home; and that no vittels, no munition, nor anie reliefe should be transported out of anie of his dominions into Ireland. And albeit the earle afterwards were reconciled to the king, yet was he faine to yeld vnto him all his land and dominion of Leinster vnto the kings deuotion, & to receiue the same againe to be holden of the king. Keimond who could not be charged, nor spoiled with anie vntruth: yet the treacherous Veruie with his false informations so inueigled and falselie informed the king against him, that he was sent for home, and not trusted with anie gouernement. Hugh de Lacie, who (as the historie saith) was the first that made waie into Ulster, who fortified the prouince of Leinster and Meth with manie strong holds & castels, and brought all the countrie to a peaccable state; he was suspected to haue meant the impropriation of the whole land to his owne vse, and was dismissed of his charge and gouernement, and sent for home: and in place and lieu of these were sent ouer William Fitzaldelme, Philip of Chester, and others, in whome was no value at all, but onelie to pill and poll the people, and to heape vp treasure and riches.

hir excellent gift in inuention, is said and fained by the poets to be bozne of the braine of Jupiter without anie mother, she inuented the order of warres, and deuised the maner of fightings, she maketh men to be bold, and giueth the victorie. And because Englishmen could not obtaine a full and a perfect victorie: therefore they were said not to sit in Pallas castell.

(3) There were two Merlin, and both were prophets: the one was named Merlinus Calidonius, or Syluester, because his dwelling and habitation was nere or by a wood called Calidonia, he was borne in the marches of Scotland, but a man verie excellentlie well learned in philosophie, and in knowledge of all naturall causes; and by diligent obseruations he would gesse maruellouslie at the euent of manie things. Wherevpon he was taken for a prophet, and reputed for a magician or a diuino. He was in the time of king Arthur, about the yeare five hundred and threescore, and of this Merlin it is spoken in this historie. The other Merlin was before this man and in the time of Mordiger: about the yeare of our Lord foure hundred and threescore, and he was named Ambrosius Merlinus, who was also excellentlie well learned, both in philosophie and the art magike; but his sentences were so darkelie couched, that nothing could be conceiued nor vnderstood by them before the euent.

(4) Much adoe there hath bene, and manie books written, concerning the full conquest of this land: so manie heads, so manie reasons. But if men would haue the truth plainelie told, it is sone to be sene how the verie cause proceedeth and is continued for want of a generall reformation. But Pluto hath so blinded mens eyes, that seeing they can not nor will not see: but hereof I shall moze at large write in an other place.

A breefe repetition of certeine things done within the course of the historie that are omitted.

Chap. 37.

Here by the waie it were not amisse brieflie to touch & declare of certeine things which happened, & which (for certeine causes) are not at full discoursed in this storie, as we wished that we might haue had the oportunitie so to haue done. First therefore you shall vnderstand, that John the kings sonne at his first comming ouer builded three castels, one at Tiblach, an other at Archeminan, and the third at Lisemoze. Wherof these two thie gentlemen were lost and killed: namely, Robert Barrie at Lisemoze, Keimond Fitzhugh at Dithan, and Keimond Kantune at Moszie. Also how Donald the prince of Limerike secretlie stole vpon the earles armie in Moszie, as they were coming from Dublin towards Limerike, and slew foure hundred Mosmans, and foure noble gentlemen, which were their capteines; among whom was Mgranie an Irishman. And also Dermond Mac Artie prince of Desmond, being at parlee with certeine men of Cork not farre from the said towne, was there set vpon by the said Corkemen & (1) Theobald Fitzwalter, and there was he and the most part of his companie slaine. The like happened in Meth, where they of Kencole & their capteine made a robe, and being set vpon by one William the iustice of that countrie, they were all slaine and a hundred of their heads sent vnto Dublin. Moreover John de Courcie found the bodie of saint Patrike, saint Wigis, and saint Colome at Downe, and removed them from thence. Hugh de Lacie builded his castell at at Wernach, was there traitorouslie slain. John de Courcie at his returne from out of Connagh lost streene of his best gentlemen. Roger le Botz a valiant and a lustie yong gentleman, was by treason taken and murdered in Ossioe, whereupon the Irishmen forthwith brake out from their due obeliance to the king of England, and rebelled against the Englishmen, destroyed manie castels, and set the whole realme in a great sturre and inquietnesse. Other sundrie things happened which were too long to recite: and therefore leaving the same, we will returne to our historie.

(1) This Theobald Fitzwalter, who by his nation was named Becket but by his office Butler, was the sonne of Walter the sonne of Gilbert: & was the first Butler that came into Ireland, who being a wise and an expert man, was first sent with William Fitzalbine. Afterwards he was sent over by king John to view and serch the countrie; and in the end he grew into such credit, that he was incoffed with great livings there, as also advanced (and his posteritie after him) to great honors & promotions, which now are named earles of Desmond and Ossioe.

The causes why England could not make the full and finall conquest of Ireland.

Chap. 38.

IT were not amisse, that we now did consider the causes, and declare the impediments, why the kings sonne had not the best successe in this his so honourable a tourne, and therefore his so famous attempt toke not effect: that albeit the same can not reuoke and remedie that which is past and done, yet that it maie be a forewarning to that which maie follow and insue. The principall and chiefe cause I suppose and thinke to be, because that whereas the patriarch of Jerusalem named Heraclius came in an ambassage vnto him, in the name and behalfe of all the whole land of Palestine called the holie land, requesting that he would take vpon him to be their helpe, and defending the same against the Saladine then king of Egypt and of Damasco: who hauing bent his whole force against them, was like within two yeares following utterly to be ouerrun, the said holie land, vnlesse some rescue in the meane time and with expedition were provided: he utterly denied and refused the same. And being further begged to send one of his sonnes, although it were the yongest: he denied that also: making no account neither of the cause it selfe, which was Christ; nor of the people, which were Christians: neither yet of the person, which was a reuerend and honourable personage.

And yet neuerthelesse he sent forth his yonger sonne in a tourne of hosting, more sumptuous than are needfull or profitable: And whether I praise you, Was it into the east and against the Saracens and miscreants? No, no, it was into the west, & against his euen christian, nothing seeking the aduancing of Gods glorie, nor promoting of his cause, but onelie for his owne priuat lucre and singular commoditie. An other cause was this. At the first landing and entrie of the kings sonne at Waterford, a great manie of the chiefe of the Irishmen in those parties, and who since their first submission to king Henrie had continued faithfull and true, they being aduertised of this his arriuall did come and resort vnto him in peaceable maner, and after their best order to salute him, and congratulate his comming. But our new men & Normans, who had not before bene in those parties making small account of them, did not onelie mocke them, and laugh them to scorn for the manner of their apparell, as also for their long beards and great glibbs, which they did then wear and vse according to the vsage of their countrie: but also they did hardlie deale and all intreat manie of them. These men nothing liking such intertainment thrust themselves out of the towne, & with all hast sped themselves home: euerie one into his owne house; & from thence they with their wiues, children, and household, departed and went some to the prince of Munster, some to the prince of Conke, some to the prince of Connagh, and some to one lord, and some to an other: and to these they declared orderlie how they had bene at Waterford, and what they had seene there, and how they were intreated; and how that a yong man was come thither garbed with yong men, and guided by the counsels of yong men: in whom there was no feare, no sobrietie, no stedfastnesse, no assurednesse, whereby they and their countrie might be assured of any safetie.

These princes and namelie they three of Connagh, Conke, and Munster, who were the chiefe, and who were then preparing themselves in a readinesse to haue come and saluted the kings sonne, and to haue yielded vnto him the dutifull obeliance of faithfull subiects: when they heard these newes, they began straightwaies to imagine, that of such euill beginnings worse endings would insue: and reasoning the matter among themselves, did conclude, that if they thus at the first did deale so discourteously with the humble, quiet, and peaceable men: what would they do to such as were mightie and stout, and who would be loth to receiue such discourtesies at their hands? Wherefore with one consent they concluded to stand and loine together against the English nation, and to their uttermost to aduenture their liues, and to stand to the defense of their countrie and libertie. And for the performance thereof, they enter into a new league among themselves, and swore each one to the other, and by that means enemies before are now made friends and reconciled. This we know to be true, and therefore we speake it, and that which we saw we do boldly witness. And for so much as we thus fondlie and in our pride did abuse them, who in humblenesse came vnto vs: therefore did we well deserue by Gods iust iudgement (who hateth the proud and high minded) to lose the others, for by this example they were utterly discouraged to like of vs. And this people and nation though it be barbarous and rude, not knowing what apertineth vnto honour: yet most and aboue all others do they desire to be exalted and honoured. And although they be not ashamed to be found false of their word, and vniust in their dealings: yet will they greatlie commend lieng and commend truth, louing that in others, which is not to be found in themselves. But to the matter. What great evils and inconueniencies do grow by such follies and insolencies, a wise man may some by learne the example of Rehoboam the sonne of Salomon, & so by an other mans harme to learne to beware of his owne: (2) for he being lead and carried by yong mens counsels, gaue a yong mans answer vnto his people, saiering vnto them; My finger is greater than was my fathers loins, and whereas he beat you with rods, I will scourge you with scorpions, by reason whereof ten tribes forsoke him for euer, and followed after Jeroboam. Another cause is this, when Robert Fitzstephan came first over, and also the earle; there were certeine Irishmen which toke part with them, and faithfully serued vnder them: and these were rewarded and had giuen vnto them for recompense certeine lands lands, which they quietly held and inioied, vntill this time of the coming ouer of the king his sonne: for now the same were taken from them, and giuen to such as were new come ouer, contrarie to the promise & grant to them before made: Whereupon they forsooke vs and fled to our enemies, and became not onelie spies vpon vs, but were also guides and conductors of them against vs: they being so much the more able to hurt and annoie vs, because they were before our familiars, and knew all our orders and secrets. Besides this, the cities and towne vpon and nere the seacoasts, with all such lands, reuenues, tributes, and commodities as to the same did belong and appertene, and which before was imployed and spent for the defense of the commonwealth & countrie, and in the seruice against the enemies, were now all assigned and bestowed vpon such as were giuen to pilling and polling, and who laie still within the towne, spending their whole time, and all that they had in drunkenness and surfeiting, to the losse and damage of the good citizens and inhabitants, and not to the annoiance of the enemies. And besides sundrie other commodities, this was one, and a speciall one; that at the very first entrie of the king his sonne into this vnrulie and rebellious land, the people being barbarous, and not knowing what it was to be a subiect, nor what apperteineth to gouernment, such men were appointed to haue the charge, rule and gouernement, as who were more meet to talke in a parlour than to fight in the fields, better skill to be clad in a warme gowne than to be shrowded in armour, and who knew better how to pill and poll the good subjects than to resist and incounter the enemy: yea for their valiantnesse and prowesse they might well be resembled vnto William Fitzaldelme, vnder whose gouernement both Ireland and Wales were almost vtterlie destroyed & lost. For whie, they were neither faithfull to their owne people nor dreadfull to their enemies; yea they were vtterlie void of that affect, which is naturallie ingrafted in man, which is to be pittifull to the humble and prostrate, and to resist the proud and obstinat; but rather of the contrarie, they spoiled their owne citizens, and winked at their enemies: for to resist and withstand them nothing was done, no castles nor fortresses builded, no passes for safetie made, no waies for seruice opened, but althings went to ruine, and the common state to wacke. Moreover, the seruicemen and the soldiers which were in garrison, they liking well of their captains and masters maners and loose life, gaue themselves to the like, spending their whole time in rioting, banketing, whoresome, and all other dissolute and wanton orders, carrying still within the towne and places far off from the enemies. For as for the marches (so called because the same bordered vpon their enemies; or rather of Mars, because in those places martiall affaires were and are wont to be most exercised) they would not come nere the sight thereof, and by that means the people there dwelling and seated, the soles there manured, the castles there builded, were altogether destroyed, wasted, spoiled, and burned. And thus the prowesse of the old captains, the good seruices of the veterans & well experimented soldiers by the insolent, dissimularat, and lewd life of these new comes was discredited: whereof was nothing else to be awaited for but after such calmes must needs insue stormes and tempests. And albeit they thus lieng in the towne in securitie and at rest, wallowing in lose and wanton life, euerie daie being a holie daie to Bacchus and Venus: yet the state of the land at large was most miserable and lamentable. For euerie where was howling and weeping, the manured fields became waste, the castles destroyed, and the people

murdered, and no newes but that the vtter destruction of the whole land was at hand. And in this distress and necessitie it had bene verie requisite and needfull that the souldiers should haue taken up their weapons, serued against the enemy, and haue defended the common state: but it was farre otherwise, for there was such lawing & verasion in the towne, one daile laing and troubling another, that the heretane was more troubled with lawing within the towne, than he was in perill at large with the enemy. And thus our men, giuen ouer to this trade and kind of life, became fainthearted, and afraid to looke vpon the enemy: and on the contrarie the enemy most strong, stout, and bold. Thus was the land then gouerned, and thus the same posseed towards the destruction of the English nation and gouernment, which had doubtlesse verie shortly followed and ensued, had not the king provided a speedie remedie for the same. For the king being advertised how disorderlie things framed, and considering with himselfe in what perill the state of his realme and people stood, he with all speed sendeth for all these new come souldiers, in whome (other than the name of a souldier was nothing of ante value and commendation) and commandeth them to repaire and come home, and sendeth ouer in their places these old beaten and well tried souldiers, by whose seruice the land before had bene conquered and kept, among whome one and the chiefeest was John de Courcie, who was made lord deputie, and had the gouernment of the land committed vnto him: who, according to his office and dutie, setteth in hand the reformation of all things meet and requisite to be redressed: who the more valiant and forward he was in his said affaires and seruices, the more the land grew to good order, and inioied peace & quietnesse. For whie, he would not be idle himselfe, neither would he suffer his souldiers to lie idle like loiterers and sluggards: but was alwaies labouring and traouelling abroad, and marching still towards the enemies, whome he followed and pursued euery through the whole land, to the vttermost parts thereof, as well in Cooke, Thomond, Connagh, and elsewhere; and if by any means he could haue ante aduantage of them, he would suerlie giue the onset and aduenture vpon them: which for the most part was to their ouerthrowne, though he and his sometimes were galled, and felt the smart. And would to God he had bene as proud a captaine as he was a valiant souldier; and as proud in the one as skilfull and hardie in the other! But to my former purpose. Among the many and sundrie inconueniences happened by euill gouernment of these new officers (as is before said) there was none greater, nor more to be lamented than was this: that notwithstanding God of his goodnesse did giue the victorie, and send the happie successe in this noble conquest: yet was there neither due thanks attributed vnto God, nor any remembrance giuen vnto his church; but to increase a further ingratitude, they tooke and spoiled alwaies from the same their lands and possessions, as also minded to abridge them of their old and ancient priuileges & liberties. So great a note of ingratitude, and an argument of too much vnbankfulness: whereof that vnguietnesse and troubles did insue, the sequel therof (for the course of sundrie years) did shew and declare.

So many outrages & disorders, which did crepe in by the disorderd gouernment vnder the king his sonne, were not so much to be imputed to his yong and tender yeares, as vnto the euill counsels and directions of such as were about him, and had the speciall charge thereof: for such a sauage, rude, and barbarous nation was by good counsels, discret directions ations and prudent gouvernement to haue bene gouerned and reduced to good order and conformance. For whie, if a realme which by wise and prudent gouernement is brought and reduced to a perfect state, yet being committed to the gouernement of a child is cursed and brought to manifold distresses, troubles and miseries (5) how much more then is it to be so thought of that land, which of it selfe being rude and barbarous, is committed to the gouernement of such as be not onelie rude and barbarous, but also lewd and euill disposed. And that this did so happen and come to passe in Ireland, all wisse men doe know it; and the elder sort doe confesse it to be true, although young men to couer their folles, would reiect it to some other causes & impediments. For whie, such of them as had procured vnto themselves great liuings, lordships and territories, they pretended at the first that they would be readie to serue the king his sonne, to defend the countrie, to resist the enimie, and that they would doe this and that with manie god morowes. But when they had gotten what they would, and had that they fought for, then it manifestlie appeared that it was singular gaine & priuat profit which they shot at: for hauing obtained that, they neuer remembred their oth to their lord, nor cared for the common state, nor passed for the safetie and defense of the countrie, which in dutie they ought chieselie to haue considered.

(1) The Irish nation and people euen from the beginning haue bene alwayes of a hard bringing vp, & are not onelie rude in apparell but also rough & ouglie in their bodie: their beards and heads they neuer wash, cleanse, nor cut, especiallie their heads; the haire whereof they suffer to grow, sauing that some doe vse to round it: and by reason the same is neuer kembered, it groweth fast togither, and in procelle of time it macteth so thicke and fast togither, that it is in stead of a hat, and keepeth the head verie warme, & also will beare off a great blow or stroke, and this head of haire they call a glibe, and therein they haue a great pleasure.

(2) The historie is written in the first booke of the kings the twelue chapter, and in the second of the chronicles the tenth chapter: the effect therof, is that after the death of Salomon the people of Israel requested Rehoboam his sonne, to ease them of the grievous burdens and heauie yoke which his father laied vpon them, who leauing the counsell of the old counsellors, gaue them answer by the aduise of young heads, as in this place is recited.

(3) What these Irishmen were, there are diuerse opinions. Some thinke that they were such as did inhabit about Wexford, some thinke that they were they of Kencelo, for they saythfullie serued the Englishmen vnder their capteine named Morogh at Limerike, when the earle of Redmond recovered the same. But I find it to be noted of the Irish, who are now dwelling within the baronie of Dron, and had a seat there by the gift of the Hauenaughs, but since resisting against them and denieng to pate there accustomed cheuerie, yelded themselves vnto the earle of Dromond, paing vnto him a certeine blacke rent to be their defender against the said Hauenaughs, but in right they are tenants to the barons of Dron.

(4) This is meant of that which is before spoken in the twentie chapter in the description of this Iohn de Curcie, where his too much rashnes is noted to be a great fault in him.

(5) It is written by the preacher of Ecclesiastes; Who be vnto thee O thou land whose king is but a child. Which is not meant absolutlie of a child, but of such a one who (as a child) hath an euill affection, and is bold of that grauntie, wisdomie, and maiestie as is required in a prince and gouernour. For Josias when he was crowned king of Iehuda, was but eight yeares of age; and yet bicause he did that which was right in the sight of God, and ruled the land godlie and vpightlie, he is commended in the scriptures for the same.

Three sorts of people which came and serued in Ireland.

Chap.39.

There were three sundrie sorts of scrutoys which serued in the realme of Ireland, (1) Normans, Englishmen, and the Cambrians, which were the first conquerors of the land: the first were in most credit and estimation, the second were next, but the last were not accounted nor regarded of. The Normans were verie fine in their apparell, and delicate in their diets, they could not feed but vpon deinties, neither could their meat digest without wine at each meale; yet would they not serue in the marches, or anie remote place against the enimie, neither would they lie in garrison to keepe anie remote castell or fort, but would be still about their lords side to serue and gard his person; they would be where they might be full and haue plentie, they could talke and brag, sweare and stare, and standing in their owne reputation, disdain all others. They receiued great intertainment and were liberallie rewarded, and left no meanes vnsought how they might rule the roff, beare the sway, and be advanced vnto high estate and honour. In these things they were the first and foremost, but to serue in hosting, to encounter with the enimie, to defend the publike state, & to follow anie martiall affaires, they were the last and furthest off. And for asmuch as those noble and worthy scrutoys, by whose seruice, trauels and industrie, the said land was first entred into and conquered, were thus had in contempt, disdain, and suspicion, and onelie the new comes called to counsell, and they onelie credited and honored: it came to passe that in all their doings they had small successe, & by whole and little their credit decated, and nothing came to effect or perfection which they toke in hand.

The Normans fine in their apparell and delicate in their diet.

(1) This king, besides England and Scotland, had in his rule and gouernement the duchie of Normandie, and the earledomes of Gascoine, Guen, Antou, & Poitiers, beside the losse of that which came to him by the right of his wife. And albeit he trusted the Englishmen well enough, yet being borne on the other side of the seas, he was more affectionated to the people of those prouinces there subiect vnto him: for of them he chose both them which were of his counsell in peaceable gouernment, as also his scrutoys in martiall affaires. And albeit he had of euertie of these prouinces some, yet bicause Normandie was the chiefe, and he duke thereof, they went all vnder the name of Normans, and so called Normans.

How or by what manner the land of Ireland is throughlie to be conquered.

Chap.40.

It is an old saying, that euertie man in his owne art is best of credit & most to be believed: & so in this matter they are speciallie to be credited, who haue bene the chiefe travellers and scrutoys in and about the first reco-verie of this land, do know and can best discover the nature, manners, and conditions of these people and nation: for as the matter speciallie toucheth them, so none can do it better than they. For whie, by reason of their continuall warres with them being their most mortall enemies, none can better saie than they how they are either to be conquered or vanquished. And he by the wale hapie had Wales bin, I meane that Wales which the English people do inhabit, if the king therof in governing the same or when he incountred with his enemies had used this deuise & policie. But to the matter. These Frenchmans although they were verie good souldiers and well appointed, yet the manner of the warres in France far differeth from that which is used in Ireland and Wales; for the soile & countrie in France is plaine, open, & champaine; but in these parts it is rough, rockie, full of hills, woods, & bogs. In France they weare complet harnesses, and are armed at all points, not onelie for their honor, but especiallie for their defense and safeties; but to these men the same are combersome & a great hinderance. In France they keepe standing fields & trie the battels, but these men are light horsemen & range alwaies at large. In France they keepe their prisoners and put them to ransomes, but these chop off their heads and put them to the sword. And therefore when the battell is to be waged in the plaine, open, & champaine countrie, it behoueth all men to be armed, some in complet harnesses, some in iackets, some in Almaine riuets, & some in bigandines & shirts of maille, according to their places of seruice. So on the contrarie, where the fight & trial is in narrow streits, rockie places, & where it is full of woods & bogs, & in which footmen are to serue and not horsemen, there light armor and slender harnesses will best serue. To fight therefore in such places and against such men, as be but naked and unarmed men, and whome at the first push and aduenture, either the victorie must be had or lost, light and easie armor is best and conuenient. And againe these people are verie nimble & quicke of bodie, and light of foot, and for their safetie and aduantage they seeke waies through streits and bogs, and therefore it is not for anie man laden with much armor to follow and pursue them. Moreover, the Frenchmen and Frenchmans most commonlie are horsemen, and do serue on horsebacke, & these men haue their saddles so great and deepe, that they cannot at ease leape by and downe; and being on foot by reason of their armor, they cannot serue nor traueil. And you shall farther vnderstand, that in all the seruices and hostings, both in Ireland & in Wales, the Welsh seruitors, and especiallie such as do dwell in the marches, by reason of their continuall wars, they are verie valiant, bold, and of great experiences, they can endure anie paines and trauels, they are used to watchings and wardings, they can abide hunger and thirst, and know how to take aduantage of their enemy; and their seruice by horse is such, that they are readie to take aduantage of the field, being quicke & readie to take and leape to the horse, as also to leaue the same, & to follow the enemy at their best aduantage, whether it be on horse or on foot. And such kind of seruitors and souldiers were they, which first gaue the aduenture and first preuailed in Ireland; and by such also in the end must the same be fullie conquered, that when the battell is to be fought & waged in the plaine and champaine countrie, and against such as be thoroughlie armed and appointed for the same, it is reason that the aduerser part be likewise armed and appointed. But when the matter is to be waged in deepe places, rough fields, rockie hills, or in marshy and boggy grounds, and against such as be quicke of foot, and do seeke others to tops of hills, or to bogs, and woods: then men of the like exercise, and hauing light armour, are to be allowed. And in the Irish wars this one thing is to be considered, that you do in euery thing loue your bowmen with your footmen and horsemen, that by them they may be defended from the enemy, whose nature and conditions are to run in and out, and with their darts are wont shewable to annoy their enemies, who by the bowmen are to be kept off. And moreover, that the hither part of the land lieng on the east side, or part of the Shenin which diuideth the three other parts from this, and this being the fourth part must be well fortified with castles and forts: but as for Connagh & Thomond, which lie in the further side of the Shenin, and all those parties (saining the citie of Limerike which must needs be recovered and kept in the English gouernement) must for a time be borne withall, and by little and little by fortifying of the frontiers in meet places be gotten and recovered, and so by little and little to grow in vpon them as occasion shall serue.

How the Irish people being vanquished, are to be gouerned.

Chap. 41.

If there be means and policies to be used in conquering this people, who are now more light in their bodies than inconstant in mind: so when they are vanquished, they must in an order be ruled and gouerned. First and principally therefore it is to be considered, that whosoever shall be gouernor over them, that he be wise, constant, discret, and a staid man; that in time of peace, and when they are contented to liue vnder law and in obedience, they maie be gouerned by law, directed by right, and ruled by iustice; as also to be stout and valiant, readie, and able with force seuerelie to punish all such as (contrarie to their dutie and allegiance) shall either rebell and breake out, or otherwise liue in disordered manner. Moreover, when anie haue done amisse, and contrarie to dutie haue rebelled, and do yet afterwards knowledge their folkie, and yelding themselves haue obtained pardon; that in no wise you do afterwards euill intreat them, neither yet laie their former faults to their charges, neither cast them in the teeth of their follies: but hauing taken such assurance of them as you maie, to intreat them with all courtesies and gentleness, that by such good means they maie the better be induced and incouraged to keepe themselves within their dutie, for loue of their good gouernement which they see: and yet be afraid to do euill for feare of punishment, which they are to receiue for their euill and lewd doings. And if they will not thus order and gouerne them, but confound their doings, being slacke to punish the euill, and quicke to oppresse the good and obedient, to flatter them in their rebellions and outrages, and to spoile them in peace; to fauor them in their treasons and treacheries, and to oppresse them when they liue in loyalte, as we haue seene manie so to haue done: surely these men so disorderedlie confounding all things, they in the end shall be confounded themselves. And because harms foresene do least annoy & hurt, let them which be wise looke well, that in time of peace they do prepare for the warres. For after the Alcion daies and calme seas do follow stormes and tempests: and therefore, when they haue vacant times and leisure, let them build and fortifie castles, cut downe and open the passes, and do all such other things as the nature of warres requireth to be preuented. For this people being vn certaine, craftie, and subtil, vnder colour of peace, are wont alwaies to be studying and deuising of mischiefes. And also because can it be god to be wise by another mans harme, warie by other mens examples. For nothing doth better teach a man than examples, and the paterns of things done afore time. Let not them forget what became of these worthy men, Miles of Cogan, Rafe Fitzstephans, Hugh de Lacie, Roger Poivre, and others, who when they thought of least danger they were in most perill: and when they thought themselves in most safetie, they were intraped and destroyed. For as we haue said in our Topographie; this people is a craftie and a subtle people, and more to be feared when it is peace, than when it is open warres: for their peace indeed is but enmitie, their policies but craft, their friendships but coloured, and therefore the more to be doubted and feared. And by experience the same in some part hath bene proued: and therefore, as Euodius saith, Let the fall and ruine of things past be forewarnings of things to come.

And because herein a man can not be too wise nor warie, it were god that an order were taken (as it is in Sicilia) that none of them should weare anie weapon at all, no not so much as a staffe in their hands to walke by. For euen with that weapon, though it be but slender, they will (if they can) take the advantage, and bewreake their malice and cankered stomachs. Finally, forsomuch as the kings of England haue a iust title, and a full right to the land of Ireland in sundrie and diuerse respects; and considering also that the same is chieflie maintained by the intercoure and traffike of merchandizes out of England; and without the same cannot releue and helpe it selfe; it were verie expedient that for the acknowledging of the one, and for the inioieng of the other, as also for the supporting of the continuall charges of the king of England there yeaerlie bestowed: that there be a yeaerlie tribute paid and answered vnto the kings of England, either in monie, or in such commodities as that land breedeth, aswell for the continuance of the title in memorie, as also for the auoiding of manie inconueniences. And because time weareth awaie, and men doe daile perishe and die, that this order for the perpetuall honour of the king and of his realme, and the memorie of this conquest, the same be ingrossed and registred in a publike instrument to indure for euer. And thus hauing spoken that we know, and witnessed that we haue seene, we doe here end this historie, leauing vnto others of better knowledge and learning, to continue the same as to them shall be thought most need-full and conuenient.

Thus farre Giraldus Cambrensis.

The processe of Irish affaires (beginning where Giraldus did end) vntill this present age, being a wit-nesse of sundrie things as yet fresh in memorie: which processe from henceforward is intituled the Chronicles of Ireland.

Leauing at the conquest of Ireland penned by Giraldus Cambrensis, we are now to proceed in that which followeth: wherein our authour (as he himselfe writeth) vsed such notes as were written by one Philip Flat-burie, out of a certeine namelesse author, from this place vnto the yeare 1370: and we hauing none other helpe besides (except onelie Henrie of Marleborow) do set downe that which we find in our oft mentioned authour, and in the same Marleborow in all the whole discourse that followeth, except in some cer-teine particular places, where we shew from whence we haue drawne that which we write as occasion serueth.

THE CHRONICLES of Ireland, &c.

A castle built at Derwath.

Hugh de Lacie (of whom such memorable mention is made heretofore) the rather to meet with such hurly burlies as were like to put the state of the Irish countrie in danger, if the same were not the sooner brought to quiet, erected and built a number of castles and forts in places convenientlie seated, well and sufficientlie garnished with men, munitions, and vittels, as one at Derwath, where diuerse of the Irish praied to be set on worke for wages. Lacie came fundrie times thither to further the worke, full glad to see them fall in byz with anie such exercise, wherein might they once begin to haue a delight, and tast the sweetnesse of a true mans life, he thought it no small token of reformation: for which cause he visited them the oftner, and merilie would command his gentlemen to glue the laborers example to take their toles in hand, and to worke a season, whilste the poore soules looking on might rest them. But this pastime grew to a tragicall end. For on a time, as each man was busilie occupied, some lading, some heaving, some plastering, some grauing, the generall also himselfe digging with a pickaxe: a desperat villaine among them, whose tole the noble man used, espieng both his hands occupied, and his bodie inclining downwards, still as he stroke watched when he so stopped, and with an axe cleft his head in sunder, little esteeming the torments that for this traitorous act ensued. This Lacie was reputed to be the conqueror of Meth, for that he was the first that brought it to anie due order of obedience vnto the English power. His bodie the two archbishops, John of Dublin, and Mattheu of Cashill buried in the monasterie of Beete, and his head in saint Thomas abbete at Dublin.

Hugh John Lacie his nephew Arthur.

By occasion of this murder committed on the person of Hugh Lacie, John Curcie, and Hugh Lacie the yonger, with their assistants, did straight execution vpon the rebels; and preventing euerie mischief per it fell, staied the realme from byzozes. Thus they knittng themselves together in friendship, continued in wealth and honor vntill the first yeare of king Johns reigne, who succeeding his brother king Richard, took his nephue Arthur, son to his brother Gessreie earle of Britaine, and dispatched him (some said) with his owne hands, because he knew what claime he made to the crowne, as descended of the elder brother. And therefore not onlie the French king, but also certeine lords of England and Ireland fauored his title: and when they understood that he was made awaie, they took it in maruelous euill part. And Curcie either of zeale to the truth, or parcialitie, abhorring such barbarous crueltye, whereof all mens eares were full, spake bloudie words against king John, which his lurking aduersaries (that laie ready to undermine him) caught by the end, and used the same as a meane to lift him out of credit: which they did not onlie bring to passe, but also procured a commission to attach his bodie, and to send him ouer into England. Earle Curcie mistrusting his part, and belike getting some inheling of their dyrt, kept himselfe aloofe, till Hugh Lacie lord iustice was faine to leuie an armie and to inuade Ulster, from whence he was oftentimes put backe: whereupon he proclaimed Curcie traitor, and hired fundrie gentlemen with promise of great recompense, to bring him in either quicke or dead. They fought once at Dolone, in which battell there died no small number on both parts; but Curcie got the vpper hand, and so was the lord iustice soiled at Curcies hands: but yet so long he continued in practising to haue him, that at length Curcies owne capitaine were inuethed to betraie their owne master: insomuch that vpon Good fridaie, whilste the earle out of his armour visited barefooted certeine religious houses for deuotion sake, they laid for him, took him as a rebell, & shipped him ouer into England the next waie, where he was adiudged to perpetual prison. One Seintleger addeth in his collections (as Champion saith) that Lacie paid the traitors their monie, and forthwith thereupon hanged them.

This Curcie translated the church and prebendaries of the trinitie in Dolone, to an abbete of blake monks brought thither from Chester, and caused the same to be consecrated vnto saint Patrike: for which alteration, taking the name from God to a creature; he deemed himselfe worthilie punished. Not long after (as saie the Irish) certeine French knights came to king Johns court, and one among them required the combat for triall of the right to the duchie of Normandie. It was not thought expedient to ieopard the title vpon one mans lucke, yet the chalenge they determined to answer. Some friend put them in mind of the earle imprisoned, a warriour of notable courage, and in pitch of bodie like a giant. King John demanded Curcie, whether he could be content to fight in his quarrell: Not for that said the erle, whose person I esteeme vnto this thy aduenture of my blood, but for the crowne & dignitie of the realme, in which manie a good man liueth against thy will, I shall be contented to hazard my life.

These words were not construed in the worst part, as proceeding from an offended mind of him that was therein esteemed more plaine than wise. Therefoze being chertished and much made of, he was sed so wonderfullie (now he came to so large allowance in diet after hard keeping) that the French challenger took him for a monster: and fearing to deale with him, prinitie stole awaie into Spaine. It is further reported, that the French king, being desirous to see Curcie, requested king John that he might come before them, and shew of what strength he was by striking a blow at an helmet. Whereupon forth he was brought, and presented before the kings, where was an helmet set upon a block. Curcie taking a sword in his hand, and with a sterne & frowning countenance cast upon the kings, gave such a stroke to the helmet, that cleaving it in sunder, the sword stuck so fast in the log, that no man there was able to plucke it forth, except Curcie himselfe. When he therfore had plucked forth the sword, the kings asked him what he meant to looke upon them with such a grim & froward countenance: for he gave the blow to the helmet? He answered, that if he had missed in his stroke, he would have killed all the whole companie, as well the kings as others. When was he released of bonds, and crossing the seas towards Ireland whither he was bound, was sixtē times beaten backe againe to the English shore, & going into France to change the coast died there. This Curcie was white of colour, mightie of lims, with large bones and strong of sinews, tall & broad in proportion of bodie, so as his strength was thought to exceed, of boldnesse incomparable, and a warrior even from his youth; the foremost in the front of euerie battell where he came, and ever ready to hazard himselfe in place of most danger, so forward in fight, that oftentimes forgetting the office of a capteine, he took in hand the part of a soldier, pressing forth with the foremost, so that with his ouer rash violence, and desire of victorie, he might seeme to put all in danger. But although he was thus hastic and hot in the field against his enemies, yet was he in conuersation modest and sober, and verie religious, hauing churchmen in great reuerence, ascribing all to the goodnesse of God; when he had achieved ante praise-worthie enterpryse, praising thanks to his diuine maiestie accordingly. But as seldome times ante one man is found perfect in all things, so these vertues were spotted with some vices; namely, too much nigardnesse in sparing, and inconstancie. He married the daughter of Godfrey king of Spain, and after manie combats and battels had against the Irish, he conquered (as before ye haue heard) the countie of Ulster, and building diuerse strong castles therein, he established the same under his quiet rule and gouernment, till he and Lacie fell out, as before is exprest.

After Curcies decaise, because he left no heires, the earledome of Ulster was giuen vnto Hugh Lacie in recompense of his good seruice. There was one of the Curcies remaining in Ireland that was lord of Kathermie and Kilbarroche, whome (as an esptall of all their practises and informer thereof to the king) Walter and Hugh the sons of Hugh Lacie sue, by reason whereof great trouble and disquietnesse ensued: those Lacies bearing themselves (now after the decaise of their father) for gouernors out of checke. To set the realme in quiet, king John was faine to passe thither himselfe in person with a maiue armie, banished the Lacies, subdued the residue of the countie yet not conquered, took pledges, punished malefactors, established the execution of English lawes, coined monie of like value current sterling in both realmes. The two Lacies repenting their misdeamear, fled into France disguised in poze apparell, and serued there in an abbey as gardeners, till the abbat by their countenance and behauior began to gesse their estates, and opposed them so farre that they disclosed what they were; beseeching the abbat to keepe their counsels, who commending their repentant humblenes, aduised them yet to make sute for their princes fauor, if it might be had, promising to do what he could in the matter, and so took vpon him to be a suter for them vnto the king that was his godceit and well acquainted with him. He trauelled so earnestlie herein, that at length he obtained their pardons: but yet they were fined, Walter at foure thousand, and Hugh at five and twentie hundred markes: and hereupon Walter was restored vnto the lordship of Meth, and Hugh to the earledome of Ulster.

King John appointed his lieutenants in Ireland, and returning home, subdued the Welshmen, and some after with Pandulfus the legat of pope Innocentius the third, who came to release him of the censure, wherein he stood excommunicat, to whom as to the popes legat he made a personall surrender of both realmes in waite of submission; and after he was once absolved, he receiued them againe. Some adde, that he gaue awaie his kingdome to the se of Rome for him and his successors, recognising to hold the same of the popes in fee, paying yearelie therefoze one thousand markes, as seauen hundred for England, and three hundred for Ireland. Blondus saith, Centum pro utroque auri marchias. Sir Thomas More (as Campion saith) a man both in calling & office likelie to sound the matter to the depth, writeth preciselie, that neither such writing the pope can shew, neither were it effectual if he could. How farre forth, and with what limitation a prince may or may not aduise his realme feodarie to another, John Maior a Scottish choncler, and a Sorbonist not vnlearned partlie scanneth, who thinketh three hundred markes for Ireland no verie hard penitworth. The instrument (as Campion thinketh) which our English writers rehearse, might happilie be motioned and drawn, and yet not confirmed with ante seale, nor ratified: but though the copie of this writing remaine in record, yet certeine it is, king Johns successors neuer paid it. After John Comin archbishop of Dublin, and founder of saint Patricks church succeeded Henrie Landozes in the see, who builded the kings castell there, being lord chiefe iustice of Ireland, him they nicknamed (as the Irish do commonly giue additions in respect of some fact or qualitie) Scozhuillein, that is, Burnebill, because he required to peruse the writings, of his tenants, colorable pretending to learne the kind of echmans seuerall tenure, and burne the same before their faces, causing them either to renew their takings, or to hold at will.

In the yeare one thousand two hundred and sixtē king John departed this life. In his daies diuerse monasteries were builded in Ireland, as beside those that before are mentioned) in the fourth yeare of his reigne the abbey of Dowlish was founded; in the first the abbey of Wetherham in the countie of Limerike, by Theobald le Butler lord of Carrackie, and in the twelue yeare Richard Dute builded the monasterie of Grenard. In the daies of Henrie the third that succeeded his father king John great warres were raised in Ireland betwixt Hugh Lacie & William Marshall, so that the countie of Meth was greuouslie afflicted. In the yeare of our Lord 1228, after the death of Landozes archbishop of Dublin, that was lord chiefe iustice, king Henrie the third vnderstanding the good seruice done by the Giraldines euer since their first coming into Ireland, although by wrong reports the same had bene to their prejudice for a time finisterlie misconstrued, so as the gentlemen had still bene kept backe, and not rewarded according to their deserts. The king now informed of the truth made Horice Fitzgerald the sonne of Horice aforesaid lord chiefe iustice of Ireland. Lucas succeeded Londres in the archbishops see, and was consecrated.

In the yeare one thousand two hundred and thirtie, Richard Sparshall was taken prisoner in battell at Kildare. Some write that he was wounded there, and within few daies after died of the hurt at Kilkennie, and was buried there in the quere of the church of the friars preachers, nere to the place where his brother William was interred, who departed this life in the yeare one thousand two hundred thirtie and one.

In the yeare one thousand two hundred fortie and one, Walter Lacie lord of Meth departed this life in England: he left two daughters behind him that were his heires, Margaret married to the lord Weldon, and Matilda the wife of Geffrie Genuill. King Henrie in the fir & thirtieth yeare of his reigne, gaue to Edward his eldest sonne, Gascoigne, Ireland, and the countie of Chester. In the yeare following, Hugh Lacie earle of Ulster departed this life, and was buried at Cragfergus, in the church of the friars minors, leaving a daughter behind him, that was his heire, whome Walter de Burgh or Bourke married, and in right of hir was created earle of Ulster, as after shall appeare. Horice Fitzgerald lord iustice of Ireland, being requested by this prince to come and assist him with a power of men against the Welsh rebels, left a sufficient garrison of men in the castell of Schligath, which he had latelie builded, and then came ouer with Helin Ochoher, and a lustie band of souldiers: & meeting the prince at Chepstow, behaued themselves so valiantlie, that returning with victorie, they greatlie increased the fauor of the king and prince towards them; and vpon their returne into Ireland, they joined with Cormacke Mac Dermot Mac Roie, and made a notable victory against Odonill the Irish enimie, that when Lacie was once dead, inuaded & sore annoyed the kings subiects of Ulster. Odonill being vanquished, the lord iustice forced pledges and tribute of O'neale to keepe the kings peace, and diuerse other exploits praise-worthie did he, during the time of his gouernment, as Flatsburie hath gathered in his notes for the lord Girald Fitzgerald earle of Kildare, in the yeare one thousand siue hundred and seuentene. After Horice Fitzgerald succeeded in office of lord iustice, John Fitzgeffrie knight, and after him Alaine de la Zouch, whome the earle of Surrie Fitzwarren died. And after de la Zouch, in the yeare one thousand two hundred fiftie and eight, being the two and fortieth of Henrie the third his reigne, was Stephan de long Espée sent to supplie that come, who due neale with three hundred fiftie & two of his men in the streets of Downe, and shortly after departed this life; then William Dene was made lord iustice, and Greene castell was destroyed. Also Mac Carcie plaid the diuell in Desmond.

In the yeare one thousand two hundred sixtie and one, sir William Dene lord iustice of Ireland deceased, and sir Richard Rochell (or Capell as some copies haue) was sent to be lord iustice after him, who greatlie enuied the familie of the Giraldins; during his gouernement the lord John Fitzthomas and the lord Horice his son were slaine. In the yeare one thousand two hundred sixtie and foure, Walter de Burgh was made earle of Ulster, and Horice Fitzmoice took the lord iustice of Ireland together with Theobald Butler, Miles Cogan, and diuerse other great lords at Trillickdermot, on saint Nicholas daie. And so was Ireland full of warres, betwixt the Burghs and Giraldins. In the yeare one thousand two hundred sixtie and six, there chanced an earthquake in Ireland. In the yeare following, king Henrie tooke by the variance that was in Ireland betwixt the parties, and discharging Wene, appointed David Barrie lord iustice in his place, who tamed the insolent dealings of Horice Fitzmoice, couline germane to Fitzgerald.

In the yeare one thousand two hundred sixtie and eight, Conhur O'Brien was slaine by Dermot Mac Mogonard, and Horice Fitzgerald earle of Desmond was drowned in the sea, betwixt Wales & Ireland.
And Robert Wofford was sent ouer to remaine lord iustice of Ireland, and Barrie was discharged, who continued till the yeare one thousand two hundred sixtie and nine, and then was Richard de Creffer made lord iustice. And in the yeare following, was the lord James Audleie made lord iustice. Richard Weldon, and John Weldon were slaine, and Fulke archbishop of Dublin deceased. Also the castles of Ablecke, Roscoman, & Scheligagh, were destroyed.
The same yeare was a great dearth and mortalitie in Ireland. In the yeare one thousand two hundred seuentie & two, the lord James Audleie was slaine by a fall from his horse in Thomond, and then was Horice Fitzmoice made lord iustice of Ireland, and the castell of Kandon was destroyed. In the yeare one thousand two hundred seuentie and two, king Henrie the third departed this life, and the lord Walter Genuill latelie returned home from his tour-nie into the holie land, was sent into Ireland, and made lord iustice there. In the yeare one thousand two hundred seuentie and siue, the castell of Rosco-man was estones repared and fortified.

In the yeare one thousand two hundred seuentie and six, there was an ouerthrow giuen at Glenburie, where William Fitzroger, prior of the knights hospitalers, & many other with him, were taken prisoners, and a great number of other were slaine.
The same yeare, John de Weldon departed this world, and Thomas de Clare married the daughter of Ho-rice Fitzmoice. In the yeare following, Robert Wofford was appointed to supplie the come of Genuill, being called home, and so was this Wofford the second time ordeined lord iustice of Ireland. He hauing occasion to passe into England, made his substitute Fulborne bishop of Waterford till his returne, and then resumed the gouernement into his owne hands again. In the yeare one thousand two hundred seuen-tie and seauen, Thomas de Clare slue Dermot king of Molethmond: and yet after this the Irish closed him by in Slewbani, together with Maurice Fitzmaurice, so that they gaue hostages to escape, and the castell of Roscoman was twone. In the yeare next ensuing, was John de Werlington consecrated archbishop of Dublin. There was also a counsell holden at Grenoke, and Mac Dermot slue Cathur Donchir king of Connagh. In the yeare one thousand two hundred seuentie and nine, Robert Wofford vpon occasion of busines came ouer into England, and left sir Fulborne bishop of Waterford to supplie his come, and Rafe Bishard and Dhaulan chased O'neale in a battell.

In the yeare one thousand two hundred and foure score, Robert Wofford came the third time to occupie the come of lord chiefe iustice in Ireland, resuming that come into his hands againe. In the yeare following, the bishop of Waterford was established by the king of England lord iustice of Ireland. Adam Cusacke the younger slue William Barret, and manie other in Connagh. And in the next yeare, to wit, one thousand two hundred foure score and two, Henrique slue Murtagh, & his brother Art Mac Murtagh at at Athlon. Also the lord James de Birmingham, and Piers de Lute departed this life. Also the archbishop of Durlington deceased. And about the same time the cite of Dublin was defaced by fire, and the people of Myss church bitterlie distressed. The citizens before they went about to repaire their stone priuat buildings, agreed together to make a collective for reparing the ruines of that ancient building first begun by the Danes, and continued by Cetrus prince of Dublin at the instance of Donat sometime bishop of that cite, and dedicated to the blessed trinitie.

At length Strangbow earle of Penbrooke, Fitzstephans, Laurence, that for his vertue was called saint Laurence archbishop of Dublin, and his four successors, John of Cuesham, Henrie Scortchbill, and Lucas, and last of all John de saint Paule finished it. This notable building, since the time that it was thus defaced by fire, hath bene beautified in diverse sorts by many zealous citizens. Strangbowes tome defaced, by the fall of the rofe of the church, sir Henrie Stonele, when he was lord deputie, restored; & likewise bjd cost upon the earle of Kildares chapel for an ornament to the quier, over the which he left also a monument of capteine Kandalfe, late coronell of the English bands of footmen in Ulster that died there valiantlie, fighting in his princes service, as after shall appeare. In the yeare one thousand two hundred four score and thre, Edmund chancelor of Ireland, and Richard Lute departed this life, and friser Stephan Fulborne was made lord iustice of Ireland.

In the yeare 1285, the lord Theobald Butler fled from Dublin, and died shortly after, and the lord Theobald Vernon lost his men and horses as he went towards Offalie, & the next day Gerald Fitzmaurice was taken, and John Samford was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. Pozeouer at Rathob, the lord Cestrete Genuill fled, and sir Gerard Doget, and Kate Petit were slaine, with a great number of others. The Porwagh and Ardscoll with other townes and villages were burnt by Philip Stanton the sixteenth daie of Nouember, in the yeare 1286. Also Calwagh was taken at Kildare. In the yeare 1287, diuerse nobles in Ireland deceased, as Richard Deceter, Gerald Fitzmaurice, Thomas de Clare, Richard Caffie, & Nicholas Teling knights. The yeare next ensuing, deceased friser Fulborne lord iustice of Ireland, and John Samford archbishop of Dublin was aduanced to the roome of lord iustice. Also Richard Burgh earle of Ulster besieged Theobald Vernon in the castell of Athlon, and came with a great power vnto Trim, by the working of Walter Lacie.

In the yeare 1290, was the chafe or discomfiture of Offalie, & diuerse Englishmen slaine. Also Pac Coghlán king of Connaught was discomfited at Deluin by William de Basingfeld lord iustice of Ireland, and entered into that office on S. Martins daie. Vnto this iustice, Edward Balioll king of Scotland did homage for an earldome which he held in Ireland, in like manner as he did to king Edward for the crowne of Scotland. In the yeare 1292, a fifteenth was granted to the king, of all the temporall goods in Ireland, whilst Clesie was as yet lord iustice. This Clesie was a ferre man and full of courage. he called John earle of Kildare before him, charging him with foule riots and misdeemeanors, for that he ranged abroad, and sought reuenge vpon priuat displeasures out of all order, and not for any aduancement of the publicke wealth or seruice of his soveraigne.

The earle as impatient to heare himselfe touched as the iustice to suffer euill doing, answered thus. By your honors and mine (my lord) and by king Edwards hand (for that was accompted no small oth in those daies among the Irish) per would if you durst approach me in plainte for treason or felonie: for where I haue the title, and you the place of it, dare, I wote well how great an eieboze I am in your sight, so that if I might do handfome, I trusted by for a fellow, then might I challenge your sonne by come a gentleman. A gentleman quoth the iustice, thou proud earle: I tell the, the Clesies were gentlemen before Kildare was an earle-dame: and before that Clesie bankrupt thy doctine fettered his nest in Leinster. But seeing thou varest me, I will surely breake thy heart. And therewith he called the earle a noxious thiefe and a mischiefier. Then followed facing and bracing among the soldiers, with high words, and terrible swearing on both sides, vntill either part appeased his owne.

The lord iustice shortly after, leaving his deputie William Haie, toke the sea, and hastened ouer to the king. The earle immediatly followed, and as he would as the lord iustice accused him of felonie, Kildare no lesse appealed him of treason. For trill hereof, the earle asked the combat, and Clesie refused not: but yet when the lists were provided, Clesie was slippt auaite into France, and so discredited of all his lands in the countie of Kildare, which were bestowed vpon the earle and his heires for ever. The earle swaring losse of mind in such prosperous success, squared with diuerse nobles, English and Irish of that land. The same yeare died John Samford archbishop of Dublin, and John Fitzthomas earle of Kildare, and John de la Spere toke prisoners, Richard Burgh earle of Ulster, and William Burgh within the countie of Meth, and the castell of Kildare was taken, and all the countie wasted by the English on the one side, and the Irish on the other, and Calwagh burnt all the rolles and tallies concerning the records & accompts of that countie. Great deareth and death reigned in Ireland this yeare, and the two yeeres next ensuing. The earle of Kildare detained the earle of Ulster prisoner, vntill by authority of a parlement holden at Bilkennie, he was delivered out of the castell of Leie, for his two somes, and for the inuasion which the earle of Kildare had made into Meth, and other his baronie and misordered parts, was disseized of the castell of Sligagh, and of all his lands in Connagh.

William Dodingfelds, being this yeare made lord iustice of Ireland, after Clesie died, in the yeare next following, that is 1295, and the thre and twentieth of king Edward the first. After him succeeded in that roome the lord Thomas Fitzmaurice. In the yeare 1296, friser William de Bothum was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. In the yeare 1298, and six and twentieth of Edward the first, the lord Thomas Fitzmaurice departed this life, and an agreement was made betwixt the earle of Ulster and the lord John Fitzthomas earle of Kildare, by John Wogan that was ordeined lord iustice of Ireland. In the yeare 1299 William archbishop of Dublin departed this life, and Richard de Fringie was consecrated archbishop in his place. The king went vnto John Wogan lord iustice, commanding him to giue summons vnto the nobles of Ireland, to prepare themselves with horse and armor to come in their best arraie for the warre, to serue him against the Scots: and withall wrote vnto the same nobles, as to Richard de Burgh earle of Ulster, Cestrete de Genuill, John Fitzthomas, Thomas Fitzmaurice, Theobald lord Butler, Theobald lord Vernon, Piers lord Birmingham of Chetemoie, Constance lord Poize, Hugh lord Purcell, John de Cogan, John de Barrie, William de Barrie, Walter de Launce, Richard de Excester, John Wipurd, Walter Lonsant, John of Oxford, Adam de Stanton, Simon de Wether, William Cadell, John de Male, Maurice de Carre, George de la Roch, Maurice de Rochford, and Maurice Fitzthomas de Kerto, commanding them to be with him at Wiltwelaun the first of March. Such a precept I remember I have read, registered in a close roll among the records of the tower. But where Marlburrow saith, that the said John Wogan lord justice of Ireland, and the lord John Fitzthomas, with manie others, came to king Edward into Scotland, in the nine and twentieth yeare of king Edwards reigne, Campion noteth it to be in the yere 1299, which fell in the seven & twentieth of the reigne of king Edward, & if my remembrance faile me not, the close roll aforesaid beareth date of the four and twentieth yeare of king Edwards reigne. All which notes may be true, for it is verie like, that in those warres against the Scots, the king sent diuerse times to the Irish lords to come to serue him, as it behoued them to do by their tenures: and not onelie he sent into Ireland to haue the seruices of men, but also for prouision of vittells, as in close rolles I remember I haue also sene recorded of the seauen and twentieth and thirtieth yeare of the said king Edward the first his reigne. For this we find in a certeine abstract of the Irish chronicles, which shuld seme to be collected out of Flatburie, whom Campion so much followed, that in the yeare 1301, the lord John Wogan lord justice, John Fitzthomas, Peter Birmingham, & diuerse others went into Scotland in aid of king Edward, in which yeare also a great part of the citie of Dublin, with the church of saint Werburgh was burnt in the night of the feast daie of saint Coline. Also the lord Genuill married the daughter of John de Pontfort, and the lord John Woxtmer married the daughter and heire of Peter Genuill, also the lord Theobald de Werdon married the daughter of the lord Roger Woxtmer. The same yeare in the winter season, the Irish of Leinster raised warre against the towncs of Wicklow and Rathdon, doing much hurt by burning in the countrie all about: but they were chastised for their wickednesse, losing the most part of their prouision and cattell. And in the Lent season the more part of them had bene bitterlie destroyed, if discord and variance had not risen among the Englishmen, to the impeachment of their purposed enterprises.

In hartest there were three hundred thienes slaine by the Helanes. Also Walter le Poluer wasted a great part of Mounster, burning manie farmes and places in that countrie. In the yeare 1302, pope Boniface demanded a tenth of all the spirituall liuings in England and Ireland, for the space of three yeares, to mainteine wars in defense of the church of Rome, against the king of Arragon. In the yeare 1303, the earle of Ulster, and Richard Burgh, and sir Cusface le Poluer, with a puissant armie entered Scotland. The earle made three and thirtie knights at Dublin, before he set forwarde. The same yere Gerald, sonne and heire to the lord John Fitzthomas departed this life, and likewise the countesse of Ulster. William de Wellislete, and sir Robert de Persuall were slaine the two and twentieth of October. In the yeare 1304, a great part of the citie of Dublin was burnt by casuall fire. In the yeare next ensuing, Jordaine Comin with his complices slue Paritagh Mconhur king of Ossalie, and his brother Calwagh, with diuerse others within the court of Piers de Birmingham at Carricke in Carbie. Also sir Gilbert Sutton steward of Wexford was slaine by the Irishmen, nere to the same of Desmond de Grace, which Desmond bare himselfe right valiantlie in that fight, and in the end through his great manhood escaped.

In the yeare 1306 a great slaughter was made in Ossalie nere to the castell of Geshill, the thirtenth daie of Aprill upon Mconhur and his friends by the Dempsies, in the which place were slaine a great number of men. Also Mzen king of Thomond was slaine. Moreover, Donald Oge Mac Arthie slue Donald Kasse king of Desmond. And upon the twelue of Maie in the confines of Meth, a great onerthow chanced to the side of the lord Piers Butler, and Ballimore in Leinster was burnt by the Irish, where Henrie Cesse was slaine at that present time. Hereof followed great wars betwixt the English and Irish in Leinster, so that a great armie was called together forth of diuerse parts of Ireland, to restraine the malice of the Irish in Leinster, in which iournie sir Thomas Pandeuill knight entred into a condict with the Irish nere to Glenfell, in the which he bare himselfe right manfullie, till his horse was slaine under him, and yet then to his great praise and high commendation he saued both himselfe and manie of his companie. The lord chancellor of Ireland, Thomas Caucocke, was consecrated bishop of Imaleie within the Trinitie church at Dublin, and kept such a feast as the like had not lightlie bene sene nor heard of before that time in Ireland, first to the rich & after to the poore. Richard Flerings archbishop of Dublin deceased on the euen of saint Luke the euangelist, to whom succeeded Richard de Hauerings, who after he had continued in that see about a fure yeares, resigned it ouer by dispensation obtained from Rome, and then his nephew John Leech was admitted archbishop there.

In the yeare 1307 the first of Aprill, Murcod Ballagh was beheaded nere to Merton by sir David Caunton knight, and shortly after was Adam Daune slaine. Also, a great discomfiture and slaughter fell upon the Englishmen in Connagh by the Oscheles the first daie of Maie, and the robbers that dwelt in the parties of Ossalie raised the castell of Geshill, and in the bigill of the translation of Thomas Becket, being the first of Julie, they burnt the towne of Leie and besieged the castell: but they were constrained to depart from thence shortly after, by John Fitzthomas and Edmund Butler that came to remoue that siege. In the yeare 1308 king Edward the first departed this life the seventh of Julie.

Edward the second.

Richard archbishop of Dublin, after that he had governed that see the space of fure yeares, by reason of a vision that he saw in his sleepe, feeling himselfe troubled in conscience, with consideration of that dreame, resigned the next morrow all his title to the archbishops dignitie (as before ye haue heard) and contented himselfe with other ecclesiasticall benefices as seemed conuenient to his estate. This yeare by vertue of letters directed from the pope to the king of England, he caused all the Templers as well in England as Ireland to be apprehended, and committed to safe keeping. The profession of these Templers began at Jerusalem, by certeine gentlemen that remained in an hostell nere to the temple, who till the counsell of Trois in France were not increased aboue the number of nine, but from that time forth in little more than fiftie yeares, by the zealous contribution of all chrisman realmes, they had houses erected euerie where, with liuings bountifullie assigned to the same for their maintenance, in so much as they were augmented vnto the number of three hundred, that were knights of that order, beside inferior brethren innumerable: but now with wealth they so forgot themselves, that they nothing lesse regarded, than the purpose of their foundation: and withall being accused of horrible heresies (whether in all things iustlie or otherwise, the Lord knoweth) they were in the council at Lions in France condemned, and their liuings transferred to the knights Hospitallers, otherwise called the knights of the Rhodes, and now of Malta. The manner of their apprehension and committing was sudden, and so generall in all places upon one daie, that they had no time to shift for themselves.

For first, the king sent forth a precept to euerie shiriffe within the realme of England, commanding them within each of their roomes to cause a prescribed number of knights, or rather such men of credit, on whose fidelities he might assure himselfe to assemble at a certeine towne named in the same writ, the sundefaie next after the Epiphanie, & that eue of the same shiriffes failed not to be there the same daie, to execute all that should be intained them by any other writ, then and there to be deliuered. The shiriffe of Poike was commanded to giue summons to foure and twentie such knights, or other sufficient men to meet him at Poike. The shiriffe of Dorset folke and Suffolke, to summon twentie to meet him at Wykeford. The other shiriffs were appointed to call to them some ten, some twelue, or some fourtene, to meet them at such townes as in their writs were named. The date of this writ was from Westminster the fifteenth of December, in the first yeare of this king Edward the secondes reigne. The other writ was sent by a chapleine authorized both to deliuer the same writ, and to take an oth of the shiriffe, that he should not disclose the contents, till he had put the same in execution, which was to attach by assistance of those aforementioned knights, or as manie of them as he thought expedient to vse, all the Templers within the precinct of his roome, and to seize all their lands, goods, and cattels into the kings hands, and to cause an inuentarie of the same intainted be made in presence of the warden of the place, whether he were knight of the order or any other, and in the presence of other honest men neighbours thereabouts, keeping the one counterpane with himselfe, sealed with his seale that made the seizure, and leaving the other in the hands of the said warden: and further to see the same goods and cattels to be put in safe keeping, and to prouide that the quicke goods might be well kept and looked vnto, and the grounds manured to the most profit, and to cause the bodies of the Templers attached, to be so deteined in all safetie, as that they be not yet committed to irons nor to streit prison, but to remaine in some conuenient place other than their owne houses, and to be found of the goods so seized accordinglie as falleth for their estates, till he haue otherwise in commandement from the king: and what is done herein, to certifie into the archeher the morrow after the purification. The date of this second writ was from Willel the twentieth of December. There was likewise a writ directed to John Wogan lord iustice of Ireland, signifieng vnto him what should be done in England, touching the apprehension of the Templers, and seizure of their lands and goods, commanding him to proceed in semblable manner against them in Ireland: but the date and place when the shiriffes should there assemble, was left to the discretion of the said iustice and treasuro of the archeher there, but so as the same might be done before any rumour of this thing could be brought ouer out of England thither. Also a like commandement was sent vnto John de Britaine earle of Richmond, lord warden of Scotland, and to Custace Cotesbach chamberleine of Scotland, also to Walter de Pederton lord iustice of west Wales, to Hugh Aldighleigh alias Auderleie lord iustice of north Wales, and to Robert Holland lord iustice of Chester. Thus much for the Templers. Now now to other doings in Ireland.

In the yeare 1308, the twelke of Aprill deceased Peter de Werningham a noble warrior, and one that had bene no small scourge to the Irish. The eleuenth of Maie the castell of Kinnun was burnt, and diuers of them that had it in keeping were slaine. by William Macbalthar, and other of the Irish, and likewise the towne of Courconle was burnt by the same malefactors. And the first of June, John lord Wogan lord iustice was discomfited nere to Glindelozie, where John de St. Hogelin, John Porton, John Breton, and manie other were slaine. The firste of June, Dunloun, Tobie, and manie other townes were burnt by the Irish rebels. About this season, John Decer maior of Dublin builded the high pipe there, & the bidge ouer the Liffie towards St. Wilsons, and a chappell of our ladie at the friers minors, where he was buried, repaired the church of the friers preachers, and euerie fridaie tabled the friers at his owne costs.

John Wogan hauing occasion to passe into England, William Burgh did supplie his roome, vnto whom king Edward recommended Piers de Caueson, when (contrarie to the kings mind) he was banished by the lords of England, and about the natistie of our ladie he came ouer into Ireland, being sent thither by the king with manie iewels: and beside the letters which he brought of recommendation from the king, he had assigned to him the comodities rofall of that realme, which bred some trouble and bickerings there, betwixt Richard Burgh earle of Ulster, and the said Caueson, who notwithstanding bought the good willes of the souldiers with his liberalitie, slue Dermot Odeмпsie, subdued Obren, edified sundrie castels, cauesies, and bidges, but the next yeare he was renoked home by the king, as in the historie of England it maie appeare.

In the bigill of Simon and Jude, the lord Roger Sportimer landed in Ireland with his wife, right heire to the seignorie of Meth, as daughter to Piers Genuill, that was sonne to the lord Gessreie Genuill, which Gessreie became a frier at Trim of the order of the preachers: by reason whereof, the lord Sportimer and his wife entered into possession of the lands of Meth. In the yeare 1309, on Candlemas day, the lord John Bonneuill was slaine nere to the towne of Ardscoil, by the lord Arnold Powze and his complices, his bodie was buried at Athie in the church of the friers preachers. In the yere following, at a parlement holden at Kildare, the lord Arnold Powze was acquit of that slaughter, for that it was proued it was done in his owne defense. In the yeare 1311, or (as some booke haue) the yeare 1309, Wogan lord iustice summoned a parlement at Kilkennie, where diuerse whole some lawes were ordeined, but neuer executed. There fell the bishops in contention about their iurisdicions, namelie the bishop of Dublin forbad the primat of Armagh to raise his croiser within the prouince of Leinster.

Shortlie after, Rowland Joyce the primat stale by night (in his pontificals) from Howth to the priozie of Grace Dieu, where the bishops seruants met him, & with force chased him out of the diocese. This bishop was named John a Leakes, and was consecrated not long before he kept this floure. Richard earle of Ulster with a great armie came to Bonrath in Thomond, whereas sir Robert or rather sir Richard de Clare discomfited his power, took sir William de Burgh prisoner, or (as some booke have) the earle himselfe. John Lacie the sonne of Walter Lacie, and diuerse others were slaine. The twelue of November this yere, Richard de Clare slue sir hundred Galloglasses, and John Pogoghedan was slaine by Omolmote. Also Donat Obzen was murdered by his owne men in Thomond.

The one and twentieth of Februarie began a riot in Argile by Robert Werdon, for the appealing wherof an armie was lead thither by John Wogan lord chiefe justice in the beginning of Iulie, but the same was discomfited, and diuerse men of account slaine, as sir Nicholas Auerell, Patrike de Koch, & others. At length yet the said sir Robert Werdon, and many of his complices came and submitted themselves to prison within the castell of Dublin, abiding there the kings mercie. The lord Edmund Butler was made deputie justice vnder the lord John Wogan, who in the Lent next ensuing besieged the Obzens in Glindelow, and compelled them to yield themselves to the kings peace. Also in the yere abovesaid 1312, Paurence Fitzthomas married the ladie Katharine, daughter to the earle of Ulster at Grane castell, and Thomas Fitzjohn married an other of the said earles daughters in the same place, but not on the same daie: for the first of those two mariages was celebrated the morrow after saint Dominikes daie, and this second marriage was kept the morrow after the feast of the assumption of our ladie. Also Robert de Bruce ouerthrew the castell of Span, and took the lord Donegan Dohwill on saint Barnabies daie.

In the yere 1313, John a Leekes archbishop of Dublin departed this life: after whose decease were elected in schisme and diuision of sides two successors, Walter Thomeburie lord chancellor, and Alexander Bigno: treasurer of Ireland. The chancellor to strengthen his election, hastie went to sea, and together with an hundred and fiftie and six persons perished by shipwracke. The other submitting his cause to the pprocess of law, taried at home and sped. Moreover, the lord John de Burgh, sonne and heire to the earle of Ulster, deceased at Galbie on the feast daie of saint Marcell & Marcelline. Also the lord Edmund Butler created thirtie knights in the castle of Dublin on saint Michaels daie being fundaie. The knights hospitallers or of saint Johns (as they were called) were inuested in the lands of the Templers in Ireland. The same yere was the lord Theobald Werdon sent lord justice into Ireland.

In the ninth yere of king Edwards reigne, Edward Bruce, brother to Robert Bruce king of Scots, entered the north part of Ireland with six thousand men. There were with him diuerse captains of high renoume among the Scottish nation, of whome the chiefe were these: the earles of Purrie and Pentith, the lord John Steward, the lord John Campbell, the lord Thomas Randolph, Fergus de Andressan, John Wood, and John Bisset. They landed nere to Cragfergus in Ulster the five & twentieth of Maie, and joining with the Irish, conquered the earldome of Ulster, and gaue the English there diuerse great ouerthrowes, took the towne of Dundalk, spoiled & burnt it, with a great part of Argile: they burnt churches & abbeies, with the people whom they found in the same, sparing neither man, woman nor child. Then was the lord Edmund Butler chosen lord justice, who made the earle of Ulster and the Geraldines friends, and reconciled himselfe with sir John Pandeuill, thus seeking to preserve the residue of the realme which Edward Bruce meant wholte to conquer, hauing caused himselfe to be crowned king of Ireland. The lord justice assembled a great power out of Pounster, and Leinster, and other parts therabouts, and the earle of Ulster with another armie came vnto him nere vnto Dundalk, where they consulted together how to deale in defending the countrie against the enemies: but hearing the Scots were withdrawne backe, the earle of Ulster folowed them, and fighting with them at Coiners, hee lost the field.

There were manie slaine on both parts, and William de Burgh the earls brother, sir John Pandeuill, and sir Alane Fitzalane were taken prisoners. Herewith the Irish of Connagh and Meth began forthwith to rebell against the Englishmen, and burnt the castell of Athlon and Kandon. And the Bruce coming forward burnt Kenlis in Meth, and Cranard, also Finnagh, and Newcastell, and kept his Christmas at Loughsodie. From thence he went through the countrie vnto Kachimegan and Kilbare, and to the parties about Trilfeldermot and Athie, then to Kaban Sketlier and nere to Ardskoll in Leinster: where the lord justice Butler, the lord John Fitzthomas, the lord Arnold Potore, and other the lords and gentlemen of Leinster and Pounster came to encounter the Bruce: but through discord that rose among them, they left the field vnto the enemies, sir William Pendergast knight, and Desmond le Grace a right valiant esquier were slaine there. And on the Scottish side sir Fergus Andressan and sir Walter Murrie, with diuerse other that were buried in the church of the fraters preachers at Athie.

After this the Bruce in his returne towards Meth burnt the castell of Leie, and so passed forth till he came to Kenlis in Meth. In which meane time Roger lord Mortimer, trusting to win himselfe fame if he might ouerthrow the enemies, called forth sixtene thousand men, and understanding that the Scots were come to Kenlis, made thitherwards, and there encountering with them, was put to the worse, his men (as was supposed) wilfullie thinking from him, as those that bare him hollow hearts. With the newes of this ouerthrow, vppstart the Irish of Pounster, the Dolles, Obzens, Amozes, and with fire and sword wasted all from Arclow to Leie. With them coped the lord justice, and made of them a great slaughter, fourescore of their heads were sent to the castell of Dublin.

In time of these troubles and warres in Ireland by the inuasion thus of the Scots, certeine Irish lords, faithfull men and true subjects to the king of England, did not onelie promise to continue in their loiall obedience towards him, being their soveraigne prince; but also for more assurance deliuered hostages to be kept within the castell of Dublin. The names of which lords that were so contented to assure their allegiance were these, John Fitzthomas lord of Dikalie, Richard de Clare, Maurice Fitzthomas, Thomas Fitzjohn le Polwer baron of Donoille, Arnold le Power, Maurice de Rochford, Wauld de la Koch, and Miles de la Koch. These and diuerse other resisted with all their might and maine the iniurious attempts of the Scots, although the Scots had drawne to their side the most part of the wild Irish, and no small number also of the English Irish, as well lords, as others of meaner calling: so that the countrie was miserable afflicted, what by the Scots on the one part, and the Irish rebels on the other, which rebels notwithstanding were ouerthrowne in diuerse particular confusions. But yet to the further scattering of the English forces in Ireland, there rose foure princes of Connagh, but the Burghes Burghes and Birminghams discomfited them, and slue cleuen thousand of them beside Athenrie. Amongst other were slaine in this battell Fedelmicus, Deonbur king of Connagh, Dkellie, and diuerse other great lords and capteins of Connagh and Deth. The lord Richard Birmingham had an esquier that belonged to him called John Husseie, who by the commandement of his maister went forth to take bieu of the dead bodies, and to bring him word whether Dkellie his mortall fo were slaine among the residue. Husseie comming into the field with one man to turne by and surueie the dead carcases, was streight espied by Dkellie, that late lurking in a brake bush thereby, who hauing had good proue of Husseie his valiance before that time, longed sore to traine him from his captiue; and presuming now vpon his good oportunitie, discovered himselfe, not doubting, but either to win him with courteous persuasions, or by force to worke his will of him, and so comming to him said: Husseie, thou seest that I am at all points armed, & haue mante esquire here likewise furnished with armour & weapon readie at mine elbow; thou art naked with thy page, a yongling, & not to be accounted of: so that if I loued thee not, and meant to spare thee for thine owne sake, I might now doe with thee what I would, and flea thee for thy maisters sake. But come & serue me vpon this request here made to thee, and I promise thee by saint Patrikes staffe to make thee a lord in Connagh, of more possessions than thy maister hath in Ireland. When these words might nothing moue him, his owne man (a great stout labber) began to reprove him of follie, for not consenting to so large an offer, which was assured with an oth, whereupon he durst gage his soule for performance.

Now had Husseie three enemies, and first therefore turning to his knaue, he dispatched him. Next he raught vnto Dkellies esquier such a knocke vnder the pit of the eare, that downe he came to the ground and there he laie. Whirle, he laid so about him, that yer ante helpe could be looked for. he had also slaine Dkellie, and perceiving the esquire to be but assonied he recouered him, and holpe him vp againe, and after he was somewhat come to himselfe, he forced him vpon a truncheon, to beare his lords head in to the high towne before him, who did so; and Husseie presented it to Birmingham, who after the circumstances declared, he dubbed Husseie knight, aduancing him to manie preferments. The successors of that familie afterwards were barons of Galtrim. Sir Thomas Handeuill and others in this meane while made oftentimes enterprizes against the Scots, and slue diuerse of them in sundrie conflicts. But howsoeuer it chanced, we find recorded by Henrie Marleburgh, that either the said sir Thomas Handeuill (that thus valiantlie behaued himselfe against the Scots) or some other bearing the same name, and his brother also called John Handeuill were both slaine shortly after at Downe, vpon their comming forth of England, by the Scots that were readie there to assaile them.

Thus may we see, that those lords and knights, which had giuen pledges for their loialtie to the king of England, fought by all waies and means how to beat backe the enemies: which they might haue done with more ease, if the Irish had not assisted the Scots, and presuming of their aid, rebelled in sundrie parts of the countrie; who neuertheless were oftentimes well chastised for their disloiall dealings, as partly we haue touched; although we omit diuerse small ouerthrowes and other particular matters, sith otherwise we should increase this booke further than our first purposed intent would permit.

Whilest the Scots were thus holden by in Ireland, that they could not in all things worke their wils, Robert le Buse king of Scots came ouer himselfe, landed at Cragfergus to the aid of his brother, whose souldiours most wickedlie entred into churches, spoiling and defacing the same of all such tomes, monuments, plate, copes, & other ornaments which they found, and might laie hands vpon.

The castell of Cragfergus, after it had bene straitlie besieged a long time, was surrendered to the Scots, by them that had kept it, till they for want of other vittels were driuen to eate leather, and eight Scots (as some write) which they had taken prisoners. The lord Thomas, sonne to the earle of Ulster departed this life. And on the sundaie next after the natiuitie of our ladie, the lord John Fitzthomas deceased at Laragh Wyne nere to Spatinoth, and was buried at Kildare, in the church of the friers preachers. This John Fitzthomas, a little before his death, was created earle of Kildare; after whome succeeded his sonne Thomas Fitzjohn a right wise and prudent personage. The fourteenth of September, Conhor Mac Kiele, & slue hundred Irishmen were slaine by the lord William de Burgh, and lord Richard Birmingham in Connagh. Also on the mondaie after the feast of All saints, John Loggan and sir Hugh Bisset slue a great number of Scots, among the which were one hundred with double armors, and two hundred with single armors: so that of their men of armes there died three hundred beside footemen.

The fifteenth of Nouember chanced a great tempest of wind and raine, which threw downe manie houses, with the steeple of the Trinitie church in Dublin, and did much other hurt both by land and water. On the first of December, sir Alane Sterward that had bene taken prisoner in Ulster by John Loggan, and sir John Sandale, was brought to the castell of Dublin. After Canlemas, the Lacies came to Dublin, & procured an inquest to be impanelled to inquire of their demeanour, for that they were accused to haue procured the Scots to come into Ireland: but by that inquest they were discharged, and therewith toke an oth to keepe the kings peace, and to destroye the Scots to the uttermost of their power. In the beginning of Lent, the Scots came in secret wise vnto Slane, with twentie thousand armed men: and with them came the armie of Ulster, destroying all the countrie before them. Whereouer, on mondaie before the feast of S. Mathias the apostle, the earle of Ulster lieng in the abbey of S. Marie nere to Dublin, Robert Pottingham maior of that citie, with the communalitie of the same went thither, toke the earle, and put him in prison within the castell of Dublin, slue seven of his men, and spoiled the abbey.

The same weeke, Edward Buse marched towards Dublin, but herewith, turning to the castell of Inoke, he entred the same, and toke Hugh Tirrell the lord thereof, together with his wife, and ransomed them for a summe of monie. The citizens of Dublin burnt all their suburbs for feare of a siege, and made the best purueiance they could to defend their citie, if the Buse had come to haue besieged them: but he turning another waie, went vnto the towne of Paas, and was guided thither by the Lacies, contrarie to their oth. From thence he passed vnto Criffeldermot, and so to Baliganam, and to Callan, at length he came to Limerike, and there remained till after Easter. They of Ulster sent to the lord iustice lamentable informations of such crueltie as the enemies practised in those parts, beseeching him to take some order for their reliefe in that their so miserable estate. to them the kings power with his standard, wherewith under pretense to expell the Scots, they got vp in armie, and ranging through the countrie, did more here and moche the subiecs, than did the strangers. The Scots proceeded and spoiled Castells, & wherefoever they lighted vpon the Butlers lands, they burnt and spoiled them vnmmercifullie.

In this meane while had the lord iustice and Thomas Fitzjohn earle of Kildare, Richard de Clare, and Arnold le Poivre baron of Donnoill leuied an armie of thirtie thousand men, readie to go against the enimies, and to giue them battell, but no good was done. For about the same time the lord Roger Mortimer was sent into Ireland as lord iustice, and landing at Foghall, wrote his letters vnto the lord Butler, & to the other capitaine, willing them not to fight till he came with such power as he had brought ouer with him. Whereof the Butse being warned, retired first towarde Kildare. But yet after this he Scarifice of Ulster.

The lord Edmund Butler made great slaughter of the Irish nere to Tristledermot, and likewise at Balithan he had a good hand of Amorch, and slue manie of his men. The lord Mortimer pacified the displeasure and variance betwixt Richard earle of Ulster, and the nobles that had put the said earle vnder safe keeping within the castell of Dublin, accusing him of certeine riots committed to the prejudice and losse of the kings subiecs, whereby the Scots increased in strength and courage, whose spoiling of the countrie caused such horrible scarifice in Ulster, that the soldiors which the yeare before abused the kings authoritie, to perneie themselves of ouer fine diet, surfatted with flesh and Aqua vite all the Lent long, polled and pilled insatiablie wherefoever they came without need, and without regard of the poore people, whose onelie provision they deuoured. These people now lining in slauerie vnder the Butse, star-ued for hunger, hauing first experienced manie lamentable shifts, euen to the eating of dead carcasses.

Great dearth.

The earle of Ulster was deliuered by maine, prife and vpon his oth, by the which he undertooke neuer to seeke reuenge of his apprehension otherwise than by order of law, and so had daie giuen him vnto the feast of the natiuitie of saint John baptist: but he kept not his daie, whether for that he mistrusted to stand in trial of his cause, or through some other reasonable let, I cannot tell. A great dearth this yeare afflicted the Irish people: for a measure of wheat called a chzonecke was sold at foure and twentie shillings, & a chzonecke of otes at sixtene shillings, and all other vittells likewise were sold according to the same rate; for all the whole countrie was soze washed by the Scots and them of Ulster, insomuch that no small number of people perished through famine.

About the feast of Pentecost the lord iustice Mortimer toke his iourne towarde Drogheda, and sent to the Lacies, commanding them to come vnto him, but they refused so to do. Whereupon he sent sir Hugh Crossa vnto them, to talke with them about some agreement of peace: but they slue the messenger, for whome great lamentation was made, for that he was reputed & knowne to be a right worthie knight.
The lord iustice soze offended herewith, gathereth an armie, & goeth against the Lacies, whome he chased out of Connagh, so that Hugh Lacie withdrew to Ulster, & there ioined himselfe with Edward Butse.
Whereupon, on the thursdaie next before the feast of saint Margaret, the said Hugh Lacie and also Walter Lacie were proclaimed traitors. This yeare passed verie troublesome vnto the whole realme of Ireland, as well through slaughter betwixt the parties enimies one to another, as by dearth and other misfortunes. Hugh Canon the kings iustice of his bench was slaine by Andrew Birmingham betwixt the towne of Paas and castell Marten. Also in the feast of the purification, the popes bulles were published, whereby Alexander Bignoz was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. About the same time was great slaughter made of Irishmen, through a quar-rell betwixt two great lords in Connagh: so that there died in fight to the number of foure thousand men on both parties.

After Easter Walter Mep tresuroz of Ireland was sent ouer into that realme, who brought letters to the lord Mortimer, commanding him to returne into England vnto the king: which he did, and departing south of Ireland, remained indebted to the citizens of Dublin for his provision of vittells in the summe of a thousand pounds, wherof he paid not one farthing, so that manie a bitter curse he carried with him to the sea, leauing William archbishop of Castell lord chancelloz gouernoz of the land in his place: and so by this meane was the said archbishop both chancelloz and iustice, and so continued till the feast of saint Michaele. At what time Alexander Bignoz archbishop of Dublin arriued at Foghall, being constituted lord iustice, and came to Dublin on saint Denise daie, being the seauenth of October. But here is to be remembred, that a little before the departure of the lord Mortimer south of Ireland, to wit, the fist of Maie, the lord Richard de Clare with four knights, sir Henrie Capell, sir Thomas de Paas, sir James Cauntton, and sir John Cauntton; also Adam Apilgard and others (to the number of foure score persons) were slaine by Owen and Mac Archie. It was said that the enimies in despite caused the lord Richards bodie to be cut in peces, so to satisfie their malicious stomachs; but the same peces were yet afterwards buried in the church of the friers minors at Limerike. Also before the lord Mor-timers returne into England, John Lacie was had south of the castell of Dublin, and carried to Trim, where he was arreigned and adjudged to be pressed to death, and so he died in prison.

But now to returne vnto the doings in time of Bignozs gouernment. Immediatlie vpon his ar-riual, the lord John Birmingham being generall of the field, and hauing with him diuerse capitaine of worthie fame, namelie sir Richard Tute, sir Miles Merton, sir Hugh Crippetton, sir Herbert Sutton, sir John Cusacke, sir Edmund Birmingham, sir William Birmingham, Walter Birmingham the primat of Armagh, sir Walter de la Hulle, and John Maupas led south the kings power, to the number of one thousand three hundred foure and twentie able men against Edward Butse, who being accompanied with the lord Philip Potwylate, the lord Walter de Soules, the lord Alaine Steward, with his three brethren, sir Walter, and sir Hugh, sir Robert, and sir Aimerie Lacies, and others, was incamped not past two miles from Dundalke with three thousand men, there abiding the Englishmen, to fight with them if they came forward: which they did with all conuenient speed, being as desirous to giue battell as the Scots were to receiue it.

The primat of Armagh personallie accompanieng the English power, & blessing their enterprise, gaue them such comfortable exhortation, as he thought serued the time yet they began to incounter. And herewith buckling together, at length the Scots fullie and whole were vanquished, and two thousand of them slaine, together with their capitaine Edward Butse. Maupas that pressed into the strong to encounter with Bluse hand to hand, was found in the search dead aloft upon the flaine bodie of Bluse. The victorie thus obtained upon saint Calistus daie, made an end of the Scottish kingdome in Ireland, & lord Birmingham sending the head of Bluse into England, as Marlburrow hath, being the messenger himselfe, presented it to king Edward, who in recompense gaue to him and his heires males the earledome of Louth, and the baronie of Ardich and Athenrie to him and his heires generall for ever. Shortly after sir Richard de Clare with foure other knights of name, and manie other men of warre were slaine in Thomond. The lord Roger Mortimer came againe into Ireland to gouerne as lord iustice there now the second time, and the townes of Athell and Plebs were burned by the lord Fitzthomas brother to the lord Maurice Fitzthomas. And about this season the bridge of Kilkennin was builded by Maurice Jakis.

In the yeare following, to wit, one thousand three hundred and twentie, which was the fourteenth yeare of king Edwards reigne, Thomas Fitzthomas earle of Kildare was made lord iustice of Ireland. Here is to be remembred, that about this time also Alexander Bignoz archbishop of Dublin sent to pope John the two and twentieth, for a priuilege to institute an vniuersitie within the citie of Dublin, and his sute toke effect: and the first three doctors of diuinitie did the said archbishop himselfe creat, William Harvitt a frier preacher, Henrie Cogio a frier minor, and frier Edmund Bernerden; and beside these one doctor of canonlaw, to wit, Richard archdeacon of saint Patrikes that was chancelor of the same vniuersitie, who kept their terms and commendments solemnlie: neither was this vniuersitie at a nie time since disfranchised, but onlie through change of times discontinued, and now since the dissolving of monasteries vtterlie decayed.

A motion was made (as Campion hath noted) in a parlement holden there, whilst sir Henrie Sidneie was the quenes lieutenant, to haue it againe erected, by waie of contributions to be laid together: the said sir Henrie offering twentie pounds lands, and an hundred pounds in monie. Other there were also, that according to their abilities and deuotions followed with their offers. The name was deuised; A worthy plantation of Plantagenet & Bullogne. But while they disputed of a conuenient place for it, and of other circumstances, they let fall the principall.

In the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and one, there was a great slaughter made of the Deonhurs at Balibagan, by the English of Leinster and Meth. And John Birmingham earle of Louth was lord iustice of Ireland. Unto this man, whilst he was lord iustice, the king wrote, commanding him to be with him at Carleill in the octaues of the Trinitie, in the fiftenth yeare of his reigne, with three hundred men of armes, one thousand hobellars, and sir thousand footmen, ech of them armed with an aketon, a sallet, and gloues of maill, which number was to be leuied in that land: besides three hundred men of armes which the earle of Ulster was appointed to serue within that iourne, which the king at that time intended to make against the Scots. The date of the letter was the third of Aprill. In the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and two, diuerse nobles in Ireland departed this life, as the lord Richard Birmingham, the lord Edmund Butler, and the lord Thomas Persuall. Moreover, the lord Andew Birmingham, and sir Richard de la Lond were slaine by Molan. In the eighteenth yeare of king Edward the second his reigne, the lord John Parcie came into Ireland to be lord iustice, and the kings lieutenant there. In these daies liued in the diocesse of Ossorie the ladie Alice Kettle, whome the bishop ascited to purge hir selfe of the same of inchantment and witchcraft imposed vnto hir, and to one Petronill and Basill hir complices. She was charged to haue nightlie conference with a spirit called Robin Artisson, to whome she sacrificed in the high waie nine red cocks, and nine peacocks eyes. Also that she swept the streets of Kilkennie betwene compleine and twilight, raking all the filth towards the doores of hir sonne William Outlaw, murmuring & muttering secretlie with hir selfe these woords:

To the house of William my sonne, Hie all the wealth of Kilkennie towne.

At the first consultation they abtured & did penance, but shortly after they were found in relapse, & then was Petronill burnt at Kilkennie, the other twaine might not be heard of. She at the houre of hir death accused the said William as priuie to their sojournes, whome the bishop held in durance nine weeks, forbidding his keepers to eat or to drinke with him, or to speake to him more than once in the daie. But at length, thorough the sute and instance of Arnold le Powze then seneschall of Kilkennie, he was deliuered, and after corrupted with bribes the seneschall to persecute the bishop; so that he thrust him into prison for three moneths. In rising the closet of the ladie, they found a wafer of sacramentall bread, hauing the diuels name stamped thereon in steed of Iesus Christ, and a pipe of ointment, wherewith the greased a staffe, vpon the which she ambled and galloped thorough thicke and thin, when and in what maner she liued. This businesse about these witches troubled all the state of Ireland, the more; for that the ladie was supported by certeine of the nobilitie, and lastlie conueied ouer into England, since which time it could neuer be vnderstood what became of hir. In the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and six, & last of king Edwards the seconds reigne, Richard Burgh earle of Ulster departed this life.

Edward the third.

Verth was the businesse about the witches at an erd, when it was signified, that a gentleman of the familie of the Stoules in Leinster, named Adam Duffe, possessed by some wicked spirit of error, denied obstinately the incarnation of our saulor, the trinitie of persons in the vnitie of the Godhead, & the resurrection of the flesh; as for the holie scripture, he said it was but a fable: the virgin Marie he affirmed to be a woman of dissolute life, and the apostolike see erroneous. For such assertions he was burnt in hogging greene beside Dublin. About the same time, Fitzarke Macmoroch, and sir Henrie Traherne were taken prisoners. In the yeare following, the lord Thomas Fitzthomas erle of Kildare, and the lord Arnold Powze & William earle of Ulster were sent ouer into Ireland, & Roger Outlaw prior of saint Johns of Jerusalem in Ireland, commonlie called the prior of Kilmainan, was made lord iustice. This man by reason of barbaunce that chanced to rise betwixt the Geraldins, the Butlers, and Birminghams, on the one side; and the Powzes & Burghs on the other, for terming the earle of Kildare a rimer, to pacifie the parties called a parlement, wherein he himselfe was faine to make his purgation of a slander imposed to him, as suspected of heresie.

The bishop of Ossorie had giuen an information against Arnold le Powze, conuicted & conuicted in his his confessor of certeine hereticall opinions, but because the beginning of Dowys accusation concerned the iustices kinsman, and the bishop was mistrusted to prosecute his owne wrong, and the person of the man rather than the fault: a date was limited for the iustifying of the bill, the partie being apprehended and respited thereunto. This dealing the bishop (who durst not stirre out of Kilkennie to prosecute his accusation) was reputed parciall: and when by meanes hereof the matter hanged in suspense, he insaured the said prior as an abbettoz and fauourer of Arnolds heresie. The prior submitted himselfe to the triall, and thereupon were seuerall proclamations made in court, that it should be lawfull to anie man to come into the court, and to inferre, accuse, and declare what euidence he could, against the lord iustice: but none came. Then passed a decre by the counsell, commanding all bishops, abbats, priors, and the maiors of Dublin, Cork, Limerike, Waterford, and Droghebagh, the shirifs, knights, & seneeschals of euerie shire, to appeare at Dublin. From amongst all these, they appointed six inquisitors, which examining the bishops and other persons aforesaid singularlie one by one, found that with an vnuerfall consent they deposed for the prior, affirming that (to their iudgements) he was a zelous and a faithfull child of the catholike church. In the meane time, Arnold le Dowze the prisoner deceased in the castell, & because he stood unpurged, long he late buried.

In the peare one thousand three hundred twentie and nine, John de Birmingham earle of Louth, and his brother Peter, with many other of that surname, and Richard Talbot of Malahide were slaine on Whitten euen at Balibagan by men of the countrie. Also the lord Thomas Butler, and diuerse other noblemen were slaine by Mac Cogoghdan & other Irishmen nere to Spolinger. For the Irish as well in Leinster as in Meth made insurrections in that season, and so likewise did they in Mounster vnder the leading of Owen, whom William earle of Ulster and James earle of Desmond vanquished. So outrageous were the Leinster Irish, that in one church they burnt foure score innocent soules, asking no more but the life of their priest then at masse, whome they notwithstanding tricked with their lauelins, spurned the host, and wasted all with fire: neither forced they of the popes interdiction, nor anie ecclesiasticall censures denounced against them (matters of no small consideration among them name lie in those dates) but maliciouslie perseuered in the course of their furious rage, till the citizens of Waterford somewhat tamed them, and slue foure hundred of them in one skirmish, the rest flieng were all drenched in the water of Slane. In the peare one thousand three hundred and thirtie, the earle of Ulster with a great armie made a iourne against Owen, and the prior of Kilmalman lord iustice put Maurice Fitzthomas earle of Desmond in prison in the marshalsee, out of the which he scellie escaped, and the lord Hugh Lucie returned into Ireland, and obtained the kings peace and fauour.

In the peare one thousand three hundred thirtie and one, the earle of Ulster passed ouer into England, and great slaughter was made vpon the Irish in Dhenkie. Also the castell of Arco was taken by the Irishmen, and great slaughter made of the English in the Cowlagh by Othell and others. Also the lord Anthonic Lucie was sent ouer lord iustice into Ireland, and great slaughter was made of the Irish at Thuelis by the knights of the countrie, & at Firrath in Meth, there were manie of them slaine by the English; but yet was the castell of Fernis taken and burnt by the Irish. On the feast daie of the assumption of our ladie, which falleth on the fifteenth of August, Maurice Fitzthomas earle of Desmond was apprehended at Limerike by the lord iustice, and sent vnto the castell of Dublin. Moreover, the lord iustice took sir William Birmingham at Clonmel by a wife, whilest he was sicke in his bed, & sent him (together with his sonne Walter Birmingham) vnto the castell of Dublin, the thirtieth of April. In the peare one thousand three hundred thirtie and two the said sir William was hanged at Dublin, but Walter was deliuered by reason he was within orders.

Campion following such notes as he hath scene, writeth that the death of this William Birmingham chanced in time of the gouernement of William Durlaw prior of Kilmalman, being lieutenant vnto John lord Darcie, that was made lord iustice (as the said Champion hath noted) in the peare one thousand three hundred twentie and nine. Although Marburrow affirmeth that he came thither to beare that office, in the peare one thousand three hundred thirtie and two, after the lord Lucie was discharged, as hereafter shall be recited. But whensoever, or vnder whome soeuer Birmingham was executed, he was accounted an od knight, and such a one as for his valiancie, his match was not lightlie to be anie where found. The castell of Clonmore was taken the same peare by the Englishmen, and the castell of Bonrath was destroyed by the Irish of Thomond. Also Henrie de Mandeuill was taken and sent prisoner to be safelte kept in Dublin. Likewise Walter Burgh with two of his brethren were taken in Connagh by the earle of Ulster, and sent to the castell of Rosburgh.

This peare the lord Antonie Lucie was discharged of his come by the king, and so returned with his wife & children into England, and the lord John Darcie was sent ouer lord iustice in Lucies place, and great slaughter was made vpon Owen Owen, and Mac Arthie in Mounster, by the English of that countrie. This John Darcie (as should appeare by gifts bestowed vpon him by the king) was in singular fauour with him. Amongst other things which he had of the kings gift, we find that he had the manors of Louth, and Ballogarte, and other lands in Ireland which belonged to the earle of Ew. And for that the said earle was a Frenchman, and took part with Philip de Malois the kings enemie, they were seized into the kings hand. The earle of Desmond vpon suerties was set at libertie, and by the parliament holden at Dublin in this peare 1333, was sent ouer into England vnto the king; and William erle of Ulster a yong gentleman of twentie peares of age, in going towards Knockfergus the seauenth of June, was slaine nere to the fords in Ulster, by his owne people, but his wife and daughter escaped into England: and the daughter was after married vnto the lord Lionell the kings sonne. She deceased afterwards at Dublin, and left a daughter behind hir that was his heire, married to Roger Mortimer earle of March, and lord of Crim.

This murder was procured by Robert Fitzmartine Mandeuill, who was the first that presumed to glue to the earle anie wound. To reuenge the death of this earle of Ulster (slaine as yee haue heard beside Knockfergus) the lord iustice Darcie with a great power went into Ulster, to pursue those that through Mandeuills seditious tumults had so traitorously murdered their lord. At his setting forward, the said iustice Darcie appointed sir Thomas Burgh treasurer, to gouerne as lieutenant to him in his absence. When the lord iustice had punished the traitors in Ulster, he passed ouer into Scotland, there to make warre against the Scots that were enemies at at that present to the king of England, and on the feast daie of saint Margaret, great slaughter was made of the Scots by the Irishmen: and so what by the king in one part, and the lord iustice of Ireland in another, Scotland was in maner wholie conquered, and Edward Balioll was established king of Scotland. The lord iustice might haue possessed the Isles if they had bene worth the keeping: into the which Isles, except the said Darcie and the earle of Suffer late lieutenant of Ireland, no gouernor at anie time yet aduentured. At Darcies coming backe into Ireland, and exercising the office of lord iustice, he deliuered Walter Birmingham out of the castell of Dublin.

1336 In the yere 1336, and tenth of Edward the thirde reigne, on S. Laurence daie, the Irish of Connagh were discomfited and put to flight by the Englishmen of the countrie there, with the losse of one Englishman, and ten thousand of the enimies. The lord John Charleton baron came into Ireland to be lord iustice, and with him his brother Thomas bishop of Hereford lord chancelor, and John Rice lord treasurer, and two hundred Welshmen souldiours. The bishop was ordeined afterward lord iustice, in whose time all the Irish of Ireland were at defiance with the English, and hostilie brought againe into quiet by the earles of Kildare and Desmond. The lord John Darcie by the kings letters patents was (during life) ordeined lord iustice of Ireland, in the fourth yere of king Edward the thirde reigne, which king abused by euill counsell and sinister informers, called in vnder his signet roiall, the franchises, liberties and grants, whatsoeuer had bene deuised, made and ratified to the realme of Ireland, and to euerie each person thereof. This reuoking of liberties was displeasing to the English of birth and the English of blood falling at words, were diuided into factions about it, for which contention the Irish still waited, so as the realme was enen vpon the point to glue ouer all, and to rebell. For redresse whereof, the lord iustice called a parlement at Dublin, to the which the nobles refused to come, and in quiet wise assembled themselves together at Kilkennie, where they with the commons agreed vpon certaine questions to be demanded of the king by waie of supplication, signifieng in the same partle their grieues. Which questions were in effect as followeth.

1 How a realme of warre might be gouerned by one both vnskillfull and vnable in all warlike seruice?

2 How an officer vnder the king, that entered herie poore, might in one yere grow to more excessive wealth, than men of great patrimonie and livelihood in manie yeares?

3 How it chanced, that sith they were all called lords of their owne, that the soueraigne lord of them all was not a penne the richer for them?

The chiefe of them that thus seemed to repine with the present gouernment, was Thomas Fitzmaurice earle of Desmond, through whose maintenance and bearing out of the matter, the countrie was in great trouble; so as it had not lightlie bene seene, that such contrarietie in minds and disliking had appeared amongst those of the English race, in that realme at anie time before. Herewith Kase Ufford was sent ouer lord iustice, who bringing his wife with him, the countesse of Ulster arrived about the thirteenth of Iulie. This man was verie rigorous, and through perswasion (as was said) of his wife, he was more extreme and couetous than otherwise he would haue bene, a matter not to be forgotten. For if this ladie had bene as readie to moue hir husband to haue shewed himselfe gentle and mild in his gouernement, as she was bent to pricke him forward vnto sharpe dealings and rigorous proceedings, she had bene now aswell reposed of, as she is infamed by their pens that haue registred the doings of those times. But to the purpose. This Ufford lord iustice, in paine of forfeiture of all his lands, commanded the earle of Desmond to make his personall appearance at a parlement, which he called to be holden at Dublin, there to begin the seventh of Iune. And because the earle refused to come according to the summons, he raised the kings standard, and with an armie marched into Mounster, and there seized the earles possessions into the kings hands, letting them forth to farme for an annuall rent vnto other persons.

And whilst he yet remained in Mounster, he deuised waies how to haue the earle of Desmond apprehended: which being brought to passe, he afterward deliuered him vpon mainprise of these suerties whose names insue. William de Burgh earle of Ulster, James Butler earle of Ormond, Richard Tate, Nicholas Urdon, Maurice Rochford, Eustace le Poivre, Gerald de Rochford, John Fitzrobert Poivre, Robert Barrie, Maurice Fitzgiralde, John Mellesleie, Walter le Fant, Richard Kelleie, Henric Traherne, Roger Poivre, John Lenfant, Roger Poivre, Mattheu Fitzhenric, Richard Walleis, Edmund Burgh sonne to the earle of Ulster, knights: David Barrie, William Fitzgiralde, Foulke de Fraxinus, Robert Fitzmaurice, Henric Fitzberkleie, John Fitzgeorge de Koch, Thomas de Lees de Burgh. These (as yee haue heard) were bound for the earle. And because he made default, the lord iustice verelie took the aduantage of the bond against the mainpernours, foure of them onelie excepted, the two earles and two knights.

The lord iustice is charged with strict dealing by writers in this behalfe, for that the same persons had assisted him in his warres against Desmond. But trulle if we shall consider the matter with indifferencie, he did no more than law and reason required. For if euerie suertie vpon forfeiture of his bond should be forborne, that otherwise doth his duettie, what care would men haue either to procure suerties or to become suerties themselves? But such is the affection of writers, speciallie when they haue conceived anie misliking towards those of whom they take occasion to speake, so as manie a worthy man hath bene defamed, and with slander greatly defaced in things wherein he rather hath deserued singular commendation. But howsoeuer this matter was handled touching the earle of Desmond, vpon the death of the lord iustice, which insued the next yere, bonifiers were made, and great joy shewed through all the relme of Ireland. His ladie verelie (as should appeare) was but a miserable woman, procuring him to extortion and biberie. Much he abridged the prerogatiues of the church, and was so hated, that euen in the sight of the countrie he was robbed without rescue by Mac Cartie, notwithstanding he gathered power, and dispersed those rebels of Ulster. Robert Darcie was ordeined iustice by the counsell till the kings letters came to sir John Fitzmaurice, who released Fitzthomas earle of Kildare left in durance by Ufford at his death. Fitzmaurice continued not long, but was discharged, and the lord Walter Birmingham elected to succeed in that roome, who procured a safe conduct for Desmond to plead his cause before the king, by whom he was liberallie intreated, and allowed towards his expenses there twentie shillings a day at the princes charge. In consideration of which courtesse shewed to his kinsman, the earle of Kildare, accompanied with diuerse lords, knights, and chosen horsemen, serued the king at Calis,

We find that Thomas Berkeleie, & Reinold lord Cobham, and sir Horke Berkeleie became mainpernours for the said earle of Desmond, that he should come into England, and abide such triall as the law would award. John Archer prior of Kilmainan was substituted lieutenant to the lord iustice. To whom succeeded Baron Carew, and after Carew followed sir Thomas Rokelbie knight, unto whom was assigned about his ordinarie retinue of twenty men of armes, a supplie of ten men of armes, and twenty archers on horsebacke, so long as it should be thought needfull. Great mortalitie chanced this yeare, as in other parts of the world, so especiallie in places about the seacoasts of England and Ireland. In the yeare following departed this life Alexander Bignor archbishop of Dublin. And the same yeare was John de saint Paule consecrated archbishop of that see. This yeare deceased Kemwizke Shereiman sometime maior of Dublin, a great benefactor to euery church and religious house within twenty miles round about the citie. His legacies to the poore and others, beside his liberalitie shewed in his life time, amounted to three thousand marks.

In this season dwelled in Ulster a welthie knight one sir Robert Sauage, who the rather to preserve his owne, began to wall and fortifie his manor houses with castles and piles against the Irish enimie, exhorting his heire Henrie Sauage to apply that worke so benefitfull for himselfe & his posteritie. Father (quoth yong Sauage) I remember the proverbe Better a castell of bones than of stones. Where strength & courage of valiant men are prest to helpe vs, neuer will I (by the grace of God) cumber myselfe with dead walles. My fort shall be where soeuer yong blouds be stirring, & where I find route to fight. The father in a fume let lie the building, and forswore to go anie further forward in it. But yet the want thereof and such like hath bene the decaye as well of the Sauages, as of all the English gentlemen in Ulster: as the lacke also of walled townes is one of the principall occasions of the rude wilfulness in other parts of Ireland.

This Sauage, having prepared an armie against the Irish, allowed to euery souldier before they should buckle with the enimie, a mightie draught of Aqua vite, wine, or old ale, and killed in provision for their returne, beefe, venison, and fowle, great plenty: which doings diuerse of his captiues misliked, because they considered the successe of warre to be vn certaine, and therefore esteemed it better policie to poison the eates, or to doe them awaie, than to keepe the same; and happlie to feed a sort of rogues with such princelie food, if ought should happen to themselves in this aduenture of so sely against so manie. Herat smiled the gentleman and said, Tush ye are too full of enuie: this world is but an inn, to the which ye haue no speciall interest, but are onelie tenants at will of the Lord. If it please him to command vs from it as it were from our lodging, and to set other good fellows in our rooms, what hurt shall it be for vs to leaue them some meat for their suppers? Let them harolde win it & weare it. If they enter our dwellings, good manner would no lesse but to welcome them with such fare as the countrie breedeth, and with all my heart much good may it doe them. Notwithstanding I presume so far vpon your noble courages, that berkeleie my mind giueth me we shall returne at night, & banquet our selues with our owne sfoze. And so did, hauing slain 3000 Irishmen.

The earle of Desmond

In the yeare 1355 deceased Maurice Fitzthomas earle of Desmond lord iustice of Ireland, who had that office of the kings grant for terme of life.

After him succeeded in that same Thomas de Rokelbie, a knight, sincere and upright of conscience, who being controlled for suffering himselfe to be seruiced in trene cups, answered: These homilie cups & dishes paie trulie for that they containe: I had rather drinke out of trene cups & paie gold and siluer, than drinke out of gold & make wooden payment. This yeare began great variance betwixt Richard Kase priuat of Armagh, & foure orders of begging friers, which ended at length by the deaths of the said Richard Kase, and Richard Kilminton, in the yeare 1360: Kase deceasing in the popes court, and Kilminton in England. Almerike de S. Amand, John O' (as other haue) James Butler earle of Desmond, and Maurice Fitzthomas earle of Kildare, were appointed lord iustices of Ireland by turnes. In Desmonds time, and in the three and twentieth yeare of king Edward the thirde reigne, order was taken that the Irish lords should remaine and dwell in their houses on the marches, to defend the subiects from inuasions of enimies. And further, proclamation went forth, that no mere Irish bozne should be made maior, bailiffe, porter, officer, or minister in anie towne or place within the English dominions: nor that anie archbishop, abbat, prior, or anie other being of the kings allegiance, vpon forfeiture of all that he might forfeit, should aduance anie that was mere Irish bozne to the roome of a canon, or to haue anie other ecclesiasticall benefice that late among the English subiects.

To Maurice Thomas earle of Kildare, when he was ordeined lord iustice, the kings letters assigned in yearelie fee for his office 500 pounds, with condition, that the said gouernour should find twenty great horses to serue in the field, he himselfe to be the twentieth man in going against the enimie: which allowance and conditions in those daies (so farre as I can gesse) should seeme to be ordinarie to the office. Lionell duke of Clarence sonne to king Edward the third, came ouer into Ireland to be lord iustice there, and was in right of his wife earle of Ulster. He published an inhibition to all of the Irish birth not once to approach his armie, nor to be in anie wise imployed in seruice of the wars. He vanquished Owen, but yet suddenlie (no man vnderstanding how) an hundred of his souldiers were wanting as they laie in garrison, the losse of whom was thought to be occasioned by that displeasing decree afore rehearsed. Wherevpon he toke better aduise, and receiued the Irish into like fauour, as other lieutenants had them in before that present, shewing a tender loue towards them all, and so euer after prospered in his affaires. He created diuerse knights, as Plessen, now knowne by the name of the familie of Gormanston, Holiewood, Talbot, Cusac, de la Hyde, Patrike, Robert and John de Frarinis: all these being gentlemen of worthie fame in chivalrie. The erchebisher he removed to Catherlagh, & bestowed in furnishing that towne five hundred pounds.

In the yeare 1362 John de S. Paule archbishop of Dublin departed this life the first dayes of September. And in the yeare following was Thomas Pinot consecrated archbishop of that place. Gerald Fitzmaurice earle of Desmond was appointed lord iustice, untill the coming of the lord Windsoze, the first lieutenant in Ireland, who came ouer in the yeare 1369. This Windsoze called a parlement at Kilkennie, in the which was granted to the king a subsidie of three thousand pounds to be leuied of the people, subiects to the king in that land. And in an other parlement holden by him at Baliboill they granted two thousand pounds to be likewise leuied. Which said sums were granted of the mere and free good wils of the nobles and communalitie of the land.

Whilest king Richard thus laie in Dublin to reduce Ireland into due subiection, he was aduertised that Henrie duke of Lancaster, that latelie before had bene banished, was returned, & ment to bereaue him of the crowne. The sonne of which duke, together with the duke of Glocesters sonne, the king shut vp within the castell of Trim, and then taking the seas, he returned and landed in Wales, where he found his defense so weake, and vnsecure, that finallie he came into his aduersaries hands, and was deposed by authoritie of parlement, and then was the said duke of Lancaster admitted to reigne in his place.

poore people, insomuch that the ladie his wife hearing of such exclamations, would in no wise continue with him there, except he would receiue a solempne oath on the bible, that twittinglie he should wrong no christian creature in that land, but dulie and trulie he should see payment made for all expenses: and hercof (he said) he had made a vow to Christ so determinatlie, that unlesse it were on his part firmitie promised, he could not without perill of soule go with him. His husband assented and accomplished his request effectualle, recovered a good opinion for his bysight deling, reformed his caters & puruelors, enriched the countrie, mainteined a plentiful house, remission of great offenses, remedies for persons indangered to the prince, pardons of lands and liues he granted so charitable and so discretlie, that his name was neuer recited among them without manie blessings and pzaiers, and so cherefullie they were readie to ferue him against the Irish upon all necessarie occasions. The lord Thomas of Lancaster the kings sonne, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, arrived the same yeare at Dublin, upon saint Bices daie.

The maior of Dublin John Drake, with a band of his citizens nere to Bre, due foure thousand of the Irish outlawes (as Campion noteth out of the records of Christs church) but Marlburrow speaketh onelie of 493, and these being all men of warre. The vertie same daie that this victorie was atchiued, to wit, the eleventh day of Julie, the church of the fraters prechers of Dublin was dedicated by the archbishop of that citie. The same yeare in September, a parliament was holden at Dublin, during the which in Regile sir Bartholomew Weldon knight, James White, Stephan Gernon, and other their complices, due the thirthe of Louth John Dowdall. In the yere 1403, in Maie, sir Walter Betterleie steward of Ulster, a right balliant knight was slaine, and to the number of thirtie other with him. The same yeare about the feast of saint Martin, the lord Thomas of Lancaster the kings sonne returned into England leaving the lord Stephan Scrope his deputie there: who also in the beginning of Lent sailed ouer into England, and then the lords of the land chose the earle of Dymond to be lord iustice.

In the fifth yere of Henrie the fourth, John Colton archbishop of Armagh the seven & twentieth of Aprill departed this life, unto whom Nicholas Stoning succeeded. The same yeare on the daie of saint Vitale the martyr, the parlement of Dublin began before the earle of Dymond then lord iustice of Ireland, where the statutes of Kilkennie and Dublin were confirmed, and likewise the charter of Ireland. In the first yeare of Henrie the fourth, in the moneth of Maie, three Scottish barkes were taken, two at Green castell, and one at Alkeie, with capteine Macgolagh. The same yeare the merchants of Wodagh entered Scotland, and toke pzeles and pledges. Also on the even of the feast day of the seven brethren, Mghgard was burnt by the Irish. And in June sir Stephan Scrope that was come againe into Ireland, returned effones into England, leaving the earle of Dymond lord iustice of Ireland. About the same time they of Dublin entered Scotland at saint Martin, and balliantlie behaued themselves against the enemies, and after crossing the seas, directed their course into Wales, and did much hurt to the Welsh men, bringing from thence the thirne of saint Cabbins, & placed it in the church of the Trinitie in Dublin. James Butler earle of Dymond died at Balingam, whilst he was lord iustice, unto whom succeeded Gerald earle of Kildare.

In the seventh yeare of king Henrie on Corpus Christi day, the citizens of Dublin with the countrie people about them, manfullie banquished the Irish enemies, and due diuerse of them, and toke two ensignes or standards, bringing with them to Dublin the heads of those whom they had slaine. The same yeare the prior of Conall, in the plaine of Kildare, fought manfullie with the Irish, & banquished two hundred that were well armed, slaying part of them, and chasing the residue out of the field, and the prior had not with him past the number of twentie Englishmen: but God (as saith mine author) assisted those that put their trust in him. The same yeare after Michaelmas, Stephan Scrope deputie iustice to the lord Thomas of Lancaster the kings sonne, and his lieutenant of Ireland, came againe ouer into Ireland. And in the feast of saint Illarie was a parliament holden at Dublin, which in Lent after was ended at Trim. And Heiler de Birmingham due Cathole Deconbur about the end of Februarie. In the yere 1407, a certeine false and heathenish wretch an Irish man, named Mac Adam Mac Gilmore, that had caused fortie churches to be destroyed, as he that was neuer christened, and therefore called Coybi, chanced to take prisoner one Patrike Savage, and receiued for his ransome two thousand markes, though afterwards he due him, together with his brother Richard.

The same yeare in the feast of the exaltation of the crosse, Stephan Scrope deputie to the lord Thomas of Lancaster, with the earles of Dymond and Desmond, and the prior of Kilmainan, and diuerse other capteins and men of warre of Meth, set from Dublin, and invaded the land of Mac Murch, where the Irish came into the field and skirmished with them, so as in the former part of the daie they put the English power to the worle; but at length the Irish were banquished and chased, so that Dnolan with his son and diuerse others were taken prisoners. But the English capteins aduertised here, that the Burkens and Dheroll in the countie of Kilkennie, had for the space of two daies together done much mischief, they rode with all speed vnto the towne of Callan, and there encountering with the aduersaries, manfullie put them to flight, due Dheroll, and eight hundred others. There went a tale, and beleued of manie, that the sunne stood still for a space that daie, till the Englishmen had ridden sir miles: so much was it thought that God fauoured the English part in this enterprise, if we shall beleue it.

The same yeare the lord Stephan Scrope passed once againe ouer into England, and James Butler earle of Dymond was elected by the countrie lord iustice of Ireland. In the daies of this Henrie the fourth, the inhabitants of Corke being fore afflicted with perpetuall oppressions of their Irish neighbors, complained themselves in a generall writing directed to the lord Rutland and Corke, the kings deputie there, and to the counsell of the realme then assembled at Dublin: which letter because it openeth a window to behold the state of those parties, and of the whole realme of Ireland in those daies, we haue thought good to set downe here, as it hath bene entered by Campion, according to the copie deuclured to him by Francis Agard esquire, one of the quenes maiesties priuie counsell in Ireland.

knights, esquires, gentlemen, and yeomen, to a great number that might dispend yearely eight hundred pounds, six hundred pounds, four hundred pounds, two hundred pounds, one hundred pounds, an hundred markes, twenty markes, twenty pounds, ten pounds, some more, some lesse, to a great numbers, besides these lordes. First the lord marques Caro, his yearelye reuenues was beside Doyse hauen and other creekes, two thousand two hundred pounds sterling. The lord Barnevale of Berhauen, his yearelye reuenue was beside Bodre hauen and other creekes, one thousand six hundred pounds sterling. The lord Mogan of the great castell, his yearelye reuenue beside his hauens and creekes, thirteene thousand pounds. The lord Balram of Enfort, his yearelye reuenue beside hauens and creekes, one thousand three hundred pounds sterling. The lord Curcie of Keltzetton, his yearelye reuenue beside hauens and creekes, one thousand two hundred pounds sterling. The lord Hancuile of Barentellie, his yearelye reuenue beside hauens and creekes, one thousand two hundred pounds sterling. The lord Arundell of the Strand, his yearelye reuenue beside hauens and creekes, one thousand five hundred pounds sterling. The lord Barod of the gard, his yearelye reuenues beside hauens & creekes one thousand one hundred pounds sterling. The lord Steineie of Baltmore, his yearelye reuenue beside hauens and creekes, eight hundred pounds sterling. The lord Koch of Pole castell, his yearelye reuenues besides hauens and creekes, ten thousand pounds sterling. The kings maiestie hath the lands of the late yong Barrie by forfeiture, the yearelye reuenue whereof, besides two rivers and creekes, and all other casualties, is one thousand eight hundred pounds sterling.

And that at the end of this parlement, your lordship, with the kings most noble counsell may come to Corke, & call before you all these lordes, and other Irishmen, and bind them in paine of losse of life, lands and goods, that neuer one of them doe make warre vpon an other, without licence or commandement of you my lord deputie, and the kings counsell; for the better destruction of these parts is that onelie cause. And once all the Irishmen, and the kings enemies were diuised into a great ballie called Clane onight, betwixt two great mounteines called Maccozt, or the leprous Iland: and there they liued long and manie yeares with their white meat, till at the last these English lordes fell at variance among themselves, and then the weakest part toke certene Irishmen to take their part, and so banquished their enemies. And thus fell the English lordes at warre among themselves, till the Irishmen were stronger than they, and drave them awaie, and now haue the countrie whole vnder them; but that the lord Koch, the lord Barrie, and the lord Curcie onelie remaine with the least part of their ancestors possessions: and yong Barrie is there vpon the kings portion, paieng his grace neuer a penne rent. Therefore we the kings poze subiects of the citie of Corke, Kinsale, and Boghall, desire your lordship to send hither two good iustices to see this matter ordered, and some English captains with twentie Englishmen that may be captains ouer vs all: and we will rise with them to redresse these enormities all at our owne costs. And if you will not come nor send, we will send ouer to our liege lord the king, and complaine on you all. Thus far that letter.

And as saith Campion, at this date the citie of Corke is so incombred with vniquiet neighbors of great power, that they are forced to gard their gates continuallie, & to keepe them shut at seruice times, at meales, and from sun setting to sun rising, not suffering anie stranger to enter the towne with his weapon, but to leaue the same at a lodge appointed. They dare vnneth at anie time walke abroad far from the towne for their recreation, except at seasons; and then with strength of men furnished with armoz and weapon for their safegard. They march in wedlocke among themselves, so that welnere the whole citie is alied and ioined together in consanguinitie. But now to returne vnto the doings of the earle of Desmond that was placed lord iustice in Scropps rowne. We doe find that in the yeare 1408 he called a parlement at Dublin, in which the statutes of Kilkennie and Dublin were effynes reuindod, and certene ordinances established vnder the great seale of England against puruocors. The same yeare, the morrow after Lammass date, the lord Thomas of Lancaster sonne to king Henrie the fourth, lord lieutenant of Ireland, landed at Carlinsford, and in the weeke following he came vnto Dublin, and put the earle of Kildare vnder arrest, comming to him with thre of his familie. He lost all his goods, being spoiled & rifled by the lord lieutenant his seruants, & himselfe kept still in prison in the castell of Dublin, till he had paid 300 marks fine.

On the daie of saint Marcell the martyr deceased the lord Stephan Scrope at Trilfeldermot. The same yeare also was the lord Thomas of Lancaster at Bilmannan wounded (I know not how) and vnneth escaped with life, and after caused summons to be giuen by proclamation, that all such as ought by their tenures to serue the king, should assemble at Kosse. And after the feast of saint Iulie, he held a parlement at Kilkennie for a tallage to be granted. And after the thirtieth of March, he returned into England, leaving the prioz of Bilmannan for his deputie in Ireland. This yeare also Hugh Macgillmore was slaine in Cragfergus within the church of the friers mmozs, which church he had before destroyed, and broken downe the glasse windowes to haue the iron bars, thorough which his enemies the Savages entred vpon him. This yeare being in the tenth of Henrie the fourth, in June, Janico de Artois with the Englishmen slue foure scoze of the Irish in Ulster. This yeare king Henrie gaue the sword to the citie of Dublin, which citie was first gouerned (as appeareth by their ancient seale called signum praposture) by a priozost; and in the thirtieth of Henrie the third by a maioz and two bailifes, which were changed into thiriffes, by charter granted by Edward the first, 1547.

This maioralitie, both for state and charge of office, and for bountifull hospitalitie, excaseth ante citie in England, London excepted. In the yeare following, the one and twentieth daie of Maie, a parlement began at Dublin, which lasted thre weekes, the prioz of Bilmannan sitting as lord iustice. The same yeare, the two and twentieth of June, the same iustice toke the castels of Mibyclide, Mferoll, and de la Pare. Ireland this yeare was foze afflicted for want of cozne. The lord iustice entred into the land of Dizen with 1500ernes, of which number eight hundred resoluted to the Irish, so that if the potwer of Dublin had not bene there, it had gon euill with the lord iustice: and yet he escaped not without losse, for John Werpatrike was slaine there. In the yeare 1411, marriages were celebrated among the nobilitie in Ireland. William Wesson married the daughter of Edward Paris, and John Mogan married with the eldest daughter of Christopher Wesson; and Walter de la Hyde with the second daughter of the same Christopher. In the yeare 1412, about the feast of Iulietus and Valerianus, which falleth on the tenth of Aprill, Mconthir did much mischief.

time called Atrium Dei. After his decease, Thomas Crauleie archbishop of Dublin was chosen lord iustice of Ireland. Janico de Artols led forth a power against Maginoys, a great lord of Ireland, but nere to a place called Inoz manie Englishmen were slaine. The morrow after saint Matthias daie, a parlement began againe at Dublin, which continued for the space of sixtene daies, in which meane time the Irish did much hurt by inuasions made into the English pale, and burning vp all the houses afore them that stood in their waie, as their vsual custom was in times of other parlements: whereupon a tallage was demanded, but not granted.

In the yeare 1414, the Englishmen fought with the Irish nere to Kilka, and slue an hundred of the enimies, whilst the archbishop being lord iustice in Crisseldermot, went in procession with his cleargie; praieing for the good speed of his men and other of the countrie that were gone forth to fight with the aduersaries. In the feast of saint Gordian and Epimachus, to wit the tenth of Maie, were the English of Meth discomfited by Deonhir and his Irish, where they slue Thomas Maureuar baron of Serin; and there were taken prisoners Christopher Fleming, John Dardis, and diuerse others, beside manie that were slaine.

On saint Martins euen sir John Talbot of Holumshire, lord Furnivale landed at Dalkeie, the kings lieutenant in Ireland, a man of great honoz. In the peere one thousand foure hundred and sixtene in Nouember, Robert Talbot, a right noble man that walled the suburbs of Kilkennie, departed this life. Also Patrike Baret bishop of Fernis deceased, and was buried among the canons at Benlis. This yeare on the feast daie of Geruasius and Prothasius which falleth on the nineteenth of June, the lord lieutenants wiue the ladie Furnivall was brought to bed at Finglasse of a sonne named Thomas. About the same time also Stephan Fleming archbishop of Armagh departed this life, after whome succeeded John Suanig. On the daie of saint Laurence the lord Furnivalls sonne Thomas Talbot that was borne at Finglasse in Nouember last past, departed this life, and was buried in the quere of the friers preachers church in Dublin. About the same time the Irish fell upon the Englishmen, and slue manie of them, among other Thomas Balimore of Baliquelan was one. The parlement which the last yeare had bene called and holden at Dublin, was this yeare removed to Trim, & there began the eleuenth of Maie, where it continued for the space of eleuen daies, in the which was granted to the lord lieutenant a subsidie in monie.

10 blin passed ouer into England, and deceased at Farlington, but his bodie was buried in the new college at Oxford. This man is greaillie praised for his liberalitie, he was a good almesman, a great clerke, a doctor of diuinitie, an excellent preacher, a great builder, beautifull, tall of stature, and sanguine of complexion. He was foure score and ten yeares of age when he died, and had gouerned the church of Dublin in god quiet by the space of twentie yerres. This yeare shortly after Easter, the lord deputie spoiled the tenants of Henrie Crus, and Henrie Wechat. Also at Plane on the feast daie of saint John and saint Paule, the erle of Kildare, sir Christopher Preston, and sir John Bedlow were arrested and committed to ward within the castell of Trim, because they sought to commune with the pzior of Kilmalman.

The nine and twentieth of June Matthew Husseie baron of Caltrim deceased, & was buried at the friers preachers of Trim. In the yeare one thousand foure hundred & nineteen a rotall counsell was holden at Maas, where was granted to the lord lieutenant a subsidie in monie. The same yeare upon Cenehurst daie Dhyrell took foure hundred kine that belonged vnto Balimore, so breaking the peace contrarie to his oth. The fourth ides of Maie, Mac Murch chiefe capteine of his nation, and of all the Irish in Leinster was taken prisoner, and the same daie was sir Hugh Cokesie made knight. The last of Maie the lord lieutenant, and the archbishop of Dublin with the maior rased the castell of Beninie. The morrow after the feast daie of Processus and Martinianus, that is the twentieth of June, the lord William de Burgh and other Englishmen slue five hundred Irishmen, & took Dkellie. On the feast daie of Marie Magdalen the lord lieutenant Talbot returned into England, leaving his deputie there the archbishop of Dublin. This yeare about saint Laurence daie, diuerse went forth of Ireland to serue the king in his warres of Normandie, as Thomas Butler that was pzior of Kilmalman, and manie others. John Fitzhenrie succeeded the said Butler in gouernment of the pziorie of Kilmalman. The archbishop of Dublin that remained as lord deputie slue thirte Irishmen nere vnto Rodislon. Also the thirteenth of Februarie John Fitzhenrie pzior of Kilmalman departed this life, and William Fitzthomas was chosen to succeed in his place, and was confirmed the morrow after saint Valentines daie.

30 40 50 James Butler earle of Ormond appointed the kings lieutenant in Ireland, in place of John lord Talbot and Furnivall, landed at Waterford about the fourth ides of Aprill: and shortly after his comming ouer, he caused a combat to be fought betwixt two of his cousins, of whom the one was slaine in that place, and the other carried awaie soze wounded. On saint Georges daie, he held a counsell in Dublin, & summoned a parlement to begin there the seuenth of June. In the meane while he fetcht great booties out of the countries of the Irish lords, Dacie, Mac Mahon, and Maginois. But first yer we go further to shew what Marlburrow hath noted of the doings, whilst this earle of Ormond gouerned as the kings lieutenant in Ireland, we haue thought good to set downe what Campion also writeth thereof, as thus.

60 In the red moze of Athie (the sunne almost lodged in the west, and miraculoullie standing still in his epicle by the space of thre houres, till the feat was accomplished, and no hole nor quakenire in all that bog annoteng either horse or man of his part) he banquished Ormore and his terrible armie with a few of his owne meinie, and with the like number he bles then toward in Ireland : which letter exemplified by sir Henrie Sidneie lord deputie, a great searcher and preseruer of antiquities, as it came to Campions hands, and by him set downe we haue thought good likewise to present it here to your view.

To the right worshipfull, and with all mine heart entierlie beloued brother, the earle of Salisburie.

The copie of a letter.

Right worshipfull, & with all my hart, entierlie beloued brother, I recommend me vnto you as heartlie as I can. And like it you to wit, sith I wrote last vnto the king our soueraigne lord his highnesse, the Irish enimie, that is to saie Magoghigam, and with him thre or foure Irish capteins, associat with a great fellowship of English rebels, notwithstanding that they were within the king our soueraigne lord his peace, of great malice, and against all truth haue maligned against their legiance, and vengeable haue bent a great towne of mine inheritance in Metch, called Kamoze, and other villages thereabouts, and murdered and bent both men, women, and children, withouten mercie : the which enimies be yet assembled in woods and forts, alwaighing to do the hurt and gréuance to the kings subiects, that they can thinke or imagine. For which cause I write at this time vnto the kings highnesse, and beseech his good grace for to hasten my payment for this land, according vnto his letters of warrant now late directed vnto the tresuroz of England, to the intent I may wage men in sufficient number for to resist the malice of the same enimies, & punish them in such wise, that other which would do the same for lacke of resistance, in time maie take example. For doubtlesse, but if my payment be had in all hast, for to haue men of warre in defense and safegard of this land; my power can not stretch to keepe it in the kings obedifance; and verie necessitie will compell me to come into England to liue there vpon my poze liuelihod. For I had leauer be dead than anie inconuenience should fall ther vnto by my default: for it shall neuer be chronicled nor remaine in scripture (by the grace of God) that Ireland was lost by my negligence. And therefore I beseech you right worshipfull brother, that you will hold to your hands instantlie, that my payment maie be had at this time in escheuing all inconueniences. For I haue example in other places (more pittie it is) for to dread shame, and for to acquit my troth vnto the kings highnesse, as my dutie is. And this I praye and exhort you good brother, to shew vnto his good grace, and that you will be so good, that this language maie be inacted at this present parliament for mine excuse in time to come, and that you will be good to my seruant Roger Ro the bearer of these, and to my other seruants, in such things as they shall pursue vnto the kings highnesse, and to giue full faith and credence vnto the report of the said Roger, touching the said matters. Right worshipfull, and with all my heart entierlie beloued brother, our blessed Lord God preserue and keepe you in all honour, prosperous estate, and felicitie, & grant you right good life and long. Written at Dublin the fiftenth daie of June.

Your faithfull true brother Richard Yorke.

Magoghigam his power.

Of such power was Magoghigam in those daies, who as he was and kept it by the sword, so now his successors in that state liue but as meane capteins, yelding their winnings to the stronger. This is the miserie of lawlesse people, resembling the rudenesse of the rude world, wherein euerie man was richer and pozer than other, as he was in might and blou-lence more or lesse inabled. Here began factions of the nobilitie in Ireland, fauouring diuerse sides that strone for the crowne of England. For the duke of Forke, in those ten yeares of his gouernement, ex-ceedinglie wan the hearts of the noblemen and gentlemen of that land, of the which diuerse were claime with him at Wakefield; as the contrarie part was the next yeare by his sonne Edward earle of March at Mortimers crosse in Wales. In which meane time the Irish grew hardie, & vsurped the English countries in sufficientlie defended, as they had done by like oportunitie in the latter end of Richard the second. These two seasons set them so adrift, that henceforward they could neuer be cast out from their forcible possessions, holding by plaine wrong all Ulster, and by certeine Irish tenures no small portions of Mounster and Connagh, least in Metch and Leinster, where the cruell sabieats of the English blood did euer most pzenaile.

Edward the fourth and Edward the fifth.

Thomas Fitzmorice earle of Kildare, lord iustice till the third yeare of Edward the fourth, after which time the duke of Clarence, brother to the king, had the office of lieutenant while he liued, & made his deputies by sundry turnes, Thomas earle of Desmond, John Tiptot earle of Worcester the kings cousin, Thomas earle of Kildare, and Henrie lord Grete of Ruthin. Great was the credit of the Geraldins euer when the house of Forke prospered, and likewise the Butlers shi-ued vnder the bloud of the Lancasters: for which cause the earle of Desmond remained manie yerres deputie to George duke of Clarence his godbro-ther: but when he had spoken certeine disdainfull wordes against the late marriage of king Edward with the ladie Elizabeth Grete, the said ladie bring now queene, caused his trade of life after the Irish maner, contrarie to sundrie old statutes inacted in that behalfe, to be sifted and examined by John erle of Worcester his successor; so that he was atteinted of treason, condemned, and for the same beheaded at Droghedagh.

James the father of this Thomas earle of Desmond, being suffered and not controlled, during the gouernment of Richard duke of Forke his godceper, and of Thomas earle of Kildare his kinsman, put vpon the kings subiects within the countreies of Waterford, Corke, Kerrie, and Limerike, the Irish impositions of quins and liuerie, cartings, carriages, lodgings, cocherings, bonnaght, and such like, which customes are the verie breeders, mainte-ners, and vpholders of all Irish enmities, living from the poze tenants euerlasting lesse, allowance of meat and monie, whereby their bodie and goods were brought in seruice and thraldome, so that the men of warre, horsles, and their Galloglasses lie still vpon the farmers, eat them out, begger the coun-trie, foster a sort of idle vagabonds, ready to rebell if their lord command them, euer nuzled in stealth and robberies.

These enill presidents giuen by the father, the son did exercise, being lord deputie, to whome the reso-mation of that disorder speciallie belonged. Not withstanding the same fault being winked at in other, and with such rigor auenged in him, was manifestlie taken for a quarrell sought and procured.
Two yeares after, the said earle of Worcester lost his head, whilſt Henrie the ſixt taken out of the tower was ſet vp againe, and king Edward proclaimed uſurper, and then was Kildare enlarged, whom likewiſe atteinted, they thought alſo to haue rid, and ſhortlie both the earles of Kildare & Deſmond were reſtoꝛed to their bloud by parlement. Sir Rowland Cufface, ſometime treaſuroꝛ and lord chancelloꝛ, was laſtlie alſo lord deputie of Ireland. He founded ſaint Francis abbey beſide Kilcolnen bydye. King Edward a yeaꝛe befoꝛe his death honozed his yonger ſonne (Richard duke of Yorke) with the title of lieutenant ouer this land, which he enioied till his vnaturall vnkle bereft both him and his brother king Edward the ſixt of their naturall liues.

Richard the third.

When this monſter of nature & cruell tyrant Richard the third had killed his two yonger nephewes, and taken vpon him the crowne & gouernement of England, he preferred his owne ſonne Edward to the dignitie of lord lieutenant of Ireland, whoſe deputie was Gerald earle of Kildare that bare that office all the reigne of king Richard, and a while in Henrie the ſeuenth his daies.

Henrie the ſeuenth.

In which earle came the wiſe prieſt ſir Richard Simon, bringing with him a lad that was his ſcholer, named Lambert, whome he ſeined to be the ſonne of George earle of Clarence, latelie eſcaped forth of the tower of London. And the boie could reckon by his pedegree ſo readilie, & had learned of the prieſt ſuch princelie behauiour, that he lightlie moued the ſaid earle, and manie others the nobles of Ireland (tendering as well the linage roſe all of Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, and his ſonne George their countreiman boꝛne, as alſo maligning the advancement of the houſe of Lancaſter in Henrie the ſeuenth) either to thinke or to ſaie, that the world might beleeue they thought verelie this child to be Edward earle of Marwiſke, the duke of Clarence his lawfull ſonne.

And although king Henrie moꝛe than halfe mared their ſpoꝛt, in ſhewing the right earle through all the ſtreets of London, yet the ladie Margaret duches of Burgongne, ſiſter to Edward the fourth, his nephew John de la Poole, the lord Louell, ſir Thomas Broughton knight, and diuers other captains of this conſpiracie, deuised to abuſe the colour of this yonger earles name, ſoꝛ preferring their purpoſe: which if it came to god, they agreed to depole Lambert, and to crea the verie earle indeed, now priſoner in the tower, ſoꝛ whoſe quarrell had they pretended to fight, they deemed it likelie he ſhould haue bene made a waie. Wherefoꝛe it was blazed in Ireland, that the king to mocke his ſubiects, had ſchooled a boie to take vpon him the earle of Marwiſkes name, and had thewed him about London, to blind the eyes of the ſimple folke, and to defeat the lawfull inheritour of the good duke of Clarence their countreiman and protectoꝛ during his life, vnto whoſe linage they alſo deriued title in right to the crowne.

In all haſt they aſſembled at Dublin, and there in Chriſts church they crowned this idoll, honozing him with titles imperfall, ſeaſting and triumphing, raiſing mightie ſhoutſ and cries, carrieng him from thence to the caſtell vpon tall mens ſhoulders, that he might be ſene and noted, as he was ſure an honorable child to loke vpon. Herewith aſſembliſſing their forces together, they prouided themſelues of ſhips, and imbarcking therein, they toke the ſea, and landing in Lancashire, paſſed forwards, till they came to ſelwarke vpon Trent. Therevpon inſued the battell of Stoke, commonlie called Martins Swarts field, wherein Lambert and his maſter were taken, but yet pardoned of life, and were not executed. The erle of Lincolne, the lord Louell, Martin Swart, the Almaine captaine, and Maurice Fitzthomas, captaine of the Iriſh, were ſlaine, and all their power diſcomfited, as in the Engliſh hiftorie it may further appeare. Jaſper duke of Bedford, and earle of Denbroke lieutenant, and Walter archbiſhop of Dublin his deputie.

In this time befell another like Iriſh illuſion, procured by the duchesse aforeſaid, and certeine nobles in England, whereby was exalted as rightfull king of England, and vndoubted earle of Ulſter, the counterſeit Richard duke of Yorke, preferred from king Richards crueltie (as the adherents faced the matter downe) and with this maigame lord, named indeed Peter (in ſcoꝛne Perkin) Warbecke, they flattered themſelues manie yeaꝛes after. Then was ſir Edward Poynings knight ſent ouer lord deputie, with commiſſion to apprehend Warbeckes principall parteners in Ireland: amongſt whom was named Gerald Fitzgerald, whoſe purgation the king (notwithſtanding diuerſe ſurmiſing and aſſouing the contrarie) did accept. After much ado, Perkin being taken, confeſſed by his owne writing the courſe of his whole life, and all his proceedings in this enterpriſe, whereof in the Engliſh hiftorie, as we haue boꝛrowed the ſame ſoꝛth of Halles chronicles, we may read moꝛe, and therefore here we haue omitted to ſpeake further of that matter.

In the yeaꝛe 1501, king Henrie made lieutenant of Ireland his ſecond ſonne Henrie, as then duke of Yorke, who after reigned by the name of Henrie the eighth. To him was appointed deputie the aforeſaid Gerald erle of Kildare, who accompanied with John Blake maſter of Dublin, waꝛred vpon William le Burgh, O'Brien, and Mac Pemarre, Deatroull, and fought with the greateſt potuer of Iriſhmen that had bene together ſince the conqueſt, vnder the hill of Anocktoꝛ, in Engliſh the hill of the Arres, ſix miles from Galowate, and two miles from Belliclare Burghes manour towne. Mac William and his complices were there taken, his ſouldiers that eſcaped the ſwoꝛd were purſued ſlaing, ſoꝛ the ſpace of ſixe miles: great ſlaughter was made of them, and manie captains caught, without the loſſe of one Engliſhman. The earle of Kildare at his retourne was made knight of the noble order of the garter, and liued in woꝛthie eſtimacion all his life long, as well foꝛ this ſeruiſe, as diuerſe other his famous exploits.

Thus farre the Iriſh Chronicles continued and ended at Henrie the ſeauenth.

perience infallible proueth. For man by course of nature is so parcialle affected to himselfe and his blood, as he will be more agreeued with the chronicler for recording a peeuissh trespassse, than he will be offended with his friend for committing an heinous treason. Ouer this, if the historian be long, he is accompted a trifier: if he be short, he is taken for a summister: if he commend, he is twighted for a flatterer: if he reprocue, he is holden for a carper: if he be pleasant, he is noted for a iester: if he be graue, he is reckoned for a drooper: if he misdate, he is named a falsifier: if he once but trip, he is tearmed a stumbler: so that let him beare himselfe in his chronicle as vprightlie and as conscionable as he may possible, yet he shall be sure to find them that will be more prest to blab forth his pelfish faults, than they will be readie to blaze out his good deserts. Others there be, that although they are nor able to reprocue what is written, yet they will be sure to cast in his dish what is forgotten. Heere, saie they, this exploit is omitted: there that policie is not detected: heere this saieng would haue beene interlaced: there that trecherie should haue beene displaid. These & the like discom-modities, with which historiographers are vsuallie cloid, haue borne backe diuers and fundrie willing minds, who taking the waie to be thornie, the credit slipperie, the carpers to be manie, would in no case be medlers, choosung rather to sit by their owne fire obscurelie at home, than to be baited with enuious toongs openlie abroad.

Others on the contrarie side, being resolute fellows, and trampling vnder foot these curious faultfinders, would not sticke to put themselues forth in presse, and maugre all their hearts, to buskle forward, and rush through the pikes of their quipping nips, and biting frumps. But I taking the meane betweene both these extremities, held it for better, not to be so faint and peeuissh a meacocke, as to shrinke in heart, as to prance and iet like a proud gennet through the street, not weighing the barking of currish bandogs. And therefore, if I shall be found in mine historie sometime too tedious, sometime too spare, sometime too fawning in commending the liuing, sometime too flat in reproouing the dead : I take God to witnesse, that mine offense therein proceedeth of ignorance, and not of set wilfulnesse. But as for the passing ouer in silence of diuerse euent(s) (albeit the law or rather the liber-tie of an historie requireth that all should be related, and nothing whusted) yet I must confesse, that as I was not able, vpon so little leasure, to know all that was said or doone; so I was not willing for sundrie respects, to write euerie trim tram that I knew to be said or doone. And if anie be ouerthwartlie waiwarded, as he will sooner long for that I haue omitted, than he will be contented with that I haue chroni-cled; I cannot deuise in my iudgement a better waie to satisfie his appetite, than with one Dolie, a peintor of Oxford, his answer: who being appointed to tricke out the ten commandements, omitted one, and pourtraied but nine. Which fault espied by his maister that hired him, Dolie answered, that in verie deed he peinted but nine: howbeit, when he vnderstood that his master had well obserued and kept the nine commandements that alreadie were drawne, he gaue his word at better leisure throughlie to finish the tenth. And truelie so must I saie: I haue laid downe heere to the reader his view, a breefe discourse, wherof I trust he shall take no great surfet. And when I am aduertised, that he will digest the thin fare that heere is disht before him: it may be (God willing) heereafter, that he shall find my booke, with store of more licorous deinties farfed and furnished; leauing to his choise, either nicelie to pickle, or greedilie to swallow, as much as to his contentation shall best beseeme him. Wherefore my good lord, sith I may not denie, but that the worke is painfull, and I doo forecast that the misconstruction may be perilous: the toile-somnesse of the paine I refer to my priuat knowledge, the abandoning of the pe-rill, I commit to your honorable patronage, not doubting thereby to be sheel-ded against the sinister glosing of malicious interpretors. Thus betaking your lordship to God, I craue your attentiuenes, in perusing a cantell or parcell of the Irish historie that heere insueth.

RICHARD STANIHVRS.

CITIZEN Fitzgiralde earle of Kildare, son to Thomas Fitzgiralde, of whom mention hath bene made in the latter end of the former storie, a mighty man of stature, full of honor & courage, who had bene repute & lord justice of Ireland first & last 33 yeeres, deceased at Kildare the third of September, & lieth intombed in the quere of Christes church at Dublin, in a chappell by him founded. Betwene him & James Butler earle of Ormond (their owne gelousies fed with enuie & ambition, kindled with certeine lewd factious abettors of either side) as generally to all noblemen, so especiallie to both these houses verie incident, ever since the ninth yeare of Henrie the seventh, bred some trouble in Ireland. The plot of which mutuall grudge was grounded vpon the factious dissention, that was raised in England betwene the houses of Yorke & Lancaster, Kildare cleaving to Yorke, and Ormond relenging to Lancaster. To the upholding of which discord, both these noble men laboured with tooth and nail to ouercrow, and consequentlie to ouerthrow one the other. And for so much as they were in honour peeres, they wrought by hoke and by crooke to be in authoritie superiours. The gouernement therefore in the reigne of Henrie the seventh, being cast on the house of Kildare; James earle of Ormond a deepe and a farre reaching man, giuing backe like a butting ram to strike the harder push, deuised to inueigle his aduersarie by submission & courtesie, being not then able to ouermatch him with stoutnesse or preheminnence. Wherevpon Ormond addressed his letters to the deputie, specifying a slander raised on him and his, that he purposed to deface his gouernement, and to withstand his authoritie. And for the clearing of himselfe and of his adherents, so it stood with the deputie his pleasure, he would make his spædie repaire to Dublin, & there in an open audience would purge himselfe of all such odious crimes, of which he was longfullie suspected.

The occasion of the dissention betwene Kildare and Ormond.

Ormond marcheth to Dublin.

To this reasonable request had the lord deputie no sooner condescended, than Ormond with a puissant armie marched towards Dublin, incamping in an abbeye in the suburbs of the citie, named saint Thomas court. The approaching of so great an armie of the citizens suspected, and also of Kildares coun-cellors greatlie disliked, lastlie the extortion that the lawlesse souldiers used in the pale by seuerall complaints detected: these three points, with diuerse other suspicious circumstances laid and put together, did minister occasion rather of further discord, than of anie present agreement. Ormond persisting still in his humble sute, sent his messenger to the lord deputie, declaring that he was prest and readie to accomplish the tenour of his letters, and there did attend (as became him) his lordship his pleasure. And as for the companie, he brought with him from Ormonster, albeit suspicious bzaines did rather of a malicious craftinesse surmise the worst, than of charitable wisdomedid iudge the best; yet notwithstanding, vpon conference had with his lordship, he would not doubt to satisfie him at full in all points, wherewith he could be with anie colour charged, and so to stop by the spring, from whence all the enuious suspicions gushed. Kildare with this mild message intreated, appointed the meeting to be at saint Patrickes church: where they were ripping by one to another their mutuall quarrels, rather recounting the damages they susteined, than acknowledging the iniuries they offered: the citizens and Ormond his armie fell at some iar, for the oppression and exaction with which the souldiers surcharged them. With whom as part of the citizens bickered, so a round knot of archers rushed into the church, meaning to haue murdered Ormond, as the capteine and bellwedder of all the lawlesse rabble. The earle of Ormond suspecting that he had bene betrayed, fled to the chapter house, put to the doze, sparring it with might and maine. The citizens in their rage, imagining that euerie post in the church had bene one of the souldiers, shot hab o' nab at randon vpon the roodloft and to the chancel, leauing some of their arrowes sticking in the images.

The citie in an vpprope.

Kildare pursuing Ormond to the chapter house doze, undertooke on his honor that he should recelue no villanie. Where vpon the recluse crauing his lordships hand to assure him his life, there was a clift in the chapter house doze, pearled at a trife, to the end both the earles should haue shaken hands and be reconciled. But Ormond surmising that this vylt was intended for some further treacherie, that if he would stretch out his hand, it had bene percase chopt off, refused that proffer; untill Kildare stretcht in his hand to him, and so the doze was opened, they both embraced the storme appeased, and all their quarrels for that present rather discontinued than ended. In this garboile, one of the citizens, surnamed Blanche field was slaine. This latter quarrell being like a greene wound, rather bungerlie botcht than soundlie cured, in that Kildare suspected that so great an armie (which the other alledged to be brought for the gard of his person) to haue bene of purpose assembled, to outface him & his power in his owne countrie. And Diamond mistrusted, that this treacherous practise of the Dublinians was by Kildare deuised. These and the like surmises lightlie by both the noble men misdemned, and by the continuall twatling of siring clauwbaks in their eares whispered, bred and fostered a malice betwixt them and their posteritie, manie yeeres incurable, which caused much stir and vniquietnesse in the realme, untill the confasion of the one house and the nonage of the other ended and buried their mutuall quarrels.

The description of D:
mond.
The description of Kildare.

Diamond was nothing inferiour to the other in stomach, and in reach of policie far beyond him. Kildare was in gouernement mild, to his enemies sterne, to the Irish such a scourge, that rather for despite of him than for fauor of anie part, they relied for a time to Diamond, came vnder his protection, serued at his call, performed by starts (as their manner is) the dutie of good subiects. Diamond was secret and of great forecast, verie staied in speech, dangerous of euerie trifle that touched his reputation. Kildare was open and plaine, hardlie able to rule himselfe when he were moued to anger, not so sharpe as thort, being easilie displeased and soner appeased. Being in a rage with certeine of his seruants for faults they committed, one of his horsemen offered master Boice (a gentleman that reteined to him) an Irish hobbie, on condition, that he would plucke an haire from the earle his beard. Boice taking the proffer at rebound, stept to the earle (with whose good nature he was throughlie acquainted) parching in the heat of his choler, and said: So it is, and if it like your good lordship, one of your horsemen promised me a chosse hoise, if I snip one haire from your beard. Well quoth the earle, I agree thereto, but if thou plucke anie more than one, I promise thee to bring my fist from thine eare.

Engl.

The branch of this good nature hath bene deriued from him to an earle of his posteritie, who being in a chafe for the wrong satwcing of a partridge, arose suddenlie from the table, meaning to haue reasoned the matter with his coke. Having entred the kitchen, drowning in oblivion his chalenge, he began to commend the building of the roome, wherein he was at no time before, & so leaning the coke vncontroll, he returned to his ghests merilie. This old earle being (as is aforesaid) some hot and some cold, was of the English well beloued, a good iusticer, a suppressor of the rebels, a warrior incomparable, towards the nobles that he fassled not somewhat headlong and vnrulic. Being charged before Henrie the seventh, for burning the church of Cashell, and manie wickednesses prepared to aduouch against him the truth of that article, he suddenlie confessed the fact, to the great wondrous and detestation of the councill. When it was looked how he wold iustifie the matter; By Iesus (quoth he) I would neuer haue done it, had it not bene told me that the archbishop was within. And because the same archbishop was one of his busiest accusers there present, the king merilie laughed at the plainnesse of the noble man, to see him alledge that thing for excuse, which most of all did aggrauate his offense.

The last article against him they conceived in these termes; If in alie all Ireland can not rule this earle. No: quoth the king: then in god faith shall this earle rule all Ireland. Thus was that accusation turned to a least. The earle returned to his countrie lord deputie, who (notwithstanding his simplicitie in peace) was of that valour and policie in war, as his name bred a greater terror to the Irish, than other mens armes. In his warres he used for policie a retchlesse kind of diligence, or a headie carelesnesse, to the end his souldiours should not faint in their attempts, were th' enimie of neuer so great power. Seeing generall in the field of Knocknow, where in effect all the Irish rebels of Ireland were gathered against the English pale, one of the earle his capteins presented him a band of kerns, euen as they were ready to ioine battell, and withall demanded of the earle in what seruice he would haue them imployed: Marie (quoth he) let them stand by and giue vs the gaze. Such was his courage, that notwithstanding his enemies were two to one: yet would he set so good a face on the matter, as his souldiours should not once suspect, that he either needed, or longed for anie further helpe.

Having triumphantlie banquished the Irish in that conflict, he was shortly after, as well for that, as other his valiant exploits, made knight of the garter: and in the fift yeare of Henrie the eight in that renowne & honour he died, wherein for the space of manie yeares he liued. No maruell if this success were a cosse to the aduerser part, which the longer it held aloofe, and bit the byble, the more egerlie it followed the course, having once got scope and roome at will, as shall be hereafter at full declared. Diamond bearing in mind the treacherie of the Dublinians, procured such as were the graneest prelates of his clergy, to intimate to the court of Rome the heathenish riot of the citizens of Dublin, in rushing into the church armed, polluting with slaughter the consecrated place, defacing the images, profanating the reliques, raising downe altars, with barbarous outeries, more like miscreant Saracens, than christian catholikes. Whereupon a legat was possted to Ireland, bending his course to Dublin, where some after hee was solemnlie receiued by Walter Fitzsimons, archbishop of Dublin, a grane prelat, for his learning and wisdom chosen to be one of king Henrie the seventh his chapleins, in which vocation he continued twelue yeares, and after was aduanced to be archbishop of Dublin.

Walter Fitzsimons.

The legat vpon his arriuall indicted the citie for his execrable offense: but at length, by the procurement as well of the archbishop as of all the cleargie, he was weighed to giue the citizens absolution with this caveat, that in detestation of so horrible a fact, and Ad perpetuam rei memoriam, the mayor of Dublin should go barefooted throughout the citie in open procession before the sacrament, on Corpus Christi date: which penitent satisfaction was after in euerie such procession duly accomplished. Gerald Fitzgerrald, sonne and heire to the aforesaid erle of Kildare, was shortly after his fathers decease constituted lord deputie of Ireland, before whom in the seventh yeare of Henrie the eight, there was a parliament holden at Dublin, wherein it was established, that all such as bying out of England the kings letters of priuat seale, for particular causes against anie of the king his subiects in Ireland, should find sufficient suerties in the king his chancerie in Ireland; to bee bound by recognisance, that the plaintife shall satisfie the defendant, that purgeth or acquitteth himselfe of the matter to him alledged, for his costs and damages sustained by such wrongfull veration. This noble man being valiant and well spoken, was nothing inferior to his father in martiall prowesse, chafing in the time of his gouernment the familie of the Welles, battering Ocarrell his castels, and byinging in awe alie the Irish of the land.

manifold were the miseries the ladie Margaret suffered, hir husband Piers Butler being so eagerlie pursued by the usurper, as he durst not beare up hed, but was forced to houer and lurke in woods and forests. The noble woman being great with child, and vpon necessitie constrained to vse a spare diet (for hir onelie sustenance was milke) she longed soze for wine, and calling hir lord, and a trustie seruant of his, James White vnto hir, she requested them both to helpe hir to some wine, for she was not able anie longer to indure so strict a life. Tralie Margaret, quoth the earle of Ossorie, thou shalt haue soze of wine withyn this foure and twentie houres, or else thou shalt feed alone on milke for me.

Patrike Fitzsimons.

The next daie following, Piers hauing intelligence that his enemy the base Butler would haue trauelled from Donmore to Kilkennie, notwithstanding he were accompanied with six horsemen: yet Piers hauing none but his lackie, did follow him in the waie, and with a couragious charge gozed the bastard through with his speare. This prosperous calme succeeding the former boisterous storme, the ladie Margaret began to take heart, hir naturall stoutnesse floted, as well by the remembrance of hir noble birth, as by the intelligence of hir honorable match. Kildare all this while kept in authoritie, notwithstanding the pulshes giuen against him by secret heauers that enuied his fortune, and sought to nourish the old grudge, was at length by their priuite packing fetched vp to the court of England by commission, and caused him to be examined vpon diuerse interrogatozies touching the affaires of Ireland.

He left in his roome Maurence Fitzthomas of Lachragh lord iustice: and shortly after came ouer lord lieutenant Thomas Howard earle of Surreie, who was after duke of Norfolk, grandfather to the last duke, accompanied with two hundred peomen of the crowne: before whome, shortly after his repaire thither, there was a parlement holden at Dublin, in which there past an act, that all wilfull burning of coyne, as well in reekes in the fields, as also in villages and townes, should be high treason. Item, an act against loding of wolle & flos, vpon paine of forfeiture of the double value of the same, the one halfe to the king, and the other halfe to him that will sue therefoze. Item, that anie person seized of lands, rents, or tenements in possession or in vse, vnto the pearcelle value of ten markes aboue the charges, in fee simple, fee taile, or for terme of life, copie hold, or ancient demeane, shall passe in euerie attaint. While the lord lieutenant sat at dinner in the castell, of Dublin, he heard newes that the Mozes with a maine armie were euen at the entrie of the borders, ready to inuade the English pale. Immediatlie men were leuied by John Fitzsimons then maior of Dublin, and the next morrow joining them vnto his band, the lieutenant marched towards the frontiers of Leix.

The Mozes vpon the lieutenant his appoach, scattered themselves into sundrie companies, and vnderstanding that the cariage was dragging after the armie, and slenderlie manned, certeine of them charged the lieutenant his seruants, and such of the citizens as were appointed to gard the cariage. Patrike Fitzsimons, a strong sturdie ponker, kept the enemies such tacke, as he chased part of them awaie, rescued the cariage, slue two of the rebels, and brought the heads with him to maister maior his tent. The next morning, two of the lieutenant his men, that slunke awaie from Fitzsimons, thinking that the cariage had bene lost, aduertised their lord that Fitzsimons fled awaie; and the Mozes were so mane in companie, as it had bene but follie for two to bicker with so great a number. The lieutenant posted in a rage to the maior his paullion, telling him that his man Fitzsimons was a cowardlie traitor: in running awaie, when he should haue defended the cariage.

What am I, my lord (quoth Patrike Fitzsimons) skipping in his shirt out of the tent, with both the heads in his hand? My lord, I am no coward, I stood to my tacklings when your men gaue me the slip, I rescued the cariage, and haue here sufficient tokens of my manhood, tumbling downe both the heads. Saist thou so Fitzsimons, quoth the lieutenant: I crie thee mercie, and by this George, I would to God it had bene my good hap to haue bene in thy companie in that skirmish. So drinkeing to Fitzsimons in a boll of wine, and honourable rewarding him for his good seruice, he returned to his paullion, where hauing knowledge of Mozes his recule, he pursued him with a troope of horsemen. The lieutenant thus passing forwards, was espied a gunner of Mozes, who lodged close in a wood side, and watching his time, he discharged his peece at the verie face of the lieutenant, strake the visor off his helmet, and feared no further, as God would.

This did he (retchlesse in maner that became of himselfe, so he might amaze the armie for a time) and surelie hereby he brake the swiftnesse of their following, & aduantaged the flight of his captaine, which thing he wane with the price of his owne blood. For the souldiours would no further, till they had ransacked all the nookes of this wood, verelie suspecting some ambush thereabout, and in seuerall knots scattered out this gunner, whome Fitzwilliams and Bedolow of the Koch were faine to mangle and to hew in peeces, because the wretch would neuer yield. In the meane while, defiance was proclaimed with France and Scotland both at once, which moued the king to call home Surreie out of Ireland, that he might imploie him in those wars. His prowesse, integritie, good nature, and course of gouernment, the countrie much commended. Piers Butler earle of Ossorie was appointed lord deputie. In the meane time, Kildare attending the king his pleasure for his dispatch, recovered fauour through the instance of the marques Dorset, whose daughter dame Elizabeth Greie he espoused, and so departed home. Now was partaker of all the deputies counsell one Robert Talbot of Belgard, whome the Giraldines deadlie hated: him they procured to keepe a kalendar of all their doings, who incensed brother against brother. In which rage, James FitzGirald meeting the said gentleman beside Wallmoze, slue him euen then vpon his iourneie toward the deputie to keepe his Christmas with him.

With this despitesull murder both sides brake out into open enimitie, and especiallie the countesse of Ossorie, Kildare his sister, a rare woman, and able for wisdom to rule a realme, had not hir stomach ouerruled hir knowledge. Here began informations of new treasons, passing to and fro, with complaints and replies. But the marques Dorset had wrought so for his forme in law, that he was suffered to rest at home, and onelie commissioners directed into Ireland, with authoritie to examine the root of their griefes: wherein if they found Kildare anie thing at all purged, their instructions were to depose the plaintiffe, and to sweare the other lord deputie. Commissioners were these, sir Rafe Egerton, a knight of Cheshire, Anthoine Fitzherbert, second iustice of the common plaes, and James Denton, deane of Litchfield; who hauing examined these accusations, suddentlie toke the sword from the earle of Ossorie, sware Kildare lord deputie, before whome Con O'neale bare the sword that daie.

berelie trust, your honors shall see the pzoefe by the thing it selfe, within these few daies. But go to: suppose he neuer be had? What is Kildare to blame for it, more than my good brother of Ossioe, who no withstanding his high promises, hauing also the kings power, is yet content to bring him in at leisure? Can not the erle of Desmond shift but I must be of counsell? Cannot he hide him except I winke? If he be close am I his mate? If he be freended am I a traitor? This is a doubtie kind of accusation, which they vse against me, wherein they are stabled and mited at my first deniall. You would not see him (saie they.) Who made them so familiar with mine eyesight? When was the erle within my view? Who stood by when I let him slip? Where are the tokens of my wilfull hudwinkie? But you sent him word to beware of you. Who was the messenger? Where are the letters? Conuince my negatians, see how lose this idle geare hangeth together. Desmond is not taken. Well, you are in fault. This? Because you are. Who proueth it? No bodie. What conuincens? So it seemeth. To whom? To your enemies. Who told it them? They will sweare it. What other ground? None. Will they sweare it my lord? Why then of like they know it, either they haue mislie hand to shew, or can bring forth the messenger, or were present at a conference, or pziue to Desmond, or some bodie betrayed it to them, or they themselves were my carriers or vicegerents therein: which of these parts will they chose, for I know them too well. To reckon my selfe content by their bare words or headlesse sayings, or frantike othes, were but mere mockerie. My letter were some read, were any such writing extant, my seruants & friends are ready to be sifted: of my coufine of Desmond they may lie lowly, since no man here can well contrarte them. Touching my selfe, I neuer noted in them much wit, or so fast faith, that I would haue gaged on their flence the life of a good hound, much lesse mine owne. I doubt not, may it like your honors to appose them, how they came to the knowledge of those matters, which they are so ready to depose: but you shall find their tongues charmed to another man his trencher, and as it were knights of the post, forbidden to saie, sweare and stave the uttermost they can, as those that passe not what they saie, nor with what face they saie it, so they saie no truth. But of another side it grieueth me that your good grace whom I take to be wise and charpe, and who of your blessed disposition wiseth me well, should be so farre gone in crediting these corrupt informers that abuse the ignorance of your state and countrie to my perill. A little know you (my lord) how necessarie it is, not onelie for the gouernor, but also for euerie noble man in Ireland to hamper his vniuill neighbors at discretion, wherein if they waited for process of law, and had not those lines and lands you speake of within their reach, they might hap to lose their owne liues and lands without law. You heare of a case as it were in a dreame, and fele not the smart that bereth vs. In England there is not a meane subiect that dare extend his hand to fillip a peere of the realme. In Ireland except the lord haue cunning to his strength, and strength to saue his crowne, and sufficient authoritie to take thieues & varlets when they stir, he shall find them swarime so fast, that it will be too late to call for iustice. If you will haue our service take effect, you must not tie vs alwaies to these iudiciall proceedings, where with your realme (thank be God) is injured. jects, in suppressing rebels, in executing iustice, in brideling blind affections, I would be willing to be inuicted with so vertuous and roiall a name. But if therefore you terme me a king, in that you are persuaded that I repine at the gouernment of my soueraigne, or winke at malefactors, or oppresse ciuill liuers, I vtterlie disclaime in that odious terme, marueling greatly that one of your grace his profound wisdom, would seeme to appropiat so sacred a name to so wicked a thing. But howsoever it be (my lord) I would you and I had changed kingdoms but for one moneth, I would trust to gather by more crummes in that space, than twise the reuenues of my poore earldome: but you are well and warme, and so hold you, and obayd not me with such an odious terme. I slumber in an hard cabin, when you sleepe in a soft bed of downe: I serue vnder the king his cope of heaven, when you are serued vnder a canopie: I drinke water out of my skull, when you drinke wine out of golden cups: my courser is trained to the field, when your genet is taught to amble: when you are begraced and belozed, & crouched and kneeled vnto, then find I small grace with our Irish borderers, except I cut them off by the knees.

At these words the counsell would haue smiled, if they durst: but euy man bit his lip, & held his countenance, for howsoever some of them leaned to the erle of Ossioe, they all hated the cardinall, who perceiving that Kildare was no babe, rose in a fume from the counsell table, committed the erle, & deferred the matter till more direct probations came out of Ireland. The duke of Suffolke, who was late lieutenant in Ireland, perceiving the cardinall to be so bent against the nobleman, rather for the deablie hatred he bare his house, than for anie great matter he had wherewith to charge his person, slept to the king, and craued Kildare to be his prisoner, offering to be bound for his forth coming, ouer and aboue all his lands, bodie for bodie. Whereupon, to the cardinall his great griefe, the prisoner was bailed, and honorablie by the duke interteined. During his abode in the duke his house, Dneale and Dconoz, and all their friends and alies, watching their time to annoy the pale, made open insurrection against the earle of Ossioe then lord deputy of Ireland, insomuch that the noble man mistrusting the sicklenesse of Desmond on the one side, & the force of these new start vp rebels on the other side, stood halfe amazed, as it were betwene fire & water. For remedie whereof, letters thicke and threfold were addressed to the counsell of England, purporting that all these late hurlie burlies were of purpose raised by the meanes of Kildare, to the blemishing and staining of his brother Ossioe his gouernment. And to put the matter out of doubt, it was further added, that Kildare commanded his daughter Ellice Fitzgiralde, wife to the baron of Slane, to excite in his name the aforesaid traitors to this open rebellion.

The cardinall hereupon caused Kildare to be examined before the counsell, where he pressed him so deepe with this late dissolaltie, that the presumption being (as the cardinall disforce it) vehement, the treason odious, the king suspicious, the enemie eger, the friends faint (which were sufficient grounds to ouerthrow an innocent person) the earle was reprieved to the tolower. The nobleman betooke himselfe to God & the king, he was hartlie beloued of the lieutenant, pitied in all the court, and standing in so hard a case, altered little of his accustomed hue, comforted other noble men prisoners with him, dissembling his owne sorow. On a night when the lieutenant and he for their disport were playing at Assegrote or Shodebowd, suddenlie commeth from the cardinall a mandatum mandatum to create Kildare on the morrow. The earle marking the lieutenants bespeigh: By saint Bric lieutenant (quoth he) there is some mad game in that scroll; but fall how it will, this throw is for an humble. When the word was told him: Now I praise the (quoth he) do no more but learne assured lie from the king his owne mouth, whether his high-nesse be willing thereto or not? So he doubted the lieutenant to displease the cardinall byet of verte pate loue to his frend; he pisseth to the king at nite night, and deliuered his errand: for at all houres of the night the lieutenant hath access to the prince upon occasions. The king controlling the laudnesse of the priest (for those were his termes) deliuered to the lieutenant his signet in token of countermand; which when the cardinall had seene, he began to breath out vnseasoned language, which the lieutenant was loth to heare, & so left him patterring & chanting the diuine his Pater noster. Thus brake vp the forme for that time, & the next yeare Malcolme was cast out of fauour, and within few yeares sir William Skeffington was sent ouer lord deputie, and brought with him the erle pardoned mid rid from all his troubles.

When it was vntold, that Skeffington, the earle of Kildare, and Edward Staples bishop of Metch landed nere Dublin, the maior and citizens met him with a solemne procession on saint Marie abbeys greene, where master Thomas Fitzsimons recorder of Dublin made a pithe oration to congratulate the gouernor and the earle his prosperous arri-uall, to whome Skeffington shayed an answer in this wise: Passer maior and master recorder, you haue at length this noble man here present for whom you sore longed, while he was absent. And after manie floures by him susteined, he hath now to the comfort of his frends, to the confusion of his foes, subdued violence with patience, in which with sufferance, and malice with obedience: and such butchers as of hatred thirsted after his blood, are now taken out, cast into massies, littered in cuttish blood. How well my master the king hath bene of his grations inclination affected to the earle of Kildare (his backe frend, being by his just desert from his maiestie we-ded) the credit wherein this noble man at this present abideth, manifestlie declareth. Wherefore it resteth, that you thanke God and the king for his safe arri-uall. As for his welcome, master recorder his courteous discourse, your great assemblies, your cherefull countenances, your willing meetings, your solemne processions do so far shew it, as you minister me occasion on his lordship his behalfe, rather to thanke you for your courtesie, than to exhort you to a further ceremonie.

Having ended his oration, they rode all into the cittie, where shortly after the earle of Ossorie surrendered the sword to sir William Skeffington. During the time that Kildare was in England, the sept of the Toles making his absence their haruist, ceased not to molest and spoile his tenants, and therefore the erle meaning not to wrap vp so lightlie their manifold injuries, was determined presentlie upon his arriuall to crie them quittance: to the speedinesse of which seruice he requested the aid of the citizens of Dublin: & expecting in Christ church their answer touching this motion, the maior & his brethren promised to assist him with two hundred archers. The late come bishop of Metch being then present, moued question, whether the citizens were pardoned for crowning Lambert contrarie to their dutie of allegiance; and if they were not pardoned, he thought they might aduantage the king thereby. Whereat one of their sagest and expertest aldermen, named John Fitzsimons, slept forth and said: My lord of Metch, may I be so bold as to craue what countrie man you see Marie sit (quoth the bishop) I would you should know it, I am a gentleman and an Englishman. My lord (quoth Fitzsimons) my meaning is to learne, in what shire of England you were borne? In Lincolnshire good sir (quoth Staples.) Whie then my lord (quoth Fitzsimons) we are no traitors, because it was the earle of Lincoln and the lord Louch that crowned him; and therefore if you be a gentleman of Lincolnshire, see that you be pardoned, for God and our king be thanked we haue need of none. At this answer Metch was set, and such as were present were forced to smile, to see what a round fall he rought in his owne turne.

In the second yeare of Skeffington his gouerne-ment, it happened that one Henrie White, seruant to Benet a merchant of Dublin, was pitching of a cart of hate in the high street; and hauing offered boies plate to passengers that walked to and fro, he let a bottle of his hate fall on a souldiours bonet, as he passed by his cart. The souldior taking this knaui-sh knacke in dudgeon, hurled his dagger at him, and hauing narrowlie mist the prickocks, he stiked it in a post not farre off. White leapt downe from the cart, and thrust the souldior through the shoulder with his pike. Whereupon there was a great broue in the cittie betwene the souldiours and the apprentices, insomuch as Thomas Warbie being the maior, hauing the king his sword oratone, was hardlie able to appease the fraie, in which diuerse were wounded, and none slaine. The lord deputie issued out of the castell, and came as farre as the pillorie, to whome the maior possed thorough the preale with the sword naked be-der his arme, & presented White that was the breuer of all this garboile to his lordship, whome the gouer-nour pardoned, as well for his courage in bichouring as for his retchlesse simplicitie and pleasantnesse in telling the whole discourse. Whereby a man maie see how manie bloudie quarrels a brasting swashbuck-ler maie picke out of a bottle of hate, namelie when his bzaines are forebitten with a bottle of nappie ale.

About this time there was a great sturre raised in England, about the king his diuorse, who thinking it expedient in so sickle a world to haue a sure post in Ireland, made Kildare lord deputie. Cromer the pimat of Arimagh lord chancellor, and sir James Butler lord tresuroz. Skeffington, supposing that he was put beside the cushion by the secret caruall sing of Kildare his friends, conceived therof a great gelouise, being therein the deeper drenched, because that Kildare hauing receiued the sword, would permit Skeffington, who was late gouernour, now like a meane priuat person, to danle attendance among other suters in his house at Dublin, named the Carbie. Skeffington plaieng thus on the bit, shortlie after sailed into England, upon whose departure the lord deputie summoned a parlement at Dublin, where there past an act against leasers of corne: also for the uniting and appropriation of the parsonage of Galtrim to the priorie of saint Peters by Trim. In the parlement time, a meale on a sudden invaded the countrie of Wicell, rising and spou-ling the king his subiects, at which time also was the earle of Ossorie greatlie berey by the Geraldines, by reason of the old quarrels of either side askech mubued.

The next yeare, the lord deputie going against Deacroll, was pitifullic hurt in the side with a gun; at the castell of Wicre; so that he neuer after inioied his lims, nor deliuered his words in god plight; otherwise like enough to haue bene longer forborne in consideration of his manie noble qualities, great good seruices, and the state of those times. Straightwaies complaints were addressed to the king of these enormities, and that in most heinous manner that could be devised, boulding out his doings as it were to the last brake of sinister surmises, turning curie puiat insurie to be the king his quarrell, & making curie puddings pliche as huge in shew as Samson his pillar. Whereupon Kildare was commanded by sharpe letters to repaire into England, leauing such a person for the furniture of that realme, and the gouernance of the land in his absence, for whose doings he would answer. Being vpon the sight of this letter prepared to fassle into England, he sat in coun-cell at Dublin, and having sent for his sonne & before the lord Thomas Fitzgerald (a yong stripling of one and twentie yeares of age, borne in England, sonne to the lord Zouch his daughter, the earle of Kildare his first wife) in the hearing of the whole bozd thus he spake.

The earle of Kildare his exhortation to his sonne the lord Thomas.

Sonne Thomas, I doubt not, but you know that my soueraigne lord the king hath sent for me into England, and what shall betide me God knoweth, for I know not. But howsoeuer it falleth, both you and I know that I am well kept in yeares: and as I maie shortly die, for that I am mortall, so I must in hast de cease, because I am old. Wherefore in so much as my winter is welneere ended, and the spring of your age now buddeth, my will is that you behaue your selfe so wisely in these your græne yeares, as that to the comfort of your friends you maie inioie the pleasure of summer, gleane and reape the fruits of your haruest, that with honour you maie grow to the catching of that hoarie winter, on which you see me your father fast picking. And whereas it please the king his maiestie, that vpon my departure here hence, I should substitute in my roome such one, for whose gouernement I would answer: albeit I know, that your yeares are tender, your wit not fet-led, your iudgement not fullie rectified, and therefore I might be with god cause reclaimed from putting a naked sword in a yong mans hand: yet notwithstanding, for so much as I am your father, and you my sonne, I am well assured to beare that stroke with you in steering your ship, as that vpon anie information I maie command you as your father, and correct you as my sonne for the wrong handling of your helme.

Where be here that sit at this bozd, far more sufficient personages for so great charge than you are. But what then? If I should cast this burthen on their shoulders, it might be that hereafter they would be so farre with enuie carried, as they would percase hazard the losse of one of their owne eyes, to be assured that I should be depriued of both mine eyes. But for so much as the case toucheth your skin as nere as mine, and in one respect nigher than mine, because (as I said before) I rest in the winter, and you in the spring of your yeares, and now I am resolved date by date to learne rather how to die in the feare of God, than to liue in the pompe of the world, I thinke you will not be so haineleske, as to stab your selfe thorough the bodie, onelie to scarifie my skin with the point of your blade. Wherefore (my sonne) consider, that it is easie to raze, and hard to build, and in all your affaires be schooled by this bozd, that for wisdom is able, and for the entier affection it beareth your house, will be found willing, to lesson you with sound and sage aduise. For albeit in authoritie you rule them, yet in counsell they must rule you. My sonne, you know that my late maiemes stideth my talke: other wise I would haue grated longer on this matter. For a good tale maie be twice told, and a sound aduise (eifsones iterated) taketh the deeper impression in the attentive hearer his mind. But although my fatherlie affection requireth my discourse to be longer, yet I trust your god inclination asketh it to be shorter; and vpon that assurance, here in the presence of this honourable assemblie, I deliuer you this sword. & thus he spake for his last fare well with trickling teares, and hauing ended, he stood, imbraced the counsell, committed them to God, and immediatlie after he was imbarked.

But although with his graue exhortation the frozen hearts of his aduersaries for a short spirt thawed, yet notwithstanding they turned some after all this gaie Gloria patri vnto a further fetch; saying that this was nothing else but to dayell their eyes with some sugling knacke, to the end they should aduertise the king of his loiall speeches: adding further, that he was too too euill that could not speake well. And to force the prepesed treasons they laied to his charge, with further surmises they certified the counsell of England, that the earle before his departure furnished his owne piles and forts with the king his artillerie and munition taken forth of the castell of Dublin. The earle being examined vpon that article before the counsell, although he answered that the few potguns and chambers he tooke from thence, were placed in his castell to strengthen the borders against the incrodes of the Irish enimie; and that if he intended anie treason, he was not so foolish, as to fortifie walles and stones, and to commit his naked bones into their hands: yet notwithstanding he deliuered his speeches by reason of his pastete, in such staggering and making wise, that such of the counsell as were not his friends, persuading the rest that he had sunke in his owne tale, by imputing his li-sping and bragging answer rather to the gilt of conscience, than to the infirmite of his late maieme, had him committed, vntill the king his pleasure were further knowne.

But before we waide anie further in this matter, for the better opening of the whole ground, it would be noted, that the earle of Kildare, among diuerse hidden aduersaries, had in these his later troubles foure principall enimies that were the chiefe means & causes of his ouerthrow, as in those daies it was commonlie bruted. The first was John Alen arch-shop of Dublin, a gentleman of a good house, chapleine to cardinall Wolseie, & after by the cardinall his means constituted archbishop of Dublin, a learned prelat, a good houtholder, of the people indifferentlie beloued, and more would haue bene, had he not overbusied himselfe in supplanting the house of Kildare. And although it were knowne, that his first grudge towards the Giraldins proceeded from the great affection he bare his lord and master the cardinall, in so much as he would not sticke, were he able, for the pleasuring of the one to wound the other; yet such occasions of greater hatred after ensued (name-lie for that he was displaced from being lord chancellor, & Cromer the pimat of Armagh by Kildare his diests settled in the office) as notwithstanding the cardinall his combe was cut in England, yet did he persist in pursuing his wonted malice toward that sex.

The second that was linked to this confederacie, was sir John Alen knight, first secretarie to this archbishop, after became maister of the rolles, lastlie lord chancellor. And although sir John Alen were not of kin to the archbishop, but onelie of the name; yet notwithstanding the archbishop made so great re-koning of him, as well for his forecast in matters of weight, as for his faithfulness in affaires of trust, as whatsoeuer exploit were executed by the one, was forthwith deemed to haue bene deuised by the other. The third of this crew was Thomas Canon, secreta-rie to Skeffington, who thinking to be reuenged on Kildare for putting his lord and master beside the cushin, as he surmised, was verie willing to haue an ore in that vote. The fourth that was suspected to make the muster, was Robert Cowlie, first bailiffe in Dublin, after seruant to the ladie Margarete Fitz-giralde, countesse of Desmond and Ossorie, lastlie master of the rolles in Ireland, and finally he deceased at London.

This gentleman for his wisdom and policie was well esteemed of the ladie Margarete countesse of Ossorie, as one by whose aduise she was in all hir affaires directed. Whereupon some suspicious persons were perswaded and brought in mind, that he was the sower of all the discorde that rested betwene the two brethren Kildare and Ossorie: as though he could not be roted in the fauour of the one, but that he must haue professed open hatred vnto the other.
These foure, as birds of one feather, were supposed to be open enemies to the house of Kildare, bearing that swaie in the commonwealth, as they were not occasioned (as they thought) either to craue friendship of the Geraldines, or greatlie to feare their hatred and enimitie. There were beside them diuerse other secret underminers, who wrought so cunning-lie vnder the thimble, by holding with the hare, and running with the hound, as if Kildare had prospered, they were assured, their malice would not haue bene in manner suspected: but if he had bene in his affaires stabled, then their fine deuises for their further credit should haue bene apparented. Wherefore the hearing of his backe friends not onelie surmised, but also manifested by Kildare, the lord Thomas being iustice or vice-deputie in his fathers absence, setcht both the Alens so roundlie ouer the hips, as well by secret drifts as open taunts, as they were the more egerlie spured to compass his confusion.
For the lord iustice and the counsell, with diuerse of the nobilitie, at a solemne banquet discoursing of the anciencie of houses, and of their armes, sir John Alen spake to the lord iustice these words.

My lord, your house giueth the marmoset, whose propertie is to eat his owne taile. Meaneing thereby (as the lord Thomas supposed) that Kildare did vse to pill and poll his friends, tenants & retainers. These words were no sower spoken, than the lord Thomas striking the ball to Alen againe, answered, as one that was somewhat slipper tongued, in this wise. You saie truly sir, indeed I heard some saie, that the mar-moset eateth his owne taile. But although you haue bene fed by your taile, yet I would aduise you to beware, that your taile eat not you. Shortly after this quipping gamegall, the lord iustice and the counsell rode to Drogheda, where hauing for the space of three or foure daies sojourned, it happened that the counsellors awaited in the counsell chamber the go-uernour his comming, vntill it was hard vpon the stroke of twelue. The archbishop of Dublin caluie digesting the vice-deputie his long absence, said: My lords, is it not a prettie matter, that all we shall staie thus long for a boie? As he vttered these speeches, the lord iustice vnluckilie was comming vp the staires, and at his entrie taking the words hot from the bishop his mouth, and iterating them verie coldlie, he said: My lords, I am heartilie sozie, that you staied thus long for a boie. Whereat the prelat was appalled, to see how unhappilie he was gald with his owne caltrop. These & the like cutting speeches inkindled such coles in both their stomachs, as the flame could not anie longer be smouldered, but at one clift or other must haue fumed. The enemies therefore hauing weligh kneaded the dough that should haue bene baked for the Geraldines bane, deuised that secret rumors should sprinkle to and fro, that the earle of Kildare his execution was intended in England; and that vpon his death the Lord Thomas and all his bloud should haue bene apprehended in Ireland. As this false mattering thus abroad, it was holpen forward by Thomas Canon, and others of Skeffington his seruants, who sicked not to write to certaine of their friends, as it were, verie secret letters, how that the earle of Kildare their master his secret enimie (so they took him, because he got the gouerne-ment ouer his head) was already cut thorter, as his issue presentlie should be: and now they trusted to see their master in his gouernment, after which they soze longed, as for a preferment that would in short space aduantage them. Such a letter came vnto the hands of a simple priest, no perfect Englishman, who for hast hurled it amongst other papers in the chimnies end of his chamber, meaning to peruse it better at more leisure. The same verie night, a gentleman retreating to the lord Thomas, the lord iustice or vice-deputie, as is before specified, took vp his lodging with the priest, and sought in the morning when he rose for some paper, to diuine on his strait stockings; and as the diuell would, he hit vpon the letter, bare it awaie in the hole of his stocke, no earthlie thing misdeeming. At night againe he found the paper vnstretted, and musing thereat he began to poze on the writing, which notified the earle his death, and the apprehension of the lord Thomas. To horse goeth he in all hast, brought the letter to James de la Hyde, who was principall counsellor to the lord Thomas in all his doings. De la Hyde hauing scantlie ouerread the letter, making more hast than good speed, posted to the lord Thomas, imparted him that letter, and withall putting fire to star, before he diued to the bottome of this trecherie, he was contented to swim on the skum and froth thereof, as well by so-thing by the tenor of the letter, as by inciting the lord Thomas to open rebellion, cloking the odious name of treason with the zealous reuengement of his fathers wrongfull execution, and with the warie defence of his owne person.

The lord Thomas being pouthfull, rash, and headlong, and assuring himselfe that the knot of all the force of Ireland was twisted vnder his girdle, was by de la Hyde his counsell so far caried, as he was resolved to cast all on sir and seauen. Wherefore hauing confedered with O'neale, O'conor, and other Irish potentats, he rode on saint Barnabies daie, accompanied with seauen score horsemen in their shirts of maille, through the citie of Dublin, to the Dam his gate, cross ouer the water to saint Marie abbey, where the counsell according to appointment waited his comming, not being praiue to his intent: onelie Cromer the lord chancellour excepted, who was secretlie aduertised of his reuolt, and therefore was verie well provided for him, as hereafter shall be declared. This Cromer was a graue prelat, and a learned, well spoken, mild of nature, nothing wedded to factions, yet a wellwiller of the Geraldines, as those by whose means he was aduanced to dignitie. When the lord Thomas was set in counsell, his horsemen and seruants rusht into the counsell chamber armed and weaponed, turning their secret conference to an open parlie. The coun-cell hereat amazed, and silence with securitie commanded, the lord Thomas in this wise spake.

crofune auallcth: yet fate not hereafter, but in this open hoſtilitie which here we profeſſe and proclame, we haue ſhewed our ſelues no villaines nor churles, but warriours and gentlemen. This ſword of eſtate is yours, and not mine; I receiued it with an oſh, and haue bleſt it to your benefit. I ſhould ſtaine mine honour, if I turned the ſame to your annoyance. Now haue I need of mine owne ſword, which I dare truſt. As for the common ſword, it flattereth me with a painted ſcabberd, but hath indeed a peſtilent edge, alreadie bathed in the Giraldines bloud, and now is newlie whetted in hope of a further deſtruction. Therefore ſaue your ſelues from vs, as from open enemies. I am none of Henrie his deputie, I am his ſon, I haue more mind to conquer than to gouerne, to meet him in the field than to ſerue him in office. If all the hearts of England and Ireland, that haue cauſe thereto, would ioine in this quarrell (as I hope they will) then ſhould he ſome able (as I truſt he ſhall) for his crueltie and tyrannie, for which the age to come may lawfullie ſcore him by among the ancient tyrants of moſt abhominable and hatefull memorie.

Having added to this ſhamefull oration manie other ſlanderous and foule tearmes, which for diuerſe reſpects I ſpare to pen, he would haue ſurrendered the ſword to the lord chancellor, who (as I ſaid before) being armed for the lord Thomas his coming, and alſo being loath that his ſlackneſſe ſhould ſeeme diſſolall in reſuſing the ſword, or his ſrowardneſſe ouer cruell in ſnatching it upon the firſt proffer, toke the lord Thomas by the wiſt of the hand, and requeſted him for the loue of God, the teares trilling downe his cheekes, to giue him for two or three words the hearing, which granted, the reuerend father ſpake as ſuſpecth.

The chancellor his oration.

My lord, although hatred be common to the handmaiden of truth, becauſe ſhe ſaith him that plainelie expreſſeth his mind, to be for the more part of moſt men diſliked: yet notwithstanding I am ſo well aſſured of your lordſhip his good inclination towards me, and your lordſhip ſo certaine of mine entire affection towards you, as I am emboldened, notwithstanding this compaſſie of armed men, ſerlie and frankelie to utter that, which by me declared, and by your lordſhip followed, will turne (God willing) to the auail of you, your friends, allies, and this countrie. I doubt not (my lord) but you know, that it is wiſedome for anie man to looke before he leape, and to ſowne the water before his ſhip hull thereon, & namely where the matter is of weight, there it behoueth to ſollow ſound, ſage, and mature aduiſe. Therefore (my lord) ſith it is no malgame for a ſubiet to leaue an armie againſt his prince: it lieth your lordſhip in hand to breack longer on the matter, as well by forecaſting the hurt whereby you may fall, as by reuoluing the hope wherewith you are fed. What ſhould moue your lordſhip to this ſudden attempt, I know not. If it be the death of your father, it is as yet but ſecretlie muttered, not manifeſtly publiſhed. And if I ſhould grant you, that your zeale in reuenging your father his execution were in ſome reſpect to be commended: yet reaſon would you ſhould ſuſpend the reuenge untill the certaintie were knowne. And were it, that the report were true, yet it ſtandeth with the dutie and allegiance of a good ſubiet (from whom I hope in God you mean not to diſſeuer your ſelfe) not to ſpurne and kicke againſt his prince, but contrariwiſe, if his ſoueraigne be mightie, to feare him; if he be profitable to his ſubiects, to honour him: if he command, to obeye him: if he be kind, to loue him: if he be vicious, to pittie him: if he be a tyrant, to beare with him: conſidering that in ſuch caſe it is better with patience to bow, than with ſubburnneſſe to breake. For ſacred is the name of a king, and odious is the name of a rebellion: the one from heauen deriued, and by God ſhielded; the other in hell forged, and by the diuell executed. And therefore who ſo will obſerue the courſe of hiſtoires, or weigh the iuſtice of God in puniſhing malefactours, ſhall eaſilie ſee, that albeit the ſunne ſhineth for a time on them that are in rebellion: yet ſuch ſweet beginnings are at length claſped by with ſharpe & ſowre ends.

Now that it appeareth, that you ought not to beare armour againſt your king, it reſteth to diſcuſſe whether you be able (though you were willing) to annoie your king. For if among meane and priuat ſoes it be reckoned for ſolie, in a ſecret grudge to profeſſe open hatred, and where he is not able to hinder, there to ſhew a willing mind to hurt: much more ought your lordſhip in ſo generall a quarrell as this, that concerneth the king, that toucheth the nobilitie, that aperteineth to the whole commonwelth, to foreſee the king his power on the one ſide, & your force on the other, and then to iudge if you be able to cocke with him, and to put him beſide the cuſhion; and not whiſtſt you ſtrive to ſit in the ſaddle, to loſe to your owne vndoing both the horſe and the ſaddle.

King Henrie is knowne to be in theſe our daies ſo puſſant a prince, and ſo victorious a warrior, that he is able to conquer foreign dominions: and thinke you that he cannot defend his owne? He ſtaineth kings, and iudge you that he may not rule his owne ſubiects? Suppose you conquer the land, do you imagine that he will not recover it? Therefore (my lord) flatter not your ſelfe ouermuch, reſe not ſo great aſſiſtance either in your troupe of horſemen, or in your band of footmen, or in the multitude of your partakers. What ſace ſoeuer they put noli on the matter, or what ſucceſſe ſoeuer for a ſeaſon they haue, becauſe it is eaſie for an armie to vanquiſh them that do not reſiſt: yet hereafter when the king ſhall ſend his power into this countrie, you ſhall ſee your adherents like ſliper changelings plucke in their hoznes, and ſuch as were content to beate you by the chin as long as you could ſwim, when they eſpie you ſinke, they will by little and little ſpinke from you, and percaſe will ducke you ouer head and eares. As long as the gale puffeth full in your ſalles, doubt not but diuerſe will anerte vnto you and ſied on you as crows on carlon: but if anie ſtorme happen to blaſter, then will they be ſure to leaue you paſt alone ſticking in the mire or ſands, having leaſt helpe when you haue moſt need. And what will then iſſue of this. The branches will be pardoned, the root apprehended, your honour diſtained, your houſe atteinted, your armes reuerſed, your manours razed, your doings examined; at which time God knoweth what an hartburning it will be, when that with no colour may be denied, which without ſhame cannot be confeſſed. My lord, I polowe not out oracles as a ſoothſayer, for I am neither a prophet, nor the ſonne of a prophet. But it may be, that I am ſome ſtrike like Caſſandra being partener of his ſpirit in foretelling the truth, and partaker of his miſfortune in that I cannot (when I tell the truth) beleeued of your lordſhip, whom God defend from being Pyramus.

Weigh therefore (my lord) the nobilitie of your anceſſors, remember your father his late exhortation, forget not your dutie vnto your prince, conſider the eſtate of this poore countrie, with what heaps of curſes you ſhall be laden, when your ſouldiers diuers shall rife the poore subiects, & so far indamage the whole reline, as they are not yet borne that shall hereafter feele the smart of this vproze. You haue not gone so far but you may turne home, the king is mercifull, your offense as yet not ouer heinous, cleaue to his clemencie, abandon this headlong folle. Which I craue in most humble wise of your lordship, for the loue of God, for the dutie you owe your prince, for the affection you beare the countrie, and for the respect you haue to your owne safetie, whom God defend from all traitorous & wicked attempts.

Having ended his oration, which he set forth with such a lamentable action, as his cheekes were all beblubbered with teares, the horsemen, namelye such as vnderstood not English, began to diuine what the lord chancelor ment with all this long circumstance; some of them reporting that he was preaching a sermon, others said that he stood making of some herotical poetrie in the praise of the lord Thomas. And thus as euerie idiot shot his folly bolt at the wise chancelor his discourse, who in effect did nought else but drop pretious stones before hogs, one Ward de Melan, an Irish rithmour, and a rotten sheepe able to infect an whole flocke, was chatting of Irish verses, as though his tongue had run on pattens, in commendation of the lord Thomas, inuesting him with the title of Silken Thomas, because his horsemen iacks were gorgeously imbowered with silke: and in the end he told him that he lingered there ouerlong. Whereat the lord Thomas being quickened, did cast his eye towards the lord chancelor, & said thus.

M lord chancelor, I come not hither to take aduise what I should do, but to giue you to vnderstand what I mind to do. It is easie for the sound to counsell the sicke: but if the fore had smarted you as much as it festereth me, you would be percase as impatient as I am. As you would wish me to honour my prince, so dutie willet me to reuerence my father. Wherefore he that will with such tyrannie execute mine innocent parent, and withall threaten my destruction, I may not, nor will not hold him for my king. And yet in truth he was neuer our king, but our lord, as his progenitors haue bene before him. But if it be my hap to miscarie, as you seeme to prognosticat, catch that catch may, I will take the market as it riseth, and will chuse rather to die with ballantnesse and libertie, than to liue vnder king Henrie in bondage and villanie. And yet it may be, that as strong as he is, and as weake as I am, I shall be able like a fleshy worme to itch the bodie of his kingdome, and force him to scratch deppelie before he be able to pike me out of my seame. Wherefore my lord, I thanke you for your good counsell, and were it not that I am too crabbed a note in descant to be now tuned, it might be that I would haue warbled sweeter harmonye than at this instant I meane to sing. ¶ With these words he rendered vp the sword, and slung a wale like a bedlem, being garded with his bzutish droun of bzaineficlie rebels.

The counsell sent secretlie vpon his departure to master mator and his brethren, to apprehend (if they convenientlie might) Thomas Fitzgiralde and his confederats. But the warning was so sharrow, that the enimie so strong, the citie (by reason of the plague that ranged in towne and in countrie) so dispeopled, as their attempt therein would seeme but vaine and fruitolous. Durc this, the weaker part of the rebels would not pen vp themselves within the citie wals, but stood howering aloofe off toward Dismantolone greene, on the top of the hill where the gallies stood (a fit centre for such a circle) till time they were aduertised of their capteine Thomas his returne. This open rebellion in this wise denounced, part of the counsell, namelye Alen archbishop of Dublin & Finglasse chiefe baron hied with bag and baggage to the castell of Dublin, whereof John White was constable, who after was dubbed knight by the king in England, for his worthie seruice done in that vproze.

Thomas & his crew, supposing that in ouerrunning the whole land, they should find no blocke to stumble at sauing the earle of Mallowe, agreed to trie if by any allurements he could be trained to their confederacie. And forsomuch as the lord James Butler was linked with Thomas Fitzgiralde in great amitie and friendship, it was thought best to giue him the onset, who if he were won to swaie with them, they would not weigh two chips the force of his father the earle of Mallowe. Thomas forthwith sent his messengers and letters to his cousine the lord Butler, conuening to diuide with him halfe the kingdome, would he associat him in this enterprise. Wherevpon the lord Butler returned Thomas his brokers with this letter.

The lord Butler his letter to Thomas Fitzgiralde.

Taking pen in hand to write you my resolute answer, I muse in the verie first line by what name to call you, my lord, or my cousine: seeing your notorious treason hath distained your honour, and your desperate lewdnesse shamed your kindred. You are so liberrall in parting stakes with me, that a man would wene you had no right vnto the game: so importunat in crauing my companie, as if you would perswade me to hang with you for good fellowship. Do you thinke that James was so mad, as to gape for gogions; or so vngregarious, as to sell his truth for a peece of Ireland? Were it so (as it cannot be) that the chickens you reckon, were both hatched and feathered: yet be thou sure, I had rather in this quarell die thine enimie, than liue thy partencer. For the kindnesse you proffer me, and good loue in the end of your letter, the best waie I can I purpose to requite, that is, in aduising you, though you haue fetcht your feaze, yet to loke well yet ye leape. Ignorance and errour, with a certeine opinion of dutie, haue caried you vnto this follie, not yet so ranke but it maie be cured. The king is a vessell of bountie & mercie, your words against his maiestie shall not be accounted malicious, but rather belched out for heat and impotencie, except your selfe by heaping offenses disconcer a mischeefous and wilfull meaning. Farewell.

Thomas Fitzgiralde nettled with this round answer, was determined to inuade the countrie of Wikkennie, first forcing an oth vpon the gentlemen of the pale: and such as would not agree thereto he toke prisoners. Fingall, which was not before acquainted with the recourse of the Irish enimie, was left open to be preided and spoiled by the Moles, who were therein assisted by John Burnell of Balgriffin, a gentleman of a faire liuing, settled in a good battle soile of Fingall, taken for one not deuoid of wit, were it not that he was overtaken with this treason. The Dublinians hauing notice that the enimie made hauocke of their neighbors of Fingall, issued out of the citie, meaning to haue intercepted them at the bzidge of Bilmaman. And hauing incountre red with the Irish néere the wood Salcocke, what for the number of the rebels, and the lacke of an expert capteine to lead the armie of Dublin in battell raie, there were fourescore of the citizens slaine, and the prieste not rescued. In this conflict, Patrike Fitzsimons, with diuerse other good houlholders, miscaried.

This victorie bred so great an insolencie in Thomas Fitzgiralde, as he sent his messengers to the citie, declaring that albeit they offered him that iniurie, as that he could not haue free passage with his companie to & fro in the pale, & therefore would he vse the benefit of his late skirmish, or be answerable in iust reuenge to their due desert, he might by law of armes put their citie to fire and sword: yet this notwithstanding, if they would but permit his men to laie siege to the castell of Dublin, he would enter in league with them, and would undertake to backe them in such fauourable wise, as the stoutest champion in his armie should not be so hardie, as to offer the basest in their citie so much as a fillip. The citizens considering that the towne by reason of the sicknesse was weakened, and by this late ouerthrow greatlie discouraged, were forced to make a vertue of necessitie, by lighting a candle before the diuell, till time the kings pleasure were knowne; to whom with letters they posted one of their aldermen named Francis Herbert, whom shortly after, the king for his seruice dubbed knight, infeofing him with part of Christopher Custace of Balcutlan his lands, who had vndoubtedly a foot in this rebellion. But before the citizens would returne answer to Thomas as touching this message, they secretly aduertised master John White constable of the castell of this vnlawfull demand.

The constable weighing the securitie of the citie, little regarding the force of the enimie, agreed willingly thereto, so that he might be sufficientlie stored with men and vittells. John Alen archbishop of Dublin, fearing that all would haue gone to wracke in Ireland, being then in the castell, brake his mind touching his sailing into England, to one of his seruants named Bartholomew Fitzgiralde, whom notwithstanding he were a Giraldine, he held for his trustiest and inwardest counsellor. Bartholomew vndertaking to be the archbishop his pilot, vntill he were past the barre, encouraged his master to imbarke himselfe hard by the Dams gate. And as they were hulling in the channell that euening, they were not ware, vntill the barke strake on the sands néere Clontarfe.

The archbishop with his man scale secretly to Tartaine, there meaning to lurke vntill the wind had serued to saile into England, where he scarcelye sir houres sojourned, when Thomas Fitzgiralde knew of his arrivall, and accompanied with James de la Hyde, sir John Fitzgiralde, Oliver Fitzgiralde his vnckles, timelie in the morning, being the eight and twentieth of Iulie, he posted to Tartaine, beset the house, commanded John Teling and Nicholas Waffer to apprehend the archbishop, whome they haled out of his bed, brought him naked in his shirt, barefooted, and bareheaded, to their capteine. Whom when the archbishop espied, incontinently he kneeled and with a pittifull countenance & lamentable voice, he besought him for the loue of God not to remember former iniuries, but to weigh his present calamitie, and what malice soeuer he bare his person, yet to respect his calling and vocation, in that his enimie was a christian, and he amongst christians an archbishop.

As he spake thus, bequeathing his soule to God, his bodie to the enimies mercie, Thomas being stricken with some compassion, & withall inflamed with desire of reuenge, turned his horse aside, saying in Irish (Bir wem e boddeagh) which is as much to saie in English, as Away with the churle: or Take the churle from me: which doubtles he spake, as after he declared, meaning the archbishop should be deteined as prisoner. But the cattifs that were present, rather of malice than of ignorance, misconstruing his words, murdered the archbishop without further delaye, brained and hacked him in gobbets, his blood with Abell crying to God for reuenge, which after befell to all such as were principals in this horrible murder. The place is ever since hedged and imbaied on currie stoe, ouergrowne and vsfrequented for detestation of the fact. This Alen (as before is declared) was in seruice with cardinall Wolscie, of deepe iudgement in the law canon, the onelie match of Stephen Gardiner, an other of Wolscies chapleins, for auoiding of which emulation he was preferred in Ireland, rough and rigorous in iustice, deacliie hated of the Giraldines for his masters sake & his owne, as he that crossed them diuerse times, & much bided both father and son in their gouernements, not vnlike to haue promoted their accusations, and to haue bene a forger of the letter before mentioned, which turned to his finall destruction.

The rebels hauing in this execrable wise imbrued their hands in the archbishop his blood, they rode to Houth, toke sir Christopher lord of Houth prisoner, & vpon their returne from thence, they apprehended master Luttrell chiefe iustice of the common ples, conueting him with them as their prisoner. The Dublinians during this space, hauing respite to passe sent into the castell by night sufficient stoe of vittells, at which time, John Fitzsimons, one of their aldermen, sent to master constable twentie tun of wine, foure & twentie tun of bare, two thousand drie ling, sixtens hogheads of powdered beefe, and twentie chambers, with an iron chaine for the drawe brdge of the castell that was newlie forged in his owne houle for the auoiding of all suspicion. The castell being with men, munition, and vittells abundantly furnished, answer was returned to Thomas Fitzgiralde, purporting a content for the receiuing of his souldiours. Which granted, he sent thither James Field of Luske, Nicholas Waffer, John Teling, Edward Houke (who was likewise a pirat scowring the coast, and greatlie annoying all passengers) Wood and Bursell, with an hundred souldiours attendant on them, as on their capteins. These valiant Rutterkins planted néere Preston his innes, right euer against the castell gate two or thre falcons, hauing with such strong rampiers intrenched their companie, as they little weighed the shot of the castle. And to withdraw the constable from discharging the ordinance, they threatened to take the youth of the citie, and place them on the top of their trenches for master constable to shot at, as at a marke he would be loth to hit.

The English pale in this wise weakened, the citizens appeased, and the castell besieged, Thomas Fitzgiralde and his confederats were resolved to trie if the lord Butler would stand to his doughtie letter; and sith he would not by faire means be allured, he should be (maugre his head) by foule means compelled to assist them in this their generall attempt. Thomas vpon this determination, being accompanied with Dneale, diuerse Scots, James de la Hyde, his principall counsellour, John de la Hyde, Edward Fitzgiralde his vnckle, sir Richard Walsh parson of Loughselodie, John Burrell of Balgriffin, James Gernon, Walter Walsh, Robert Walsh, Maurice Walsh, with a maine armie, inuaded the erle of Desfozie and the lord Butler his lands, burnt and wasted the countrie of Kilkennie to Thomas towne, the poore inhabitants being constrained to shunne his force, rather than to withstand his power.

Fitzgiralde his approach towards these confines hinted, the earle of Moxie, and his son the lord Butler, with all the gentlemen of the countrey of Kilkennie, assembled nere Jeripon, to determine what order they might take, in withstanding the invasion of the rebels. And as they were thus in parlee, a gentleman of the Butlers accompanied with sixtene horsemen, departed secretly from the folkemote, & made towards Thomas Fitzgiralde and his armie, who was then ready to incampe himselfe at Thomas towne. When the chalenger was escried, and the certaine number knowne, sixtene of Fitzgiralde his horsemen did charge him, and presentlie followed them seven score horsemen, with two or thre banners displayed, pursuing them untill they came to the hill where all the gentlemen were assembled, who being so suddenlie taken, could not stand to bicker; but some fled this waite, some that waite, the earle was scattered from his companie, and the lord Butler unware was hurt: whom when such of the rebels knew as fauoured him, they pursued him but colde, and let him escape on horsebacke, taking his waite to Downemore (nere Kilkennie) where he late at surgerie.

During the time that Thomas with his armie was ransacking the erle of Moxie his lands, Francis Herebert returned from England to Dublin with the king and counceils letters to maister Shillingforth then maior, and his brethren, with letters likewise to maister White the constable, to withstand (as their dutie of allegiance bound them) the traitorous practises of Thomas and his complices, and that with all speed they should be succored vpon the sight of these letters. Maister Thomas Fitzsimons recorder of the citie, a gentleman that shewed himselfe a politike and a comfortable counsellor in these troubles, paraphrasing the king his gracious letters, with diuerse good and sound constructions, imboldened the citizens to breake their new made league, which with no traitor was to be kept. The aldermen and communaltie, with this pithie persuasion easilie weighed, gaue forthwith order, that the gates should be shut, their percullices dismounted, the traitors that besieged the castell apprehended, flags of defiance vpon their walls placed, and an open breach of truce proclaimed.

Field and his companies (who did not all this while batter aught of the castell, but onelie one hole that was bozed through the gate with a pellet, which lighted in the mouth of a demie canon, planted with in the castell) vnderstanding that they were betrayed, began to shrink their heads, trusting more to their heeles than to their weapons: some ran one way, some another, diuerse thought to haue bene housed and so to lurke in Rozels den, who were thrust out by the head and shoulders: few of them swam ouer the Liffie, the greater number taken and imprisoned. Forthwith post vpon post rode to Thomas Fitzgiralde, who then was rising the countrey of Kilkennie, certifieng him that all was mard, the fat was in the fire, he brought an old house about his owne eares, the Waltocks of Dublin kept not touch with him, the English armie was ready to be shipt, Herebert with the king his letters returned; now it stood him vpon to shew himselfe a man or a mouse. Thomas with these tidings amazed, made speedie repaire to Dublin, sending his pursuants before him, to command the gentlemen of the English pale to meete him with all their power nere Dublin. And in his waite towards the citie, his companie took diuerse children of the Dublinians, that kept in the countrey (by reason of the contagion that then was in the towne) namelie Michaele Fitzsimons, Patrike Fitzsimons, William Fitzsimons, all sons to Walter Fitzsimons late maior, at which time was also taken James Stanthurst, with diuerse other ponglings of the citie.

Having marched nere Dublin, he sent doctor Trauerse, Peter Lince of the Knoke, and Oliuer Grace, as messengers (for I maie not rightlie tearme them ambassadozs) to the citizens, who crossing the Liffie from the blacke stiers to the kete, explained to the maior and aldermen their errand, the effect whereof was, either to stand to their former promise, or else to restore to their capteine his men, whom they wrongfullie detained in goale. The first and last point of this request flatlie by the citizens denied, the messengers returned, declaring what cold intertainment they had in Dublin. Thomas herewith frieng in his greafe, caused part of his armie to burne the barke wherein Herebert sailed from England: which done without resistance, the vessel road at anchor nere saint Apatie abbeie, they intended to stop all the springs that flowed vnto the towne, and to cut the pipes of the conduits, where by they should be destitute of fresh water. Shorlie after, they laid siege to the castell in the Shipstreet, from whence they were bassilie by the ordinance seized, and all the thatcht houses of the street were burnt with wild fire, which maister White deuised, because the enimie should not be there rescued.

When no butter could sticke on their bread, in that part of the citie, the greater number of the rebels assembled to Thomas his court, and marched to saint Thomas his street, rasing downe the partitions of the row of houses before them on both sides of the street, finding none to withstand them: for the inhabitants fled into the citie, so that they made a long lane on both the sides like a gallerie, covered all ouer head, to shield as well their horsemen as their footmen from gunshot. This done they burnt the new street, planted a falcon right against the new gate, and it discharged, pearced the gate, and kild an apprentice of Thomas Stephens alderman, as he went to bring a bason of water from the high pipe, which by reason the springs were damd vp, was at that time drie. Richard Stanton, commonlie called Dicke Stanton, then gailor of the new gate, a good seruitor, an excellent markeman, as his valiant seruice that time did approue. For besides that he gald diuers of the rebels as they would skip from house to house, by causing some of them with his peece to carrie their errands in their buttocks; so he perceiued one of the enimies, leuelling at the window or spike at which he stood: but whether it were, that the rebell his powder failed him, or some gimball or other was out of frame, Stanton toke him so trulie for his marke, as he strake him with his bullet full in the forehead vnder the brim of his scull, and withall turned vp his heeles.

Stanton not satisfied with his death, issued out at the wicket, stript the varlot mother-naked, and brought in his peece and his attire. The desperation of this fact disliked of the citizens, and greatly stomached by the rebels, before Stanton returned to his standing, the enimies brought faggots & fiers to the new gate, and incontinentlie fired them. The townesmen perceiuing that if the gate were burnt, the enimies would be encouraged vpon hope of the spoile, to venter more fiercelie, than if they were incountred without the walls, thought it expedient presentlie to charge them. To this exploit they were the more egerlie moued, because that notwithstanding Thomas his souldiours were manie in number; yet they knew that the better part of his companie bare but hollow hearts to the quartrell: for for the number of the wise gentlemen of the pale did little or nothing incline to his purpose. And therefore when he besieged the citie, the most part of those arrayes, which were shot over the walles, were breasted, and nothing annoied them: some shot in letters, and foretold them of all the treacherous stratagems that were in hammering.

That espied the citizens, and gathering the faintnesse of his souldiours thereby, blazed abroad upon the walles triumphant newes, that the king his armie was arrived: and as it had bene so in deed, suddenly to the number of four hundred rushed out at the new gate, through flame and fire upon the rebels, who at the first sight of armed men, wening no lesse but the truth was so, otherwise assured, that the citie would never dare to encounter them, gave ground, forsooke their capteins, dispersed and scattered into diuerse corners, therein falcon taken, an hundred of their stoutest Calloglasses slain. Thomas Fitzgiralde fled to the graie sisters in S. Francis his street, there coucht that night, unknown to the citie, untill the next morning he sale praisell to his armie not far off, who stood in wonderfull feare that he was apprehended. Thomas his courage by this late overthrow somewhat cooled, and also being assuredly told, that a flete was espied a farre off, bearing full saile towards the coast of Ireland, he was some intreated, having so manie irons in the fire, to take eggs for his monie: & withall, hauing no forren succor, either from Paulus tertius, or Charles the first, which daily he expected, he was sore quashed, being of himselfe, though strong in number of souldiours, yet unfurnished of sufficient munition and artillerie, to stand & withstand the king his armie in a pitcht field, or a maine battell. Upon this & other considerations, to make as faire weather as he could, he sent James de la Hyde, Line of the Knocke, William Bath of Dollardstowne, doctor Trauerse, Thomas Field of Wainstowne, as messengers to the citizens, to treat with them of a truce, who being let in at the new gate, repaired to William Kellie his house, where maister maloz and his brethren were assembled. The articles propounded by them to the citizens, were these.

- 1 That Thomas Fitzgiralde his men, who were detained in prison, should be redelivered.
- 2 Item, that the citizens should incontinentlie deliuer him at one payment, a thousand pounds in monie.
- 3 Item, that they should deliuer him five hundred pounds in wares.
- 4 Item, to furnish him with munition and artillerie.
- 5 Item, to addresse their fauorable letters to the king for their capteine his pardon, and all his confederats.

The maloz and aldermen, hauing ripe debate the tenour of these articles, agreed, that maister Fitzsimons their recorder should answer vnto the first, that they would not sticke to let his seruants at libertie, so he would redeliver them the youth of the citie, which was nothing else in effect, but tiff for tat. As for the second and the third demand, they were so greatlie by his warres impouerished, as they might hardlie spare monie or wares. And as touching implements for warre, they were neuer such fond riddelcocks, as to offer ante man a rod to beat their owne talles, or to betake their massines vnto the custodie of the wolues, maruelling much that their capteine would so farre overshoot himselfe, as to be taken with such apparant repugnanie. For if he intended to submit himselfe to the king his mercie, and to make them humble meanes to his highnesse for the obtaining of his pardon, he ought rather to make sute for some good bellam paid ment for the ingrossing thereof, than for mutation and artillerie to withstand his prince. Wherefore, that three unlawfull demands reiected, they would willingly condescend to the first and last as well requesting him to deliuer them the youth of the citie, as to submit himselfe and his companie to the king, his mercie promising not onelie with their fauorable letters, but also with their personall presence to further, as far as in them lay, his humble sute to the king and counsell.

As they parted thus to and fro, William Bath of Dollardstowne a student of the common lawes spake: My masters, what needeth all this long circumstance? Let vs all drinke of one cup. Which words were shortly after vpon Sheshington his arriuall so crookedlie glofed, as by drinking of a sodayne cup he lost the best ioint of his boole. For albeit vpon his trespasse he construed his words to import an vniforme consent towards the obtaining of Fitzgiralde his pardon; yet all this could not colour his matter in such wise, but that he and Cusace of Balcanlan were executed at the castell of Dublin. The messengers knowing their capteine to be at a lowch, were agreed to take the offers of the first & last conditions, and that to the accomplishing of these articles hostages should be giuen of either part. The messengers deliuered to the citizens doctor Trauerse & others, the citizens deliuered them Richard Talbot, Alzeman, Rochford, & Kerrie. These were committed to the custodie of David Sutton of Kabyde, who redelivered them to the citizens immediatlie after vpon the certaine rumoz of Sheshington his repaire.

Thomas growne to this point with the Dublinians raised his siege, caused his artillerie to be conueied to Houth, marching after with his armie, to the end he might as well bulch the English ships if they durst anerre the coast, as to bicker with the souldiours vpon their arriuall. But before he toke his forneie vnto Houth, he rode to Wainoth, to see that the castell should be of all sides fortified, where being done to vnderstand, that a companie of white cotes with red crosses landed at Dublin secretlie in the dead of the night, and also that another band arrived at Houth, and were readie to march towards Dublin, he posted incontinentlie with two hundred horsemen towards the water side, incountred nere Clontarfe, the Hamertons, two valiant and courageous gentlemen, hauing in their companie foure score souldiours, where they fought so valliantlie for their lines, as so few footmen could haue done against so great a troope of horsemen: for they did not onlie mangle and hacke diuerse of the rebels, but also one of the Hamertons wounded Thomas Fitzgiralde in the forehead. Some report that one of the Mulgraues, who was of kin to Fitzgiralde, was slain in this conflict, whose death he is said to haue taken greatlie to hart. The rebelles fled with the slaughter of the English, hied with all speed to Houth, shot at the ships that rode at anchor, caused them to flee from thence, & to make towards Skerries, where landed both the Egglebys, and the Dacres, with their horsemen. Kouks, Fitzgiralde his pirat, was sent to scotoze the coast, who toke an English barke laden with verie faire geldings, and sent them to his capteine. After that Thomas had returned with this botie, and the spoile of such as were slain to Wainoth, sir William Bereton knight, with his sonne John Bereton, was inhoied at Houth with two hundred & fiftie souldiours verie well appointed, and maister Salisburie with two hundred archers.

putie, whome the Irish call the gunner, because he was preferred from that office of the king his maister gunner to gouerne them, and that they can euill broke to be ruled of anie that is but meanlie borne.
The maior and aldermen receiued the gouernor with shot, and great solemnitie, who yelding them hartie thanks for their true and loiall seruice, deliuered them the king and counsell his letters, purporting the same effect in writing that he before exprest in wordes. Warrnell lord of Trimleslowne, who had the custodie of the sword, did surrender it to sir William Skeffington, according to the meaning of the king his letters patents on that behalfe.

Thomas Fitzgiralde hauing intelligence that the whole armie was arrived, warded the castell of Dalnoth so stronglie, as he toke it to be impregnable.
And to the end he might glue the gouernor battell, he rode towards Connagh, to leaue all such power of the Irish, as either for wages, or for goodwill he could win to assist him. The lord deputie forewarned of his drift, marched with the English armie, and the power of the pale to Dalnoth, and laid siege to the castell on the north side towards the parke. But before anie pece was discharged, sir William Bzereton, by the deputie his appointment, did summon the castell, offering such as kept it to depart with bag and baggage, and besides their pardon to be liberallie rewarded for their good and loiall seruice. But such as warded the castell, scornfullie scorning the knight his offer, gaue him hartie thanks for his kindnesse which they said proceeded rather of his gentlenesse than of their deserting, wishing him to keepe vp in those such liberall offers for a deere peere, and to write his commendations home to his friends, and withall, to keepe his head warme, for at their hands he was like to haue but a cold sute. Fi-nallie not to take such keepe of their safetie, in that they were assured, that he and his fellows should be somer from the siege raised, than they from the hold remained.

Upon this round answere the ordinances were planted on the north side of the castell, which made no great batterie for the space of a fortnight: yet the castell so warlike on each side intrenched, as the rebelles were imbarred from all egress and regress. Christopher Daresse fosterbrother to Thomas Fitzgiralde, to whome of speciall trust the charge of the castell was thistle committed, profering his voluntarie seruice (which for the more part is so thanklesse and insano-rie as it sinketh) determined to go an ale beyond his fellows, in betraying the castell to the gouernor.
In this resolution he shot a letter indosied to the lord deputie, the effect whereof was, that he would deuise means the castell should be taken, so that he might haue a summe of monie for his paines, and a competent staie during his life. This motion by letters to and fro agreed upon, Daresse caused such as kept the ward, to swill and boll so much, as they smoked all the night like grunting hogs, little misdemeing that whillest they slept, anie Judas had bene waking within the castell.

The occasion of this extraordinarie exceeding was colored, for snatching into the castell a field pece the daie before from the armie, for which they kept such pot-reuels, and triumphant carousing, as none of them could discern his beds head from the beds feet: Daresse, taking his tide and time, made signe to the armie, betwene the twilight and dawning of the daie, who hauing scaling ladders in a readinesse, would not ouerslip the opportunitie offered. Holland, petit capitaine, to Salisbury, was one of the for-wardest in this exploit, who leaping downe from the wall, fell by mishap into a pipe of feathers, where he was up to the arme pits, so stiffelie sticking therein, and also intwealdie in his armor, as there could not helpe himselfe neither in nor out. Sir William Bze-retton and his band hauing scaled the walls cried on a sudden, saint George, saint George. Thre drunken swads that kept the castell thought that this shout was nought else but a dycaine, till time they espied the walles full of armed men, and one of them with all perceiuing Holland thus intangled in the pipe, bestowed an arrow vpon him, which by god hap did misle him. Holland forthwith rescued by his fellows, shot at the other, and strake him so fall vnder the skull, as he left him sprawling. The resistance was faint, when the souldiours entered, some yelding themselves, others that withstood them staine. Sir William Bzereton ran vp to the highest turret of the castell, & aduanced his standard on the top thereof, notifieng to the deputie, that the fort was wonne.

Great and rich was the spoile, such store of beds, so manie goodlie hangings, so rich a wardrobe, such braue furniture, as trulie it was accounted (for household stuffe and vtensiles) one of the richest earle his houses vnder the crowne of England. The lord deputie entred the castell in the after none, vpon whose repaire, James de la Hode, and Harward, two singing men of the earle his chappell, that were taken prisoners, prostrated themselves on the ground, pi-tiffullie warbling a song, named Dulcis amica.

The gouernour ranshed with the sweet and deli-cat voices, at the instance of Girald Ailmer chiefe iustice, and others of the counsell pardoned them.
Christopher Daresse not misdoubting but that he should haue bene dubbed knight for his seruice done that daie, presented himselfe before the gouernour, with a cherefull and familiar countenance: as who should saie, Here is he that did the deed. The deputie verie colidie & halfe sternelie casting an eie towards him said: Daresse, I am to thanke thee on my maiester the king his behalfe, for this thy proffered seruice which I must acknowledge to haue bene a sparing of great charges, and a sauing of manie valiant soldiers liues to his highnesse: and when his maiestie shall be thereof aduertised, I dare be bold to saie that he will not see thee lacke during thy life. And because I maie be the better instructed how to reward thee during my gouernement, I would gladly learne, what thy lord and master bestowed on thee. Daresse set a gog with these mild speeches, and supposing the more he recited, the better he should be rewarded, left not untold the meanest god turne that euer he receiued at his lordes hands. Why Daresse (quoth the deputie) couldest thou find in thine heart to betraye his castell, that hath bene so good lord to thee? Trulie, thou that art so hollow to him, wilt neuer be true to vs. And therewithall, turning his talke to his officers, he gaue them commandement to distress Daresse the summe of monie that was promised him vpon the surrender of the castell, and after to chop off his head. Daresse at this cold salutation of farewell & be hanged, turning his simpering to whimpering said: My lord, had I wist that you would haue dealt so streake with me, your lordship should not haue wonne this fort with so little bloodshed as you did.

Whereat master Wolfe, a gentleman of worthip, and one that retained to that old earle of Aildare, standing in the preesse, said in Irish, Antragh, which is as much in English, as To late, whereof grew the Irish prouerbe, to this daie in the language bled, To late quoth Wolfe, as we saie, Belwara of had I wist, or After meat mustard, or Don come a daie af- ter the faire, or Better done than said. The deputie asked them that stood by what was that he spake?
After Wolfe willing to expound his owne words, stept forth and answered; My lord, I said nothing, but that Daresse is seized of a towe nere the water side named Walter, and I would gladly know how he will dispose it before he be executed. The governor not mistrusting that master Wolfe had glofed (so) if he understood the true signification of the terme, it was verie like that too late had not bene so sharpe to Waresse, but too sone had bene as sowe to him) willed the monie to be told to Waresse, and presentlie caused him to be cut shorter by the head: declaring thereby, that although for the time he imbraced the benefit of the treason, yet after he could not digest the treacherie of the traitor.

Fitzgiralde his stratagem.

The deputie having left a garrison in the castell, returned with the armie triumphantlie to Dublin. Thomas Fitzgiralde not misdoubting but such as he left in the castell were able to stand to their tackle, lent a huge armie in Drombur his countie, and in Connagh, to the number of seven thousand, marching with them towards Wainoth, minding to have remoued the king his armie from the siege: but being certified, that Waresse his fosterbrother yielded by the castell to the deputie, the better part of his companie gaue him the slip. All this notwithstanding he made with such as would sticke to him to Clane. The lord deputie hauing intelligence of his approach, left sir William Wiereton at Dublin to defend the citie, & marched with the armie to the ppaas, where he took the seven score of Thomas his Calloglasses, and lead them all vnarmed toward Johnstowne. The scoutwatch espiong Thomas to march nere, imparted it to the gouernour, who presentlie commanded each man to kill his prisoner before the charge, which was dispatcht; only Edmund Wiereton escaping mother naked by sight to Thomas his companie, leaning his shirt in his keepers hands. Both the armies aduanced themselves one against the other, but the horsemen of either side could not charge, by reason of a marish or quakenire that parted them. Wherefore the deputie caused two or three field peeces to be discharged, which scattered Thomas and his rabblement, insomuch as he neuer in such open wise durst after beare vp head in the English pale, but rather by starts and sudden stratagems would noli and then gall the English. As when the castell of Rathangan was wane, which was sone after the surrender of Wainoth, he caused a droue of cattell to appeare timelie in the morning hard by the towne. Such as kept the fort, suspecting it to be a bottie, were trained for the more part out of the castell, who were surprisid by Thomas, that late hard by in ambush, and the greater number of them slaine.

Another time he fired a village hard by Trim, and deuiled such of his horsemen that could speake English, being clad and horrid like notherne men, to ride to Trim, where a garrison late with hue and crye, saing that they were capteine Salisburie his souldiours, and that the traitor Thomas Fitzgiralde was burning a village hard by. The souldiours suspecting no couinage issued out of the towne, who were by his men charged, & a great number of them slaine, some chased to the towne, and forced to take sanctuarie in the churchyard, which in those daies was highlie reuerenced. These and the like knacks, used Thomas, being for his owne person so well guarded, and for defect of a maine armie so naked, as neither he was occasioned to feare the English, nor the English forced to weigh him. During this time, there arrived with a fresh supplie of horsemen & archers, sir William Wentworth knight & his son, sir Alice Wentworth knight, sir Edward Griffith knight, who were dispersed to sundrie parts of the pale to defend the countie from the enemies inuasion. When the heat of this rebellion was in this wise allwaged, the lord deputie finding out no deuise to apprehend the capteine, imployed his industrie to intrap his confederats.

Walter de la Hyde and his ladie Gennet captured.

Sir Walter de la Hyde knight and his wife the ladie Gennet Cufface were apprehended, & brought as prisoners by master Wablon bicetreasure from their towne of Poiclar to the castell of Dublin, because their sonne and heire James de la Hyde was the onelie bruer of all this rebellion: who as the gouernour suspected, was set on by his parents, & named after his mother. The knight & his wife, lieng in duress for the space of twelue moneths, were at several times examined, & notwithstanding all presumptions and surmises that could be gathered, they were in the end found guiltlesse of their sonnes follie. But the ladie was had in examination apart, and insisted by meanes to charge hir husband with his sonnes rebellion, who being not wone thereto with all the meanes that could be brought, was menaced to be put to death, or to be rackt; and so with extremite to be compelled, whereas with gentleness he could not be allured to acknowledge these apparent treasons, that neither hir husband nor she could without great shew of impudencie denie.

The gentlewoman with these continuall storms heartbroken, deceased in the castell: from thence hir bodie was remoued vnto the greie friers with the deputie his commandement, that it should not be interred, vntill his pleasure were further knowne; adding withall, that the carcase of one who was the mother of so arrant an archtraitor, ought rather to be cast out on a dunghill to be carion for rauen and dogs to gnaw vpon, than to be laid in anie christian graue. The corps lieng foure or five daies in this plight, at the request of the ladie Gennet Colving, wife to sir John White knight, the gouernour, licensed that it should be buried. Sir William Sherington a seuer and vpright gouernour died shortly after at Wilminton: to whome succeeded lord deputie the lord Leonard Greie, who immediatlie vpon the taking of his oath marched with his power towards the confines of Wounster, where Thomas Fitzgiralde at that time remained. With Fitzgiralde sir William Wiereton skirmished so fiercelie, as both the sides were rather for the great slaughter disadvantaged, than either part by anie great victorie furthered. Master Wiereton therefore perceiving that rough nets were not the fittest to take such peart birds, gaue his aduise to the lord deputie to grow with Fitzgiralde by faire means to some reasonable composition. The deputie liking of the motion, craved a parole, sending certaine of the English as hostages to Thomas his campe with a protection directed vnto him, to come and go at will and pleasure. Being vpon this securitie in conference with the lord Greie, he was persuaded to submit himselfe to the king his mercie, with the gouernours faithfull and vndoubted promise that he should be pardoned vpon his repaire into England. And to the end that no treacherie might haue bene misdeemed of either side, they both receiued the sacrament openlie in the campe, as an infallible seale of the covenants and conditions of either part agreed.

the court laie, he was intercepted contrarie to his expectation in London waie, and conueied with hast to the tower. And before his imprisonment was byted, letters were possed into Ireland, streialie commending the deputie vpon sight of them, to apprehend Thomas Fitzgiralde his vnckles, and to see them with all speed conuenient thipt into England. Which the lord deputie did not slacke. For hauing feasted three of the gentlemen at Kilmannan, immediatlie after their banquet (as it is now and then seen, that sweet meat will haue sowze sauce) he caused them to be manacled, and led as prisoners to the castell of Dublin: and the other two were so roundlie snatched up in villages hard by, as they sooner felt their owne captiuitie, than they had notice of their brethrens calamitie. The next wind that serued into England, these five brethren were imbarked, to wit James Fitzgiralde, Walter Fitzgiralde, Oliver Fitzgiralde, John Fitzgiralde, and Richard Fitzgiralde. These of these gentlemen, James, Walter, and Richard, were knowne to haue crossed their nephew Thomas to their power in his rebellion, and therefore were not occasioned to misdoubt anie danger. But such as in those daies were enemies to the house, incensed the king so sore against it, perswading him, that he should neuer conquer Ireland, as long as anie Giralde breathed in the countrie: as for making the pathwaie smooth, he was resolved to lop off as well the good and sound grapes, as the wild and fruitlesse berries. Whereby appeareth how dangerous it is to be a rub, when a king is disposed to swæpe an alleie.

Thus were the five brethren sailing into England, among whom Richard Fitzgiralde being more bookish than the rest of his brethren, & one that was much giuen to the studies of antiquitie, wailling his inward grieffe, with outward mirth comforted them with cheerefullnesse of countenance, as well perswading them that offended to repose affiance in God, and the king his mercie, and such as were not of that conspiracie, to relie to their innocencie, which they should hold for a more safe and strong barbicane, than anie rampire or castell of brasse. Thus solacing the sille mourners sometime with smiling, sometime with singing, sometime with graine and pithie apophthegmes, he craued of the owtier the name of the barke; who hauing answered, that it was called the Coto, the gentleman soze appalled thereat, said: How good brethren I am in vtter despair of our returne to Ireland, for I beare in mind an old prophesie, that five earles brethren should be caried in a Cotes bellie to England, and from thence neuer to returne.

Whereat the rest began afresh to howle and lament, which doubtlesse was pitifull, to behold five valiant gentlemen, that durst meet in the field five as sturdie champions as could be picked out in a realme, to be so suddenlie terrified with the bare name of a wooden cote, or to feare like lions a sille cocke his combe, being moued (as commonlie the whole countrie is) with a vaine and fabulous old wines dreame. But what blind prophesie soener he read, or heard of anie superstitious beladme touching a cote his bellie, that which he soztold them was found true. For Thomas Fitzgiralde the third of Febyuarie, and these five brethren his vnckles, were drawne, hanged, and quartered at Tiburne, which was incontinentlie byted as well in England and Ireland, as in foren soiles. For Dominicke Powrie, that was sent from Thomas to Charles the fifth, to craue his aid towards the conquest of Ireland (like as Chale in Grauill, otherwise called Charles Relnold, was directed to Paulus certius) presenting the emperor with twelue great hankes and fourtene faire hobbies, was aduertised by his maiestie that he came too late, for his lord and master and sue of his vnckles were executed at London the third of Febyuarie: howbeit the emperor procured king Henrie to pardon them, who trained with faire words into a soles paradise, were not onelie dispossessed of their lands, but also depriued of their liues, or else forced to forsake their countreies. As for Thomas Fitzgiralde, who (as I wrote before) was executed at Tiburne, I would wish the carefull reader to vnderstand that he was neuer earle of Kildare, although some writers, rather of error than of malice, terme him by that name. For it is knowne that his father liued in the tower, when he was in open rebellion, where for thought of the yong man his follie he died; and therefore Thomas was attainted in a parliament holden at Dublin, as one that was deemed, reputed, and taken for a traitour before his fathers decease, by the bare name of Thomas Fitzgiralde. For this hath bene obserued by the Irish historiographers euer since the conquest, that notwithstanding all the presumptions of treason, wherewith anie earle of Kildare could either faintlie be suspected or vehementlie charged; yet there was neuer anie earle of that house read or heard of, that bare armour in the field against his prince. Which I write not as a barrister hired to plead their cause, but as a chonicle moued to declare the truth.

This Thomas Fitzgiralde (as before is specified) was borne in England, vpon whom nature potoyed beautie, and fortune by birth bestowed nobilitie: which had it bene well employed, & were it not that his rare gifts had bene blemished by his later euill qualities, he would haue proued an impetuous to be ingrafted in so honozable a stocke. He was of stature tall and personable, in countenance amiable, a white face, and withall somewhat ruddie, delicatlie in each lim featured, a rolling tong & a rich viterance, of nature flexible and kind, verie some caried where he fasted, easilie with submission appeased, hardlie with stubbornnesse weied, in matters of importance an headlong hotspur: yet neuertheless taken for a yong man not deuoid of wit, were it not (as it fell out in the end) that a foole had the keeping thereof.

But to returne to the course of the historie. When Thomas and his vnckles were taken, his second brother on the father his side, named Giralde Fitzgiralde (who was after in the reigne of queene Marie restored to the earldome of Kildare, in which honour as yet he liueth) being at that time somewhat past twelue, and not full thirtene yeares of age, laie sick of the small pocks in the countie of Kildare, at a towne named Donoare, then in the occupation of Giralde Fitzgiralde. Thomas Leuouse, who was the child his scholemaster, and after became bishop of Kildare, mistrusting vpon the apprehension of Thomas & his vnckles, that all went not currant, wapt the yong patient as tenderlie as he could, and had him conueied in a clæse with all speed to Dublin, where sojourning for a short space with his sister the ladie Marie Fitzgiralde, until he had recovered his perfect health, his scholemaster caried him to Donon his countrie, where making his aboad for a quarter of a yeare, he trauelled to Dberu his countrie in Downshire, and hauing there remained for halfe a yeare, he repaired to his aunt the ladie Elenor Fitz-giralde, who then kept in Mac Cartie Keagh his late husband his territories.

This noble woman was at that time a widow, alwaies knowne and accounted of each man, that was acquainted with hir conuersation of life, for a paragon of liberalitie and kindnesse, in all hir actions vertuous and godlie, and also in a good quarell rather stout than stiffe. To hir was Odoneil an im-portunate suiter. And although at sundrie times before she seemed to shake him off, yet considering the distresse of hir yong innocent nephue, how he was forced to wander in pilgrimwise from house to house, eschuing the punishment that others deserued, smarted in his tender yeares with aduersitie, before he was of discretion to intoie anie prosperitie, she began to incline to hir lower his request, to the end hir nephue should haue bene the better by his countenance shouldered, and in fine indentured to espouse him; with this caueat or prouiso, that he should safe-lie shield and protect the said yong gentleman in this calamitie. This condition agreed vpon, she rode with hir nephue to Odoneil his countrie, and there had him safelie kept for the space of a yeare.

But shortly after the gentlewoman either by some secret friend informed, or of wisedome gathering that hir late married husband intended some treacherie, had hir nephue disguised, storing him like a liberall and bountifull aunt with seuen score portugues, not onelie in valour, but also in the selfe same courage, incontinentlie shipped him secretlie in a Bri-tons vessell of saint Malouise, betaking him to God, and to their charge that accompanied him, to wit, maister Leuouse, and Robert Wally sometime seruant to his father the earle. The ladie Elenor having thus to hir contentation bestowed hir nephue, she expostulated verie sharpelie with Odoneil as touching his villanie, protesting that the onlie cause of hir match with him proceeded of an especiall care to haue hir nephue countenanced: and now that he was out of his lath that minded to haue betrayed him, he should well vnderstand, that as the feare of his danger moued hir to annere to such a clovish curmudgen: so the assurance of his safetie should cause hir to sequester hirselle from so butcherlie a cutthroate, that would be like a pelting mercenarie patch hired, to sell or betraie the innocent blood of his nephue by affinitie, and hirs by consanguinitie.
And in this wise trussing vp bag and baggage, she forsooke Odoneil and returned to hir countrie.

The passengers with a prosperous gale arriued at saint Malouise, which notified to the gouernour of Britaine, named monsieur de Chasteau Brian, he sent for the yong Fitzgiralde, gaue him verie hartie intertainment during one moneths space. In the meane season the gouernour posted a messenger to the court of France, aduertising the king of the ar-riual of this gentleman, who presentlie caused him to be sent for, and had him put to the Dolphin named Henrie, who after became king of France. Sir John Wallop (who was then the English ambassadour) vnderstanding the cause of the Irish fugitiue his repaire to France, demanded him of the French king, according to the new made league betwene both the princes: which was, that none should keepe the other his subiect within his dominion, contrarie to either of their willes; adding further, that the boie was brother to one, who of late notorious for his rebellion in Ireland was executed at London.

To this answered the king, first that the ambassadour had no commission from his Prince to demand him, & vpon his maiestie his letter he should know more of his mind: secondlie that he did not deteine him, but the Dolphin staied him: lastlie, that how griuouslie toener his brother offended, he was well assured, that the little boy neither was nor could be a traitor, and therefore there rested no cause while the ambassador should in such wise craue him; not doubting that although he were deliuered to his king, yet he would not so far swaue from the extreame rigor of iustice, as to imbue his hands in the innocent his blood, for the offense that his brother had perpetrated. Maister Wallop herevpon addrest his letters to England, specifying vnto the counsell the French kings answer. And in the meane time the yong Fitzgiralde hauing an inkling of the ambassadour his motion, fled secretlie to Flanders, scantlie reaching to Valencie, when James Sherelocke, one of maister Wallop his men, did not onelie pursue him, but also did ouertake him as he sojourned in the said towne.

Wherevpon maister Leuouse, and such as accompanied the child, kept to the gouernour of Valencie, complaining that one Sherelocke a sneaking spie, like a pikethanke promoting varlet, did dog their master from place to place, and presentlie pursued him to the towne: and therefore they be sought the gouernour, not to leaue such apparant villanie unpunished, in that he was willing to betraie not onelie a guiltlesse child, but also his owne coun-triman, who rather ought for his innocencie to be pitied, than for the desert of others so egerlie to be pursued. The gouernour vpon this complaint soze incensed, sent in all hast for Sherelocke, had him suddenlie examined, and finding him unable to color his lewd practise with anie warrantable defense, he laid him vp by the heeles, rewarding his hot pursute with col-intertainment, and so remained in gaole, vntill the yong Fitzgiralde requiting the prisoner his vnna-rall crueltie with vnderferued courtesie, humble besought the gouernour to set him at libertie. This brunt escaped, Fitzgiralde travelled to Brussels, where the emperour kept his court.

Doctor Bates being ambassador in the low countries, demanded Fitzgiralde of the emperour on his maister the king of Englands behalfe. The emperour hauing answered that he had not to deale with the boy, and for ought that he knew was not minded to make anie great abode in that countrie, sent him to the bishop of Liege; allotting him for his pension an hundred crownes monethlie. The bishop interteined him verie honozable, had him placed in an abbey of monks, & was so carefull of his safetie, that if anie person suspected had travelled within the circuit of his glæbe, he should be stretlie examined whether he would, or from whence he came, or vpon what occasion he travelled that waie. Hauing in this wise remained at Liege for halfe a yere, the cardinall Pole (Fitzgiralde his kinsman) sent for him to Rome, wherevpon the gentleman as well with the emperour his licence, as with surrendring his pension, travelled to Italie, where the cardinall would not admit him to his companie, vntill he had attained to some knowledge in the Italian tong. Wherefore allowing him an annuitie of three hundred crownes, he placed him with the bishop of Verona, and the cardinall of Mantua, and after with the duke of Mantua. A cerroule in the meane while was admitted through the cardinall Pole his procurement, to be one of the English house in Rome, called saint Thomas his hospital.

Robert Wally, vpon his maisters repaire to Italie, returned to Ireland. Fitzgiralde hauing continued with the cardinall, and the duke of Mantua, a yeare and an halfe, was sent for by the cardinall Pole to Rome, at which time the duke of Mantua gaue him for an annuall pension 300 crownes. The cardinall greatlie reioiced in his kinsman, had him carefullie trained by in his house, interlacing with such discretion his learning and studies with exercises of activitie, as he should not be after accounted of the learned for an ignorant idiot, nor taken of active gentlemen for a dead and dumpeish meacocke. If he had committed anie fault, the cardinall would secretly command his tutors to correct him, and all that notwithstanding, he would in presence dandle the boie, as though he were not pünie to his punishment; & upon his complaint made, he used to checke Fitzgiralde his master openlie for chastising so seuerelie his pretie darling.

In this wise he rested three yeares together in the cardinall his house, and by that time hauing slept so far in piers (for he was picking fast upon nintene) as he began to know himselfe, the cardinall put him to his choise, either to continue his learning, or by travelling to seeke his adventures abroad. The yong stripling (as vsuallie kind doth creepe) rather of nature addicted to valiantnes, than wedded to bookishnes, choosed to be a traveller: and presentlie with the cardinall his licence repaired to Naples: where falling in acquaintance with knights of the Rhodes, he accompanied them to Malta, from thence he sailed to Tripolie (a fort appertaining to the aforesaid order, coasting upon Barbarie) and there he abode sir Iuanes with Spounbison, a commander of the Rhodes, who had the charge of that hold.

At that time the knights serued valiantlie against the Turks and miscreants, spoiled and sacked their villages and townes that late were the water side, toke diuerse of them prisoners, and after sold them to the christians for bondslauers. The yong Fitzgiralde returned with a rich bottie to Malta, from thence to Rome, hauing spent in this voyage not fullie one yeare. And was the cardinall to heare of his prosperous exploits: and for his further aduancement he inhailed his pension of three hundred crownes, to three hundred pounds, ouer and aboute three hundred crownes that the duke of Spantua allowed him. Shortly after he preferred him to the seruice of the duke of Florence, named Cosmo, with whom he continued master of his horse three yeares, hauing also of the duke three hundred duckets for a yearelie pension during life, or untill he were restored; in like manner as the cardinall Pole and the duke of Spantua in their annuities had granted him.

During the time that he was in seruice with the duke of Florence, he travelled to Rome a shyning, of set purpose to be merite: and as he rode on hunting with cardinall Fernelle the pope his nephue, it happened that in chasing the bucke he fell into a pit nine and twentie fathoms deepe, and in the fall foraking his horse within two fathoms of the bottom, he toke hold by two or three roots, griping them fast, untill his armes were so wearie, as he could hang no longer in that paine. Wherefore betaking himselfe to God, he let go his gripe by little and little, and fell sootlie on his horse, that in the bottom of the pit late starke dead, and there he stood by the ancles in water for the space of three houres. When the chase was ended, an exceeding good greifhound of his named Grifhound, not finding his master in the company, followed his tract untill he came to the pit, and from thence would not depart, but stood at the baim incessantlie howling. The cardinall Fernelle and his traine missing Fitzgiralde, made towards the dog, and surueieng the place, they were verelie perswaded that the gentleman was squished to death.

Hauing therefore posted his seruants in hast to a village hard by Rome (named Erecappan) for ropes and other necessaries, he caused one of the companie to glide in a basket downe to the bottome of the hole. Fitzgiralde refused with his presence, and willing to be removed from so darkesome a dongeon to the open aire, besought the other to lend him his rowme, whereupon he was haled by in the basket: as well to the generall admiration of the whole companie, as to the singular gratulation of the cardinall and all his friends, rendering most hartie thanks vnto God his diuine maiestie, for protecting the gentleman with his gracious guerdon. And thus surceasing to treat anie further of his adventures, untill the date of time traine my pen to a longer discourse, I will retorne to the inhabitants of the English pale, who after the death of Thomas Fitzgiralde, through rigor of iustice and the due execution of lawes were greatlie molested. For ouer this, that such as were knowne to be open and apparant traitors in the commotion, were for the more part executed, or with round sums fined, or from the realme exiled: certeine gentlemen of worth were sent from England, with commission to examine each person suspected with Thomas his treason, and so according to their discretion, either with equitie to execute, or with clemencie to pardon all such as they could proue to haue furthered him in his disloyall commotion. Commissioners were these: sir Anthonie Sentleger knight, sir George Panlet knight, master Polle, and master Barnes. And about this time was there a parlement holden at Dublin before the lord Leonard Greie lord deputie, beginning the first of Maie, in the eight and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight.

The old earle of Kildare his death.

His seruice.

His hospitauotion.

As for the old earle of Kildare, who in this par-lement was atteinted for diuerse pꛛesumptions, in the pꛛeamble of the said act rehearsed, certefine it is, that the reuolt of his sonne Thomas Fitzgerald smot him so deepe to the heart, as vpon the report thereof he deceased in the towꝛ, wishing in his death-bed that either he had died before he had heard of the rebellion, oꝝ that his bꝛainelesse boy had neuer liued to raise the like commotion. This earle, of such as did not stomach his pꛛoceedings, was taken for one that bare himselfe in all his affaires verie honorable, a wise, deepe, and far reaching man: in war valiant without rashnesse, and politike without treacherie. Such a suppressor of rebels in his gouernement, as they durst not beare armes to the annoyance of anie subiect, whereby he heaped no small reuenues to the crowne, enriched the king his treasure, garbed with securitie the pale, continued the honoz of his house, and purchased enite to his person. His great hospitalitie is to this date rather of each man commended, than of anie one followed. He was so religionlie addicted vnto the ser-uing of God, as what time soeuer he trauelled to anie part of the countrie, such as were of his chappell should be sure to accompanie him. Among other rare gifts, he was with one singular qualitie indued, which were it put in pꛛactise by such as are of his calling, might minister great occasion as well to the abandoning of flattering carrie tales, as to the staied quietnesse of noble potentates.

For if anie whispered, vnder Benedicite, a sinister report oꝝ secret pꛛactise, that tended to the distain-ing of his honoz, oꝝ to the perill of his person, he would straitlie examine the informer, whether the matter he reported were past, oꝝ to come. If it were said oꝝ done, he was accustomed to laie soze to his charge, where, and of whome he heard it, oꝝ how he could iustifie it. If he found him to halt in the pꛛoofe, he would punish him as a pikethanke makebate, for being so maliciouslie caried, as for curtieng fauour to himselfe, he would laboz to purchase hatred to another. But if the pꛛactise were future, and hereafter to be put in execution, then would he suspend the credit, vsing withall such warie secrecie, as vntill the matter came to the pinch, the aduersarie should thinke that he was most ignorant, when he was best pꛛouided. As being in Dublin forewarned, that John Durbhan with certefine desperate barlets conspired his destruction, & that they were determined to assault him vpon his returne to Spainoth, he had one of his seruants named James Grant, that was much of his pitch, and at a blushe did somethat resemble him, attired in his riding apparell, and name-lie in a scarlet cloake, wherewith he vsed to be clad.

Grant in this wise masking in his lordes attire, rode as he was commanded in the beaten high waie towards Spainoth, with six of the earle his seruants attending vpon him. The conspirators awaiting towards Lucan the comming of the earle, incountered the disguised lord, and not doubting but it had bene Kildare, they began to charge him: but the other amazed therewith, cried that they toke their marke amisse; for the earle rode to Spainoth on the further side of Liffie. Wherewith the murderers appalled, fled auaie, but incontinentlie were by the earle apprehended, sustaining the punishment that such cattifes deserued.

John Durbhan
James Grant

This noble man was so well affected to his wife the ladie Greie, as he would not at anie time buy a sute of apparell for himselfe, but he would sute hir with the same stufte. Which gentlenesse she recompensed with equall kindnesse. For after that he deceased in the towꝛ, she did not onelie euer after liue as a chaste and honorable widow, but also night-lie before she went to bed, she would resort to his picture, & there with a solemne conga she would bid hir lord goodnight. Wherby may be gathered with how great loue she affected his person, that had in such pꛛice his bare picture. An other act that did passe in this parlement touching absenties, pꛛoceeded of this occasion. Maister Siralo Ailmer, who first was chiefe baron of the exchequer, after chiefe iustice of the common ples, was occasioned, for certefine his affaires, to repaire vnto the court of England.
Where being for his god seruice greatlie countenanced by such as were in those daies taken for the pillers of the weale publike, namelye of the lord Cromwell, it happened that through his lordship his earnest meanes, the king made maister Ailmer chefe iustice of his bench in Ireland. This aduancement disliked by certefine of Waterford and Welf-ford, that were not friended to the gentleman, they debaled him in such despisefull wise, as the earle of Shrewsburie, who then was likewise earle of Waterford, was by their lewd reports caried to chalenge the king, so far as with his dutie of allegiance he durst, for bestowing so weightie an office vpon so light a person, being such a simple John at stile as he tearmed him, no wiser than Patch the late lord cardinall his sole.

Whereto the king vpon further leasure agreed, and shortlie after (according to his promise) bestowed two for his highnesse, as he shewed himselfe in his dis-worthy to supplie an office of so great credit. In the képe, as for lacke of their presence, they suffer the said lands to be ouerrun by rebels and traitors. Therefore if your highnesse would prouide by act of parlement, that all such lands, which by reason of their absence may not be defended, should be to your highnesse by the consent of the nobilitie and communalte granted, you might thereby enrich your crowne, repress rebels, and defend your subjects from all traitorous inuasion.

The king tickled with this plausible deuise, pelded maister Ailmer hartie thanks for his good counsell, and in this parlement had the tenure thereof put in effect. Which redounded chæstie to the lord of Shrewsburie his disadvantage, as one that was possessed of diuerse ancient lordships and manors in that countrie. Some after this parlement, O'neale imagining that he was able to make his partie good against the English pale, conspired with O'doneale, O'agadnesh, O'caghan, O'ac Kullen, O'hylan, and other Irish lords, and on a sudden inuaded the pale, came to the Pauan, burnt all the townes of ech side confining, after marched to Taragh, mustering with great pride his armie upon the top of the hill: and hauing gathered together the spoile of the pale without resistance, he began to recule northwards, making his full account to haue gone his waie scotfree.

The lord Leonard Greie being then lord deputie, foreseeing the worst, certified the king & counsell of O'neale his rebellion, and withall humble besought a fresh supplie of souldiours to assist the pale in resisting the enimie, and that sir William Bzereton, (who was discharged & returned to England) should be sent into Ireland, as one that for his late seruice was highly commended of the countrie. The king and counsell condescending to the deputie his request, appointed sir William Bzereton to this thither with speed, hauing the charge of two hundred and fiftie souldiours of Cheshiremen. In which seruice the gentleman was found so prest and readie, that notwithstanding in mustering his band he fell by his mishap off his horse, and therewithall brake his thigh in two places, yet rather than he would retire homewards, he appointed the mariners to hale him up to their barke by pulleys, and in such impotent wise arrived in Ireland, suppressing the feebleness of his bodie with the contagious balor of his mind.

The lord deputie in the meane while marched with the force of the pale, the maior & the citizens of Dublin to Drogheda: from thence likewise accompanied with the maior & townesmen, he marched northward to Bellahoe, where O'neale & his companie on the further side of the water late incamped with the spoile of the pale. The deputie by spies and secret messengers heretof certified, caused the armie to trauell the better part of the night, insomuch as by the dawning of the day they were nere to the riuers side: where hauing eliered the enimies, namlie O'agadnesh, and the Galloglasses that were placed there to keepe the streits (for O'neale with a maine armie lurked not farre off) they began to set themselves in battell arrate, as men that were resolved with all hast and good speed to suppress the enimie with a sudden charge.

At which time James Fleming baron of Slane (commonlie called Blacke James) garded with a round companie, as well of horsemen as of footmen, humble besought the deputie to grant him that daie the honor of the onset. Whereto when the lord Greie had agreed, the baron of Slane with cherefull countenance imparted the obtaining of his sute, as pleasant tidings to Robert Halsepennie, who with his ancestors was standardbearer to the house of Slane. But Halsepennie seeing the further side of the water so beset with armed Galloglasses as he took it, as likelie an attempt to rase down the strongest fort in Ireland with a flint, as to rush through such quicke iron walles, flatlie answered the baron, that he would rather disclame in his office, than there to giue the onset where there rested no hope of life, but an assured certaintie of death. And therefore he was not as yet so wearie of the world, as like an headlong hotspur, voluntarilie to run to his utter and undoubted destruction. Wherefore he besought his lordship to set his heart at rest, and not to impute his default to basenesse of courage, but to wartnesse of safetie, although he knew none of staied mind, but would sooner chuse to sleepe in an whole sheepe his pelt, than to walke in a toze lion his skin, namelie when all hope of life was abandoned, and the certaintie of death assuredlie promised.

The baron with this answer at his wits end rode to Robert Betoa of Dolonoze, brake with him as touching Halsepennie his determination, & withall requested him (as he did tender his honor) now at a pinch to supplie the want of that dastardlie coward, as he did terme him. Betoa to this answered, that though it stood with good reason, that such as heretofore tasted the sweet in peace, should now be contented to sip of the solye in war: yet notwithstanding, rather than the matter should to his honor lie in the dust, he promised to breake through them, or else to lie in the water; & withall being surpassinglie mounted (for the baron gaue him a choise horse) he took the standarde, & with a sudden shotot, hauing with him in the forefront the spabe of spabestowne (who at the first brunt was slaine) he flung into the water, and charged the Irish that stood on the further shore. After followed the gentlemen and peomen of the pale, that with as great manhood charged the enimies, as the enimies with courage resisted their assault. To this stoutnesse were the enimies more boldlie picked, in that they had the aduantage of the shore, and the gentlemen of the pale were constrained to bicker in the water.

But the longer the Irish continued, the more they were disadvantaged; by reason that the English were so assisted with fresh supplies, as their enimies could not anie longer withstand them, but were compelled to beare backe, to forsake the banke, and to giue the armie free passage. The English taking hart upon their faintnesse, brake through the Galloglasses, due O'agadnesh their capitaine, pursued O'neale with the remnant of his lords, leaving behind them for lacke of safe carriage the spoile of the pale, scantlie able to escape with his owne life, being egerlie pursued by the armie vntill it was sunne set. In this hote conflict Mattheu King, Patricke Barnewall of Kilmallocke, sir Edward Basnet priest, who after became deane of saint Patriks in Dublin, and was swozne one of the priue counsell, and Thomas Fitzsimons of Curdiffe, were reported to haue serued vertie ballantlie. Moreover, James Fitzsimons maior of Dublin, Michaele Curseie maior of Drogheda, Gerald Ailmer chæstie iustice, and Thomas Talbot of Malahide, were dubbed knights in the field.

But of all others, the lord Greie then lord deputie, as he was in authoritie superior to them all, so in courage and manlinesse he was inferior to none. He was noted by the armie to haue inuolued great toile and paine before the skirmish, by posting bareheaded from one band to an other, debasing the enimies inhaunting the power of the pale, depressing the reuolt of rebellious traitors, extolling the good quarrell of lofall subiects, offering large rewards, which with as great constancie he performed, as with liberalitie he promised.ouer this, he bare himselfe so affable to his souldiours, in using them like friends and fellows, and terming them with courteous names, and mouing laughter with pleasant conceits, as they were incensed as well for the loue of the person, as for the hatred of the enemie, with resolute minds to bicker with the Irish. In which conflict the deputie was as forward as the most, and bequit himselfe as valiant a seruitor as the best.

The gouernor, turning the oportunitie of this skirmish to his aduantage, shortly after rode to the north, preiding & spoiling Dneale with his confederats, who by reason of the late ouerthrow were able to make but little resistance. In this sortie he raised saint Patrick his church in Downe, an old ancient citie of Ulster, and burnt the monuments of Patrick, Brigide, and Colme, who are said to haue bene there intomed, as before is expressed in the description of Ireland. This fact, lost him sundrie hartes in that countrie, alwaies after detesting and abhorring his prophane tyrannie, as they did name it. Whereupon conspiring with such of Mounster as were enemies to his gouernment, they baked by diuerse complaints against him, which they did exhibit to the king and counsell. The articles of greatest importance laid to his charge were these.

The lord Greie accused.

The articles that were laid to his charge.

1. Inprimis, that notwithstanding he were strictly commanded by the king his maiestie, to apprehend his kinsman the pong Fitzgiralde, yet did he not onlie disobey the kings letters as touching that point by plateng bopape, but also had priate conference with the said Fitzgiralde, and late with him two or thre seuerall nights before he departed into France.

2. Item, that the chiefe cause that moued him to inuegle Thomas Fitzgiralde with such faile promises, proceeded of set purpose to haue him cut off, to the end there should be a gap set open for the pong Fitzgiralde to aspire to the earldome of Kildare.

3. Item, that he was so greedilie addicted to the pilling and polling of the king his subjects, namely of such as were resiant in Mounster, as the beds he laie in, the cups he dranke in, the plate with which he was serued in anie gentlemen house, were by his seruants against right and reason packt up, and carried with great extortion awaie.

4. Item, that without anie warrant from the king or counsell, he prophaned the church of saint Patrickes in Downe, turning it to a stable, after plucked it downe, and thipt the notable ring of bells that did hang in the steeple, meaning to haue sent them to England: had not God of his iustice prevented his iniquitie, by sinking the vessel and passengers wherein the said belles should haue bene conueied.

These and the like articles, were with such odious presumptions coloured by his accusers, as the king and counsell remembryng his late faults, and forgetting his former seruices (for commonlie all men are of so hard hap, that they shall be sower for one trespass condemned, than for a thousand good deserts commended) gaue commandement that the lord Greie should not onelie be removed from the gouernment of the countrie, but also had him beheaded on the tower hill the eight and twentieth of June. But as touching the first article, that brought him most of all out of conceipt with the king, I moued question to the erle of Kildare, whether the tenor thereof were true or false? His lordship thereto answered Bona fide, that he neuer spake with the lord Greie, neuer sent messenger to him, nor receiued message or letter from him. Whereby maie be gathered, with how manie dangers they are intwapped that gouerne prouinces, wherein diligence is trespacht with hatred, negligence is laden with taints, seueritie with perils menaced, liberalitie with thanklesse un-

The lord Leonard Greie (as is aforesaid) discharged, sir William Bzereton was constituted lord iustice, whose short gouernement was intangled with no little trouble. For albeit he and Dneale fell to a reasonable composition, yet other of the Irish lordings, namely Dconbur and his adherents, that are content to liue as subjects, as long as they are not able to hold out as rebels, conspired together, and determined to assemble their power at the hill of Ffoloye in west Metch, and so on a sudden to ransacke the pale. The lord iustice shortly with accompanied with the armie, and with two thousand of the pale, of which no small number were ecclesiasticall persons, made towards the rebels, who vpon the approach of so great an armie gaue ground, and dispersed themselves in woods and marishes. The lord iustice this notwithstanding inuaded Dconbur his countrie, burnt his tenements, & made all his trenches with the multitude of pioners so passable, as foure hundred carts, beside light carriage, were led without let thorough the countrie. Dconbur some after submitted himselfe, & sent his sonne Cormack to the lord iustice as hostage for his future obedience and loialtie to the king his highnesse. After this tourne was ended, sir Anthonie Sentleger knight of the order was constituted lord deputie, and sir William Bzereton lord high marshall, who within one halfe yeare after he was preferred to be marshall, traouelling by the lord deputie his appointment to Limerike to bring in James earle of Desmond, who stood vpon certeine tickle points with the gouernor, ended his life in that tournie, and lieth intomed at Kilkennie in the quier of saint Kennie his church. In the thre and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of Henrie the eight, there was a parlement holden at Dublin before sir Anthonie Sentleger, in which there passed these statutes following; namely.

An act

That the king and his successors to be kings of Ireland.

This parlement was likewise proroged, and after was continued and holden before the said gover-nour at Dublin, the first daie of Nouember, in the foure and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, wherein there passed these acts; namelie:

An act For the diuision of Meth into two shires.

For persons standing bound in any court for their apperance, and being in seruice, to be discharged by writ.

This parlement was further proroged untill the seuenteenth of Aprill, and at that time before the said gouernour it was holden and ended, in which there passed an act touching the manour and castell of Don-garuan to be united and annexed to the crowne forever. To this parlement resorted diuerse of the Irish lords, who submitting themselves to the deputie his mercie, returned peaceable to their countries.
 But James earle of Desmond sailed into England, and before the king and counsell purged himselfe of all such articles of treason as were falselie laid to his charge: whose cleare purgation and humble submission the king accepted verie gratefullie.
 Shortly after Desmond his returne homeward, the great O'neale was created earle of Tiron, and his base sonne Matthew O'neale baron of Dongaruan.
 For in those daies John O'neale, commonlie called Shane O'neale, the onelie sonne lawfullie of his bodie begotten, was little or nothing esteemed.

O'neale hauing returned to Ireland with this honour, and the king his fauour, when with certeine other Irish lords sailed into England, submitting their liues and lands to the king his mercie. This when was at that time created earle of Glencare, in which honour his posteritie hitherto resteth. Shortly after the returne of these lords to their countrie, king Henrie being fullie resolved to besiege Bul-longne, gaue commandement to sir Anthonie Sent-leger deputie, to leade an armie of Irishmen, and with all expedition to send them to England. To these were appointed capitaine the lord Potowe, who after was dubb knight, Surlocke & Finglasse, with diuerse others. They mustered in saint James his parke seven hundred. In the siege of Bullongne they stood the armie in verie good sted, for they were not onelie contented to burne and spoile all the villages thereto adioining, but also they would range twentie or thirtie miles into the maine land, and hauing taken a bull, they used to tie him to a stake, and scorching him with faggots, they would force him to roze, so as all the cattell in the countrie would make towards the bull, all which they would lightlie lead awaie, and furnish the campe with store of beefe.

If they toke anie Frenchman prisoner, lest they should be accounted couetous, in snatching with them his entier bodie, his onelie rancome should bee no more but his head. The French with this strange kind of warfaring astonishd, sent an ambassadoz to king Henrie, to learne whether he brought men with him or diuels, that could neither be wone with rewards, nor pacified by pittie: which when the king had turned to a least, the Frenchmen euer after, if they could take anie of the Irish scattering from the companie, used first to cut off their genitals, and after to torment them with as great and as lingering paine as they could deuise.

After that Bullongne was surrendred to the king, there incamped on the west side of the towne beyond the hauen an armie of Frenchmen, amongst whom there was a Thracian call Coltas that departed from the armie, and came to the bynke of the hauen, and there in setting and daring wise chalenged anie one of the English armie that durst be so hardie, as to bicker with him hand to hand. And al-best the distance of the place, the depth of the hauen, the narnesse of his companie imboldened him to this challenge, more than anie great valour or pith that rested in him to indure a combat; yet all this notwithstanding, an Irishman named Nicholl Welch, who after reteined to the earle of Wiltbare, loathing and disdainning his proud brags, lung into the water, and swam ouer the riuer, fought with the challenger, strake him for dead, and returned backe to Bullongne with the Frenchman his head in his mouth, before the armie could overtake him. For which exploit, as he was of all his companie highlie commended, so by the lieutenant he was bountifullie rewarded.

Such about this time the earle of Lennor, verie wrongfullie inquieted in Scotland, and forced to forsake his countrie, became humble petitioner to king Henrie, as well to releue him in his distressed calamitie, as to compasse the means how he might be restored to his lands & liuing. The king his high-nesse moued with compassion, posted the earle ouer to Ireland, with letters of especiall trust, commanding sir Anthonie Sentleger then deputie, to assist and further the Scottish outcast, with as puissant an armie as to his contentation should seme good. The deputie, vpon the receipt of these letters, sent for James Butler earle of Ormond and Osserie, a noble man, no lesse politike in peace, than ballant in warres, made him priuate to the king his pleasure; and withall in his maiesties name did cast the charge hereof vpon the said earle, as one that for his tried loialtie was willing, and for his honour and valour able to attempt and atchieue so rare and famous an exploit. The lord of Ormond as willing to obeye, as the gouernour was to command, leuied of his tenants and reteiners six hundred Gallowglasse, foure hundred hearnes, three score horsemen, and foure hundred and fortie shot: so in the whole he mustered on Ormantowne greene nere Dublin, six-tene hundred souldiours.

The lord deputie yelding his honour such thanks in words, as he deserued indeed, leuied in the pale sixteen hundred souldiours more, to be annexed to the earle his companie. When them he constituted sir John Trauers capteine, but the erle of Ormond was made generall of the whole armie. When the souldiours were with munition and victuals aboutdantlie furnished, the earle of Ormond and the earle of Lennor toke shipping at Sherisse, hauing in their companie twentie and eight ships well rigged, sufficientlie manned, and stronglie appointed. From thence they sailed northwards, and rode at anchoz without the hauen of Widdet beyond Katterger-gus. Where hauing remained hulling without the mouth of the hauen, contrarie to the aduise of the masters of their ships (who prognosticated the speedie ap-take a good harbrough) it hapned that the said night there arose so boisterous a tempest, that the whole fleet was like to haue bene ouerwhelmed. The mariners betaking their passengers and themselves to the mercie of God, did cut their maine masts, let slip their anchors, and were weather driuen to the hauens of Dunbrytaine in Scotland, whereas they were like to run theiſe ſhips on ground, and conſequentlie they all ſhould either haue bene plunged in the water, or elſe haue bene ſlaine on the land by a great number of Scots that awaited their approach. God with his gracious clemencie preventing their imminent calamitie, ſent them not onlie a wiſhed calme, but alſo a proſperous gale of wind, that blew them backe in ſafetie to the Iriſh coaſt, from whence they were ſcattered.

Dymond his propertie.

The earle of Lennor aduertised by certeine of his friends that met with him on the ſea, that the Scots (contrarie to their promiſe) dealt verie double with him (for although they gaue their word to ſurrender vp to him the caſtell of Dunbrytaine, yet they did not onlie forſiſe that hold, but alſo were readie to encounter with his ſouldiours vpon their arrivalls) he concluded to returne to Ireland. The earle of Dymond verie loath that ſo great an attempt ſhould take ſo little effect, dealt with him verie earneſtly, notwithstanding his counſell were betwaied to inuade his enemies, and his lordſhip ſhould be ſure to find the armie ſo forward in aſſiſting him in ſo famous an enterpriſe, as they would ſhew themſelves moze willing to bicker with his foes in Scotland, than without ſkirmiſhing to returne to Ireland. For the earle of Dymond was of this nature, that as he would not begin ante martiall boile raſhly or vnauſedlie, ſo he would not ſeeme to put it vp lightlie or eaſilie.

The lord of the out Iles ſaileth to the earle of Lennor.

Further, whereas the earle of Lennor ſtood in hope, that the lord of the out Iles would aid him, it was thought by Dymond not to be amiſſe, to expect his comming; and ſo joining his companie to the armie, there reſted no doubt, but that the Scottiſh enemies would be forced to plucke in their hoznes, although at the firſt bluſh they ſeeme to ſet a good face on the matter. Lennor ſomewhat with this perſuaſion carried, gaue his conſent to expect the lord of the out Iles determination, who notwithstanding all the ſetth of his enterpriſe were deſcried, would not ſlip from his word, but perſonallie failed to the Iriſh fleet, with three gallies well appointed. The noble man with ſuch martiall triumphs was receiued, as warlike ſouldiours could on the ſea aſſord him. But of all others, both the earls gaue him heartie intertainment for his true & honorable dealing, that to be as good as his word, would not ſeeme to ſhrinke from his friend in this his aduerſitie. And ſhortlie after as they craued his aduiſe what were beſt to be done, either to land in Scotland, or elſe to returne homeward, his flat reſolution was at that time to retire, becauſe their diſt was detected, their ſeined friends fainted, the caſtells were fortified, and the ſhoares on all parts with ſwarms of Scots peopled. Wherefore he thought it better policie to giue out in open rumors, that they meant not at anie hand to inuade Scotland, but to retire to their countrie.

Dymond and Lennor land.

And after that the Scottiſh ſouldiours ſhould be diſmiſſed, which would be incontinent vpon their returne, by reaſon of the exceſſiue charges: then might the earle of Lennor with leſſe preparation, and moze ſecrecie giue a freſh onſet, that the enemies ſhould ſoner ſeele his force, than heare of his arrivall. Dymond and Lennor vpon this determination landed with the greater part of the armie, and appointed the ſhips to bend their courſe to Dublin. The lord of the out Iles and his three gallies failed with the fleet, for he was not able by reaſon of the ſebleneſſe of his bodie to trauell by land, or ſcantlie further to prolong his life, which he ended at Houth preſentlie vpon his arrivall, and was with great ſolemnitie buried in ſaint Patrike his church at Dublin, vpon whoſe death this epitaph following was framed:

Pique manique mea patria dum reddidit exil, Exil in externa cogor & ipſe mori.

Both the earles marched with the armie on ſot to Carragfergus, where they brake companie. For Lennor and ſir John Trauers taking as he thought the ſhorter but not the ſafer waie, trauelled through the Ardes with the number of five hundred ſouldiours, where the Iriſh inhabitants ſkirmiſhed with them, and put them to ſuch ſtreit plunges (for they would glablie haue ſene what a clocke it was in their budgets) as they wiſhed they had not parted from the reſt of the armie. The earle of Dymond with his ſouldiours (which were a thouſand five hundred, as befoze is expreſſed) marched on ſot to Belef, which is an arme of the ſea, a quarter of a mile broad or little leſſe. And albeit their wetter were bitter and ouernipping, and no ſmall parcell of the water were congeled with froſt, yet the earle and his armie waded ouer on ſot, to the great danger as well of his perſon, as of the whole companie, which doubtleſſe was a valiant enterpriſe of ſo honorable a perſonage. From thence he paſſed to Strangford, and through Lecale to Dondalke, where he diſcharged his ſouldiours, and hauing preſented himſelfe to the gouernour at Dublin, he rode homewards to the countie of Kilkennie.

Shortlie after ſir Anthonie Scntleger lord deputie and the earle of Dymond fell at debate, inſomuch as either of them laid articles of treaſon one to the others charge. The chiefe occaſion of their mutuall grudge proceeded of certeine new and erronarie impositions, wherewith the deputie would haue charged the ſubiects. Whereat the earle of Dymond as a zelous defendor of his countrie began to kicke, & in no ſort could be wone to agree to anie ſuch vireasonable demand. Herevpon Dymond, perceiving that the gouernour perſiſted in his purpoſe, adreſſed letters of complaint to ſuch as were of the priuie counsell in England: which letters were by one of ſir Anthonie his friends intercepted at ſea, and preſented to him to be perused. Sir Anthonie hauing ouer read the writings, ſent Maſter Baſnet in poſt haſt with the packet to Kilkennie, where the earle of Dymond kept his Chriſtmaffe, requeſting his lordſhip to take in good part the opening of his letters. Which was done rather to learne the effect of his complaint, than in anie ſort to imbar his writings from comming to the counells hands.

The earle answered that his quarrell was ſo good, his dealing ſo open, as he little weighed who toke a view of his letters. And for his part what he wrote he meant not to vniwrite; but in ſuch ſort as they came from the gouernour, they ſhould be ſent to the counsell: and if their honours would allow anie ſubiect to be ſo hardie, as to intercept and open letters that were to them indorſed, he could not but digeſt anie ſuch iniurie that they would ſeeme to beare. With this answer Baſnet returned, and the earle performed his promiſe. Wherevpon the gouernour and he were commanded to appeare befoze the priuie counsell in England, where they were ſundrie times examined, and their accuſations ripele debated. In fine, the counsell equallie to both parts in their complaints affected, and weighing withall rather the due deſert of both their loſall ſeruiſes, than the vaine preſumption of their mutuall accuſations, wrapped vp their quarrels & made them both friends, with ſuch indifferencie, as neither part ſhould be made either either with anle conquest exalted; or with anle soile debased.

And for so much as Sir John Allen knight their lord chancelor of Ireland, was found to lunge in this controuersie; by plateng (as it was supposed) more craftlie than wiselie, with both the hands, in that he seemed to be rather a fosterer of their malice, than an appeaser of their quarels; he was likewise sent for into England; and being tript by the countcell in his tale, was committed to the Fleet, wherein he remained a long time. In this trouble the earle of Desmond was greatlie aided by Sir William Wolfe knight a worshipfull gentleman, borne in the citie of Waterford, who deseruing in deed the praise of that vertue, whereof he bare the name, grew to be of great credit in the court, and was highlie in King Henrie his grace, which he wholie bled to the furtherance of his friends, and neuer abused to the annoyance of his foes. This gentleman was vertie well spoken, mild of nature, with discretion stout, as one that in an vpright quarell would beare no coles, selborne in an intricate matter grauelled, being found at all assaies to be of a pleasant and present wit. Having lent the king his signet to seale a letter, who hauing powdred ermites ingrailed in the seale; Why how now Wolfe (quoth the king) what, hast thou lice here? And if it like your maiestie, quoth Sir William, a louse is a rich cote, for by giuing the louse, I part armes with the French king, in that he giueth the flour de lice. Whereat the king hartlie laughed, to heare hold prettie so, bising a taunt (namelie proceeding from a prince) was suddenlie turned to so pleasant a conceipt.

Anon after the agreement made betwene Desmond and Senileger, the earle his seruants (which he kept at that time in his linerie to the number of fiftie) besought his lordship to take at the Limehouse his part of a supper, which they prouided for him. The noble man with honour accepting their dutifull offer, supped at their request, but not to their contentation at the place appointed. For whether it were that one caltise or other did poison the meat, or that some other false measures were used (the certieintie with the reuenge thereof to God is to be referred) the noble man with thisie and hue of his seruants presentlie that night, sickened: one James White the earle his steward, with fiftene of his fellows died, the remnant of the seruants recovered. But their lord, whose health was thisie to be wished, in the flour of his age, deceased of that sickenesse at the house in Holborne, much about the eight and twentieth of October, and was buried in saint Thomas of Acres his church, whose death bred sorow to his friends, little comfort to his aduersaries, great losse to his countrie, and no small grieue to all good men.

This earle was a goodlie and personable noble man, full of honour, which was not onelie lodged inwardlie in his mind, but also he bare it outwardlie in countenance: as franke & as liberall as his calling required, a deepe and a farre reaching head. In a good quarell rather stout than stubborne, bearing himselfe with no lesse courage when he resisted, than with honorable discretion where he yielded. A fauourer of peace, no furtherer of warre, as one that procured vnlawfull quietnesse before vpright troubles, being notwithstanding of as great wisdom in the one, as of valour in the other. An earnest and a zealous vpholder of his countrie, in all attempts rather respecting the publike weale than his priuat gaine. Whereby he bound his countrie so greatlie vnto him, that Ireland might with good cause wish, that either he had neuer bene borne, or else that he had neuer deceased; so it were lawfull to craue him to be immortal; that by course of nature was framed mortal. And to giue sufficient proofe of the entire affection he bare his countrie, and of the zealous care he did cast thereon, he betooke in his death-bed his soule to God, his carcase to christian buriall; and his hart to his countrie; declaring thereby, that where his mind was settled in his life, his hart should be there intoned after his death. Which was according to his will accomplished. For his hart was conueied to Ireland, and lieth ingraued in the quere of the cathedrall church in Kilkennie, where his ancestors for the more part are buried. Upon which kind & louing legacie this epitaph following was deuised:

*Cor patria fixum viuens iam reddidit illi Post mortem patria que perierat venit.
Non sine corde valet mortalis viuere quisquam, Fix tua gens vita permancet absque tui.
Qualicet infelix extincto corde fructur, At tamen optato viuere corde nequit.
Ergo quid hac faciat? Quem re non possit amorem Cordi ut tam charo reddere corde velit?*

The effect of which said epitaph is thus Englished:

The liuing hart where laie ingrauen the care of countrie deere, To countrie liuelesse is restord and lies ingrauen here.
None hartlesse liues, his countrie then alas what ioie is left, Whose hope, whose hap, whose hart he was till death his life bereft.
And though the soile here shrowds the hart, which most it wisheth enioie, Yet of the change from nobler seat, the cause dooth it annoie.
What honour then is due to him, for him what worthie rite?
But that ech hart with hartiest loue, his worthiest hart may quite?

This earle was of so noble a disposition, as he would sooner countenance and support his poore well willer in his aduersitie, than he would make of satire vpon his wealthie friend in prosperitie. Having bid at London (not long before his death) the ladie Grete countesse of Killbare to dinner, it happened that a souldier, surnamed Polowe, who latelie returned fresh from the emperour his warres, came to take his repast with the earle before the messenger. When the earle and the countesse were set, this colting Kutterkin wholie then standing on the soldado high, placed himselfe right ouer against the countesse of Killbare, hard at the earle of Desmond his elbow, as though he were halle fellow well met. The noble man appalled at the impudent saucinesse of the malapert souldier (who notwithstanding might be borne withall, bicause an vnbidden guest knoweth not where to sit) besought him courteouslie to giue place. The earle, when the other arose, taking vpon him the office of a gentleman vther, placed in Polowe his seat, his coufine Edward Fitzgiralde, now lieutenant of hir maiesties pensioners, who at that time being a yong stripling, attended vpon his mother the countesse, and so in order he set euerie gentleman in his degre, to the number of fiftene or sixtene: and last of all the companie, he licenced Polowe if he would, to sit at the lower end of the table, where he had scantlie elbowe room.

The countesse of Killbare, perceiuing the noble man greatlie to stomach the souldier his presumptuous boldnesse, nippt him at the elbow, and whispering soflie, besought his lordship not to take the matter so hot, bicause the gentleman (the ment Polowe) knew that the house of Killbare was of late attained, and that hir children were not in this their calamitie in such wise to be regarded. So ladie (quoth the earle

This description.

The lord deceased and Desmond sent for to England.

They are made friends, either earle with a loud voice, and the tears trilling downe his teares, saie not so, I trust to see the daie, when my yong cousin Edward, and the remnant of your children (as little reckoning as he maketh of them) shall disdaine the companie of anie such skipiacke. Which prophesie fell out as true as he foretold it, onelie saving that it stood with God his pleasure to call him to his mercie before he could see that daie after which doubtlesse he longed and looked, I meane the restitution of the house of Kilbare.

Sir Anthome Senteleger returneth lord deputie.

After this noble earle his untimelie decease, Sir Anthome Senteleger was returned to Ireland lord deputie, who was a wise and a warie gentleman, a ballant ferutor in war, and a good iusticer in peace, properlie learned, a good maker in the English, having grauntie so interlaced with pleasantnesse, as with an exceeding good grace he would attaine the one without pointing dumpishnesse, and exercise the other without loathsome lightnesse. Where fell in his time a fat benefice, of which he as lord deputie had the presentation. When diuerse made suit to him for the benefice, and offered with dishonestie to buy that which with safetie of conscience he could not sell, he answered merlie, that he was resolved not to commit simonie: yet notwithstanding he had a nag in his stable that was worth fortye shillings, and he that would give him fortye pounds for the nag, should be preferred to the benefice. Which he rather of pleasure uttered, than of anie unconscionable meaning purposed to have done.

His gouernement had bene of the countrie berie well liked, were it not that in his time he began to adesse the pale with certeine new impositions, not so profitable (as it was thought) to the gouernors, as it was noisome to the subjects. The debating of which I purpose to referre to them, who are discourfers of publike estates, and the reformers of the common-wealth, praye to God, that he with his grace direct them so faithfullie to accomplish the duties of god magistrates, that they gouerne that poore battered Island to his diuine honour, to his maiesties contentation, to the suppressing of rebels, to the upholding of subjects, and rather to the publike weale of the whole countrie, than to the priuat gaine of a few persons, which oftentimes falleth out in proue to the ruine and bndwing of the seker.

Thus farre (gentle reader) as mine instructions directed me, and my leasure serued me, haue I continued a parcell of the Irish historie, and haue stretched it to the reigne of Edward the sixt. Wherevpon I am forced to craue at thine hands pardon and tolerance: pardon for anie error I shall be found to haue committed, which vpon friendlie admonition I am readie to reforme: tolerance, for that part of the historie which is not continued, till time I be so furnished and fraughe with matter, as that I maie emploie my trauell to serue thy contentation.

FINIS.

THE SUPPLIE OF THIS Irish Chronicle, continued from the death of king Henrie the eight, 1546, vntill this present yeare 1586, in the 28 yeare of hir maiesties reigne, sir Iohn Perot residing deputie in Ireland.

By Iohn Vowell aliàs Hooker of the citie of Excester, gentleman.

S from the time of Giraldus Cambrensis (the best deserved and exact writer of the conquest and state of Ireland in his time, few or none haue followed and continued any perfect course of that historie vntill the death of king Henrie the eight, and the beginning of king Edward the sixt 1546; and therefore no certeine knowledge nor assurance can be yelded, nor set downe either of the quiet gouernement in time of peace, or of the troublesome state in times of warres and rebellions; but that which is collected either out of the records, which were verie slenderlie & disorderlie kept, or out of some priuat mens collections and pamphlets, remaining in some od and obscure places: euen so the like from that time vnto these presents hath happened and is fallen out, euerie gouernour neglecting, and verie few others for want of due observations willing, to commit vnto writing what was doone, and woorthie the memoriall; sauing the things so latelie doone are not altogether out of remembrance, and some yet liuing that can remember some things doone in their times. And yet that is so vncerteine, and euerie man so varieth one from the others reports, that no man can well therevpon set downe a perfect and so exact a course as the nature of an historie requireth, and as it ought to be doone. He therefore that vpon such vncerteinties shall intermedle and undertake the penning, much more the printing of such an uncerteine, confused, and intricate discourse, must looke and be assured to be subiect to manie cauels and reproches: which thing discouraged me the writer hereof to intermeddle at all in this historie. Neuerthelesse, this worke requiring a supplie, and my selfe being earnestlie required to doo something herein, haue aduentured the matter, and by all the meanes I could, haue searched and collected to set downe in this short discourse and rhapsodie, what by writings or reports I could learne and find to be true, and worthie the memoriall: which albeit, it be not so full as the worke requireth, nor so sufficient as to the satisfaction of the reader, nor yet so answerable to the nature of an historie as is necessarie and requisit: yet let the good will of the writer be his discharge from reproch, and be an occasion to the learned to amend the thing thus in a good affection begun, and to reduce it to a more full measure in matter and truth: that this historie may haue his perfection, the reader satisfied, and this writer acquitted.

THE SUPPLIE OF THE Irish Chronicles extended to this present yeare of our Lord 1586, and the 28 of the reigne of queene Elisabeth.

After the death of king Henrie the eight, sir Anthonie Sentleger knight, was re-uoked; who deliue-red vp the sword at his departure vnto sir William Babstson knight;
and he was lord in iustice, vntill such time as sir Edward Bellingham was sent ouer to be deputie. This man was seruant to king Edward the first, and of his priue chamber: a man verie well learned, graue and wise, and therewith stout & valiant, and did verie worthilie direct his gouernment. In his time there was a mint kept in the castell of Dublin, which being at his commandement, he was the better able to do good seruice to the king his maiestie, and to the benefit of that realme. In the ciuill gouernment he was carefull to place learned and wise magistrats, vnto whome he had a speciall eie for the doing of their offices; as he had the like care for god and expert captains, to serue in the martiall affaires. And for the more speedie seruice to be done therein at all times needfull, he kept sundrie stables of horses: one at Leighlin, one at Ler, and some in one place and some in another, as he thought most meet for seruice. And whatsoever he had to do, or that seruice soeuer he meant to take in hand, he was so secret, and kept the same so priue, as none should haue anie vnderstanding thereof, before the verie instant of the seruice to be done; and for the most part, whensoever he took anie iourne in hand, his owne men knew not whither, or to what place he would ride, or what he would do. At happened that vpon some occasion he sent for the earle of Desmond, who refused to come vnto him. Where-vpon calling vnto him his companie as he thought good, and without making them acquainted what he minded to do, took horse & rode to Leighlin bridge.

The abbey there (being suppressed) he caused to be inclosed with a wall, and made there a fort. In that house he had a stable of twentie or thirtie horses, and there he furnished himselfe and all his men with horses and other furniture, and forthwith rode into Spounker, vnto the house of the earle, being then Christmas; and being vnlodged and vnthought of, he went in to the earle, whome he found sitting by the fire, and there took him, and caried him with him to Dublin.

This earle was verie rude both in gesture and in apparell, hauing for want of good nurture as much good maners as his henns and his followers could teach him. The deputie hauing him at Dublin, did so instruct, schoole, and informe him, that he made a new man of him, and reduced him to a conformitie in maners, apparell, and behauiours appertaining to his estate and degree; as also to the knowledge of his dutie and obedience to his soueraigne & prince; and made him to kneele vpon his knees sometimes an houre together, before he knew his dutie. This though it were verie strange to the earle, who hauing not bene trained vp in anie ciuilitie, knew not what appertained to his dutie and calling: neither yet of what authoritie and maiestie the king his soueraigne was; yet when he had well digested and considered of the matter, he thought himselfe most haplie that euer he was acquainted with the said deputie, and did for euer after so much honor him, as that continuallie all his life time at euerie dinner and supper, he would praye for the good sir Edward Bellingham: and at all callings he was so obedient and dutifull, as none more in that land.

This sir Edward lord deputie, when and where soeuer he trauelled, he would be chargeable to no man; but would be at his owne charge. It happned that traueilling the countrie, he was lodged on a night in vicount Baltinglasses house, where all things were verie plentifullie provided for him: which the vicount thought to haue giuen and bestowed vpon his lordship: but at his departure, he commanded his steward to paie & discharge all things, thanking the vicount for his courtesie, but refused his intertainment; saying: The king my maister hath placed me here to serue him, and alloweth me therein for my charges and expenses: wherefore, I neither maie nor will be burdenous nor chargeable to anie other man. He was verie equisite & carefull in the gouernment, as few before him the like; as well in matters martiall, as politike, magnanimous and courageous: in the one, to the appallling of the enimie; and as seuer & vpright in the other, to the benefit of the commonwelth. For neither by flat-terie could he be gained, nor by brierie be corrupted;

ted; he was feared for his seueritie, and beloued for his integritie; and no gouernor for the most vnuersallie better reported of than was he. But as ver-tue hath the contrarie to enemie, so he found it true: for he was so enuied at, and that rebellious nation not brooking so wozthie a man, who travelled all the wates he could to reduce them to the knowledge of themselves, and of their duties; and also to reforme that corrupt state of gouernement, that great practises and deuises were made for his reuocation; and matters of great importance informed and enforced against him. Wherebyon, before two yeares ended of his gouernement, he was reuoked, and sir Francis Bian made lord iustice. At his comming into England, great matters were laid vnto his charge: but he so effectualle did answer the same, that his maiesties doubtfulnesse was resolved; & he not onelie cleared, but also better liked than euer he was before, & should haue bene sent backe againe, had he not alleged his infirmittie; the which was a fistula, and other good reasons, which were accepted for his excuse. Sir Francis Bian had married the countesse of Desmond, and by that meanes he was a dweller in that land: where he died & was buried in the citie of Waterford. His time of iusticeship was but short, & no great matters could in so short a time be done by him. After his death, sir William Babston had the sword deliuered vnto him, and he continued lord iustice, vntill that sir Anthonie Senteleger came ouer, who was now lord deputie the second time: who notwithstanding by his knowledge & experience he had good skill and did well gouerne: yet there remained some coles of the fire in his first gouernement unquenched; and within a shorter time than thought of, he was reuoked: and sir James Cross was sent ouer to supplie the place; his euill successes in good attempts did not answer his valour and good desires.

And albeit the time of his gouernement were not long, yet it continued vntill the death of king Edward the first, and then he was called home, and sir Thomas Cusacke and sir Gerard Elmer were appointed lords iustices, who iointlie gouerned the estate, vntill queene Marie sent ouer sir Anthonie Senteleger; who now the third time was lord deputie. This man ruled and gouerned verie iustlie and vprightlie in a good conscience, and being well acquainted in the courses of that land, knew how to meete with the enemies, and how to staie all magistrates and others in their duties and offices: for which though he deserved well, and ought to be beloued and commended: yet the old practises were renewed, and manie slanderous informations were made and inueighed against him: which is a fatall destinie, and inueitable to euerie good gouernor in that land. For the more paines they take in tillage, the worse is their haruest; and the better be their seruices, the greater is the malice and enuie against them; being not vnlike to a fruitfull apple tree, which the more apples he beareth, the more cudgels he hurled at him. Well, this man is called home, and the lord Thomas Fitzwaters was made lord deputie.
At sir Anthonies comming ouer, great matters were laid to his charge, and manie heauie aduersaries he had, which verie eagerlie pursued the same against him: wherein he so answered, that he was not onelie acquitted; but also gained his discharge for euer to passe ouer and more into so vnthankfull a land.

The lord Fitzwaters being lord deputie, after a short time of his being there, was sent for into England. And in his absence, sir Henrie Sidneie then treasurer at warres, and doctor Corwen, were for a time ioint lords iustices: but verie shortly after, a commission was sent to sir Henrie Sidneie to be sole lord iustice, and so continued alone vntill the lord Fitzwaters, now earle of Suffre, came againe and resumed his former office of deputie. After that he was come ouer, he had somewhat to do with the Dnele. For the whole north part of Ireland began to be brigueted, and for preventing of sundrie inconueniences, which might grow by the Scottish Ilanders in aiding the said Dnele, the lord deputie made a iourneie and boiage into the said Iles, to ioine them into his friendship. In his absence, he constituted sir Henrie Sidneie lord iustice; but after that he had done his businesse, he returned againe to Dublin, where he remained and continued in his office vntill the death of queene Marie, and then he passed ouer into England, and left sir Henrie Sidneie to be lord iustice now the fourth time.

And after some time spent there, and queene Elizabeth now settled in the imperiall crowne of England, she sent ouer the said earle as lieutenant of Ireland to performe those seruices, which before he had taken in hand: who did verie great good seruice against the Irishie, and by meanes he took the Dnele, and kept him prisoner in the castell of Dublin: but yet before he could do this bying the same to perfection, he was reuoked into England, and left the land in a verie broken state; which was committed to sir Nicholas Arnold, & he was made lord iustice. But his gouernement being not well liked, choise was made by hir maiestie and the councill of sir Henrie Sidneie, now knight of the honorable order of the garter, to supplie that place, who then was lord president of Wales.

This man had bene before a long seruitor in that realme, hauing for sundrie yeares bene treasurer at warres, which is the second office vnder the lord deputie in that land; as also had bene lord iustice solie and iointlie foure times. Great was his knowledge, wisdom, and experience both of that land, and of the nature, manners, and disposition of the people: wherein the more he excelled anie others in those daies, the more apt and fit was he to haue the gouernement of them. He was therefore called from out of Wales, where he then resided in his gouernement vnto the court: and there after conse-rence had with hir highnesse, and with the councill; he was appointed to be lord deputie of Ireland, being the seventh yeare of hir maiesties reigne, in the yeare of our Lord 1565. And then he received of hir maiestie a booke of instructions signed with hir owne hand, dated the first of October 1565, the seuenth yeare of hir reigne aforesaid, concerning the principall articles for his gouernement & direction, which chieslie consisted in these points.

First, that there should be a bodie of a councill established, to assist him being lord deputie, in the gouernement of the same realme in times of peace and of warre; and whose names were then particu-larlie set downe: and order giuen, that euerie of them should before their admission be sworn by the said lord deputie, according to the accustomed manner: with an exhortation, that for so much as hir maiestie had reposed a speciall trust and confidence in their wisdomes, aduises, good counsels, and seruices: he the lord deputie should vse their aduises, assistance, and counsels in all matters of treatie and consultation, concerning the state of that realme.

And they likewise, considering the place and au-thoritie wherevnto hir maiestie had called the said sir Henrie Sidneie, to hold his place in that realme: they should yeld that obedience and reuerence vnto him, as to such a principall officer doth appertene.
And then they both together, to haue a speciall care and regard to the gouernement, which was comsed in foure articles that do orderlie hereafter follow.

The said foure articles were these.

First, that they should faithfullie and earnestlie regard the due and reue-rend obseruation of all Gods lawes and ordinances, made and established for the maintenance of the true christian faith and religion among his people; and that all meanes should be vsed, as well by doctrine and by teaching, as by good examples, that deuotion and godlinesse might increase, and contempt of religion might be restrained, punished, and suppressed. That learning in the scriptures might be maintained and increased among the cleargie, and that for the reliefe of the ec-clesiasticall state, no alienations nor waiks of the lands pertaining to anie church or college, should be alienated: neither anie impropriations of benefices be put in vze: besides sundrie other articles incident to this effect.

The second was, that the administration of law and iustice should duly and vprightlie be executed, without respect of persons: that inqurie be made what notable faults are in anie of the iudges, or other ministers of the law: that vnfit persons maie be remoued from their places, and some sufficient persons of English birth be chosen to supplie the same. That shiriffes be appointed and renewed in euerie countie, and to execute their offices vprightlie, according to the lawes of England.

The third, that the garrisons and men of warre be well ordered to the benefit of the realme, and re-pressing of disordered subiects and rebels: that they do line according to the orders appointed, without oppression of the good and true subiects. That there shall be once within a moneth at the least a muster made either by the lord deputie, or by such commissioners as he shall appoint mete and indifferent for that purpose; who shall make inqurie of the number of the soldiers vnder euerie capteine; for the sufficiencie of their persons, their harness, armors, and weapons, and other their necessities: and how they were paid of their wages, and whether they were Englishmen or not.

The fourth article was, whether there had bene had a due care & regard to the preservation of the reuenues of the crowne, & for the recouerie of that which is withdrawne. And whether euerie of the officers appointed for the recieving of anie part of the said reuenues, as namelie the receiueurs of rente, shiriffes, excheatours, collectors of the subsidies, customers, clerks of the crowne, of the hamper, and of the first fruits, and the farmers of customes and such others, did yearelie make and answer their accounts; and besides sundrie other articles incident to euerie of these principals.

After that he had receiued this booke, and his commission, he prepared himselfe with all the expedition he could, to follow the great charge committed vnto him: which being done, he repaired to his maie-stie and toke his leaue: and to his farewell, he gaue him most comfortable speeches and good counsels, promising his fauor and countenance to all his well doings, and a consideration for the same when time should serue. The like leaue he toke also of the lords of the counsell, who in like order gaue him the like farewell: and these things done, he departed towards the sea side, where after he had taried a long time for a good wind and passage, he toke ship, and arrived in Ireland the thirteenth of Januarie, about fue miles from Dublin, and from thence he traueled to Dublin; where he was most honorablie recei-ued by sir Nicholas Arnold then lord iustice, and the whole counsell; together with the maior and his brethren of that citie. And the people in great troops came and saluted him, clapping and shooting with all the ioy that they could deuise.

The next sundaie then next following, being the seuenth daie of his arrivall, and the twentieth of the moneth, he accompanied with the lord iustice and counsell, repaired to the high church in the citie named Chisties church; where after that the diuine seruice was done, he toke his oth, receiued the sword, and assumed vpon him the gouernement: and wherwith he made a most pittie, wise, and eloquent oration, which consisted vpon these speciall points. The first, what a precious thing is god gouernement, and how all realmes, commonwealths, cities, and countries do flourish and prosper, where the same is orderlie, in equitie, iustice, and wisdom directed & gouerned. Secondlie, what a continuall care the queenes highnesse hath had, and yet hath, not onelie for the god guiding & ruling of the realme of England, but also of Ireland; which she so earnestlie de-sireth, and wisheth to be preserved, as well in peace as in warre: that she hath made great choise from time to time of the most grane, wise, and expert counsellors for the one; and the most valiant, skilfull, and expert men of armes for the other: that both in peace and warres, the publicke state of the commonwealth, and euerie particular member therein might be conserued, defended, and kept in safetie vnder his gouernement. And for the performance thereof, his maiestie ouer and besides the reuenues of the crowne of Ireland, did yearelie far aboue anie of his progenitors, expend of his owne cofers out of England, great masses of mo-nye, amounting to manie thousand pounds. All which his excellent expenses and continuall cares she made the lesse account of; so that his realme and subiects of Ireland might be preserved, defended, and gouerned.

Lastlie, notwithstanding his maiestie might haue made better choise of manie others, who were better able to hold his place in this realme, both for honor, wisdom, and experience: yet his pleasure was now to cast this heauie charge and burden vpon him. Which he was the more vnwilling to take vpon him, because the greater the charge was, the more vnable & weake he was to susteine the same.
Nevertheless, being in god hope, and well promised of his highnesse fauor and countenance in his well doings, and hauing his confidence in them his high-nesse counsellors associated vnto him, to ioyne aid, and assist him in this gouernement: he was and is the more readie to take the sword in hand; in hope that this his gouernement shall be to the glorie of God, the honor of his maiestie, the benefit of the commonwealth, and the preservation of the whole realme and people of the same. And so making his earnest request to the said lords present, for their continuing with him, and the aiding and assisting of him in this his maiesties seruice, he made an end of his speeches.

The said counsellors, hauing well considered the great value and weight of this his graue and wise oration, did most humbly thanke his lordship for the same, and promised in all dutifullnesse, faith, and obedience to performe and attend whatsoever to them in anie wise should apperteyne. These things done, they all conducted the said lord deputie in all honorable manner vnto the castell of Dublin: the common people in euerie street and corner meeting him, and with great acclamations and ioy did congratulat vnto his lordship his comming among them in that office. Immediatlie after the performance of all the solemnities, verteing to these actions, he called and assembled all those persons which his highnesse had appointed, admitted, and allowed to be of his maiesties priuie counsell for that realme, and did sweare them according to the accustomed manner. Then from time to time they assembled and met, consulting and deliberating what waie and order were best to be taken for repairing of that broken common-wealth and ruinous state, being as it were a man altogether infected with sores and bites, and in whose bodie from the crowne of the head to the sole of the foot there is no health. And surely if the state of that land was euer miserable and in perill to be overthrowne: it was neuer moze like than at these present; for as for the English pale, it was overwhelmed with infinite numbers of caterpillers, who daily by spoiles and robberies haue deuoured and wasted the same: whereby the people vniuersallie were so poor, and the commons in such extreme penurie, that they had not horses, armor, nor weapons to defend them, nor apparell, bittels, nor any other necessities to relieve them; the soldiers so beggerlie that they were most intolerable to the people, and so rooted in insolencie, loosenesse and idlenesse, that vniuersallie the remedie were the moze speedie, they would be past correction: and so much the worse, because manie of them were alied in marriage, and companies of the Irish: who the moze they were affected to them, their trust and seruice moze doubtful to his maiestie. The prouince of Leinster and they altogether most miserable, the Wols, Obzines, Kinshelaghies, Dooles, Dimoughs, Carenaughs, the Moyes, and the residue in their accustomed manners wholly bent to spoiles and all mischiefs, no place of any safetie remaining for the good subiect; especiallie in the countie of Kilkennie, which being sometimes a fertile rich soile, and well manured and inhabited, became of all others most desart and beggerlie, verie few being left to inhabit the same.

Downfall, the inhabitants there likewise for the most part being followers to the earle of Desmond, and following his wars against the erle of Desmond, made that prouince, and especiallie the countie of Tipperarie and Kilkennie, being wealthy and rich, to become bare and beggerlie; and verie few of whom his maiestie was or could be assured. Notwithstanding experience had taught them, and they assured, that no waie was for their recouerie and safetie so good and assured, as to humble themselves, and to become his highnesse loiall and obedient subiects: yet as swine delighting in their dirt and puddles, contented themselves rather with a beggerlie life to be miserable, than in dutifull obedience to be at peace and assured. The prouinces also of Thomond altogether almost wasted by the warres betwene the earle there and sir Donnell Obzine. Desmond likewise by reason of dissention betwene the earles of Desmond and Desmond, and by the daily inuasions and prizes of Piers Grace was almost wasted and inhabited.

Connagh, one of the goodliest, pleasantest, and most fertile soiles of that land, & in times past verie rich and wealthy, and well inhabited, is wasted with the wars betwene the earle of Clanrichard and Mac William Enter: the Irish countiees all wasted and impouerished, partly by reason of their dissimulations, sorieties, and conferences with the rebelles, and partly by the particular discords among themselves. Finally, all the gentlemen throughout, wont in times past to be keepers of hospitalitie, were by the daily prizes made vpon them and their tenants so impouerished & distressed, that they were not able to mainteine and relieve themselves nor their families. The prouince of Ulster for wealth and plentie was well stored, not onlie of themselves, but by reason that it was the receptacle and place of receipt of all the prizes and spoiles from out of the other prouinces: but as for loialtie, dutifulnesse, and obedience to his maiestie, they were most disloiall, rebellious, and disordered. For after that Shane O'Neill by blood and murder had gotten the maiestie, he alone then ruled the rest, who in pride exceeded all the men vpon the earth, abiding no superior, nor allowing any equall. And here it were not amisse, but verie expedient to set downe the first origin and cause why the said Shane did first breake out from his due obedience, and did shake off the gouernement of his maiestie, which (as farre as the writer hereof hath gathered and collected) is as here followeth.

Con O'Neill, the first earle of Tiron, had two sonnes, Matthew and this Shane or John. And king Henrie the eight hauing good liking of this Con O'Neill, and to reueine and keepe him a good subiect, he being a mightie man, and of great power in his countie, he made and created him earle of Tiron, and his eldest son Matthew he made baron of Dungannon, and the remainder of the said earledome to the said Matthew, and to the heirs male of his bodie. This Shane being the second brother, and of an aspiring mind, envied his elder brother, and in no wise could he brooke him, but from time to time seeketh occasions to quarrell and fall out with him, and in the end most traitorously and vnnaturallie murdered him: their father yet liuing, who did not so much lament and bewaile the same, but began much moze to distrust of his owne safetie. Neuertheless, it is not knownen that the said Shane did offer him any violence, but when he was dead, although he had no right to succeed into the earledome, by reason that Matthew his elder brother had left sons behind him, who by the letters patents and course of the common law were to succeed the grandfather: yet Shane usurped the name of O'Neill, and entred into his fathers inheritance according to the Irish manner, among whom the custome is, that the eldest in years of the name of any house or familie doth succeed his ancestor, vnlesse at the time of his death he had a son of the full age of one and twentie yers. And thus hauing perforce entred into his fathers inheritance, he scorneth at the English gouernement, and after the Irish manner proclaimeth himselfe O'Neill, and the capitaine of his countie, refuseth likewise all obedience to his maiestie, and breaketh out into open rebellion.

Sir Henrie Shoneie then lord iustice, in the absence of the erle of Sussex, being aduertised of these stirs, taketh aduise of the counsell what was best to be done. And then it was agreed, that the said lord iustice should take his iorney towards Dundalke, for the fortifying of the English pale, and should send a messenger to Shane O'Neill, who then late at a lordship of his about six miles from Dundalke, and to will him come to Dundalke to his lordship: which was done. But Shane returned his answer, praieing pardon, and also most humbly requested his lordship that it would please him to chrispen a son of his, & be his gossip, & then he would come to his lordship to do all things in seruice for his maiestie, as his lordship should command and appoint. This answer at the first was not thought good, nor yet honorable to the lord iustice so to do, vntill the said Shane had first come and submitted himselfe. But when it was considered what great inconueniences might ensue, if his request were denied; it was agreed that the said lord iustice should condescend vnto his request. And accordingly vpon the last of Januarie, one thousand five hundred fiftie and eight, he went vnto the said

Shane's house, and there his lordship and Jaques Wingfield were godfathers, and having performed the baptizing of the child, they both had conference of the matter: where the said Shane, to excuse his doing, did allege for his defence sundrie articles as followeth.

First, he said that Matthew baron of Dungan, now was the sonne of one Bellaie of Dundalk, a smith by occupation, begotten and bozne during the sponsals of the said Bellaie, and one Alton his wife, and that the said Matthew was alwaies taken and reputed to be the sonne of the said Bellaie, untill he was of the age of sixteen yeares or thereabouts: at which time Con O'Neill his father, upon the saleng of the said Alton, that he was the father of the said Matthew, did accept and take the said Matthew to be his sonne, & gave him the name of Farbarough. And here understand you the wickednesse of this countrie; which is, that if anie woman do mislike hir husband, and will depart from him, he shall haue all such children as were bozne of hir bodie during their abode together, except such as she shall name to be begotten by anie other man: which man so named shall by their custome haue the said child: and so it should seeme to be meant of this point. Also the said Matthew did upon this the affirmation of his mother sake to surpe the name of a segniorie of the O'Neilles, and the dominions appertaining to that segniorie and surname. Also that there be aboue a hundred of that name, which will not in anie wise peld to this the claime of Matthew, although he for his owne part would be contented therewith. Also he saith that the letters patents (if anie such be) that should intitle the sonne of the said baron to the said lands are vntillie hold, because that Con O'Neill father to the said Shane had no other right nor interest to that countrie, but during his owne life: and therefore without the consent of the lordes and inhabitants of that countrie, could make no surrender nor conuenance, whereby he might be enabled to take and haue the said lands by force of letters patents.

Also he saith, that by the lawes in the English pale of Ireland, no letters patents, made to anie person, be of anie force or value, untill that an inquisition be taken of the lands so giuen before that the letters patents do passe: which in this case neither was, nor could be done, sith the countrie of Tiron is no sithre ground. Also if the said lands should according to the quenes lawes descend to the right heire, then in right it ought to descend to him, as next heire being mulierlie bozne; and the other not so bozne. Also he saith, that upon the death of his father lord of the countrie, the whole countrie according to the custome of the countrie did assemble themselves together, and by a common consent did elect and chose (without anie contradiction) him the said Shane to be O'Neill, as the most worthy and ablest of that countrie. Which election by the custome of the countrie hath bene alwaies vsed without anie confirmation, asked of the kings and quenes of England. Also he saith that as O'Neill he claimeth such authorities, iurisdiction, and duties upon his men & countrie, as are due time out of mind to his predecessors, and which duties for the most part are recozded, and remaine in writing. When the lord iustice had at full heard these articles, and considered well of them together with the counsell, made answer unto Shane that the matter was of great weight and importance, & which neither he nor the counsell cold determine of themselves, before hir maiestie were made priuie and acquainted therewith; and therefore in the meane time willed and required him to be quiet, and to shew himselfe a dutifull subject unto hir maiestie, nothing doubting but that he should haue and re-

And so having vsed manie good and frendlie speeches and exhortations unto him, the said Shane promised to vse and behaue himselfe well and honestly, & as to his dutie should appertaine; they departed in verie frendlie manner. And thus in suth wisdom and politike manner the lord iustice handled the matter, that by temporizing and gaining of time all matters were pacified, and so continued vntill the comming ouer of the earle of Shutter lord deputie: who then of a newe toke the matter in hand, and he did so discretly and seuerely follow the same, that he ouermatched Shane O'Neill. But it so grieved the said Shane, that notwithstanding he dissembled and gaue a good countenance, & promised well, yet in the end being once at libertie, he performed nothing: but as the wolfe which often casteth his haire but neuer changeth his conditions, was one and the same man or rather worse, and therefore tyrannized and vsed most cruelte, and of all others most disolall and disobedient; to the deputie would he not come, nor would he in anie wise confer with him, but at his owne pleasure.

The quenes maiestie in some termes he would honor, but in dedes he denied all obedience, subtil and craftie he was especiallie in the morning: but in the residue of the daie verie vncertaine and vnsustainable, and much giuen to excessive gulping and setting. And albeit he had most commonlie two hundred tunnes of wines in his cellar at Dundun, & had his full fill therof, yet was he neuer satisfied, till he had swallowed by marvellous great quantities of Wiske bagh or Aqua vite of that countrie: whereof so vnmessurable he would drinke and house, that for the quenching of the heat of the bodie, which by that meanes was most extremelie inflamed and disordered, he was effones conueied (as the common report was) into a deepe pit, and stanning by night in the same, the earth was cast round about him vp to the hard chin, and there he did remaine vntill such time as his bodie was recovered to some temperature: by which meanes though he came after in some better plight for the time, yet his manners and conditions daillie worse. And in the end his pride ioined with wealth, drunkennesse, and insolencie, he began to be a tyrant, and to tyrannize ouer the whole countrie, greatlie it was feared that his intent was to haue made a conquest ouer the whole land. He pretended to be king of Ulster, euen as he said his ancestors were, and affecting the manner of the great Turke, was continually garded with six hundred armed men, as it were his familiaries about him, and had in readinesse to bring into the fields a thousand horsemen, and foure thousand footmen. He furnished all the peasants and husbandmen of his countrie with armour and weapons, and trained them vp in the knowledge of the wars: and as a lion hath in awe the beasts of the field, so had he all the people to his becke and commandement, being feared and not beloued.

Wherfore meanes and waies were practised and vsed by the lord deputie and counsell for the pacifying and recouerie of him, and commissioners from time to time sent unto him; for and about the same, who sometimes would be verie flexible, but forthwith as backwards and vntoward. Of all the residue of Ireland there was the lesse doubt to recourt them, by reason that they by their owne ciuill wars had consumed and spoiled the one and the other: but of this man, small or no hope at all, vnlesse he might be chastised, and with force be reduced to conformities. Which in the end it pleased the Lord God to take the matter in hand, and to performe the same by taking of him alwaie. And because in these troublesome times, it were meet aduertisements should go to and from hir maiestie and counsell to the lord deputie, & so likewise from his lordship to the lord deputie, taken for the more speedie conuenance of letters reciproke, there should be set postes appointed betwene London and Ireland. This was then the present state of all Ireland, altogether denoured with robberies, murders, riots, treasons, euill and intestine warres, and few or none assured and faithfull to hir highnesse out of the English pale, and out of cities and towne: and yet the one being gentlemen and living by their lands, by continuall spoiles and robberies were decayed; the other by the losse of their traffike being merchants impouerished, and brought to such extremities, as not able to relieue and mainteine themselves.

And among all other the most intollerable miseries vniuersallie reigning, this one exceeded all the rest, that there was scarce a God knowne; and if knowne, not all honored in the land, for the churches for the most part were all destroyed & vncouered, the clergie scattered, the people vntaught, and as sheepe without their pastour wandering without knowledge and instruction. When where neither God is knowne, the prince obeyed, no lawes currant, no gouernement accepted, and all things inrolled in most extreme miserie; how lamentable and dolefull is that state and kingdome? Wherefore sir Henrie Sidneie now lord deputie, & the counsell pondering this distressed state, and the great burden which laye them vpon to helpe and redresse the same, daillie assembled themselves; & deuised the best waie what might be to be taken herein. Wherein his lordships cause so much was the weaker, as that such as were chiefest of the counsell, then ioined to assist him in counsell and seruice, were for the most part spent and decayed men; and the lord deputie himselfe dyligent to deuise, to inuent, to dispose, and in the end to execute all himselfe. Well, neuertheless it was concluded and agreed, that the English pale should be fortified and defended from the inuasion of the O'neile and all his complices; and that the deuises set downe for the state and recouerie of the rest of the land should be followed from time to time, as matter, time, and oportunitie would serue thereunto.

At this present time the earles of Desmond and Desmond were in England, and the quarrels and controuersies growen betwene them were daillie examined before the lords of the counsell, and their allegations produced in writing by the one against the other. And because their assertions were so contrarious and vncertaine in denieng and affirming, as no proceeding could be had for a finall end and order, it was thought good and necessarie that their complaints and answers should be examined in the realme of Ireland, where their doings were best knowne, and where their misorders were committed. And then by the aduise of the counsell both the said earles submitted themselves to the queenes maiesties order & determination: and for performance thereof, they both by waie of recognisance in the chancerie were bound ech of them in twentie thousand pounds. And then a commission vnder hir highnesse broad seale of England was sent to the lord deputie for taking of the foresaid examinations. But in the meane time whilst these things were in doing in England, sir John of Desmond, in verie outrageous and disorderd manner, fired & spoiled the tenements of the earle of Desmond, which things were verie hostile after appealed. In these troublesome daies Mac Artimozee an ancient gentleman of the Irish race, and principall man of his sept in Downshire, hauing verie great possessions, and late still in peace and did nothing at all, neither toke he partie with one whom he liked not, neither holpe he the other whom he feared not, but to the outward appareance misliked both their doings.

This man made his humble sute to hir maiestie, that he might surrender all his lands, possessions and territories vnto hir maiesties highnesse, and to recognize his dutie and allegiance to hir, and so to reforme and haue a new estate therof from hir againe, according to the orders and lawes of England. Which hir maiestie did accept, and forthwith made him a new estate of inheritance: and for the better his state in all obedience and dutie to hir crowne, did for the worthinesse of his blood & stocke, & for the greatness of his gouernement make him a baron of the parlement in that reime; & for his further advancement created him an earle vnder hir letters patents by the name of the earle of Clancare. These newes being reported to Shane O'neile, he scoffed at it, nothing liking the choise of hir highnesse in aduancing such a one to that honour, and enuied and maligne him that he was so honored. And therefore not long after, when the commissioners were sent to intreat with him vpon sundrie points, they found him most arrogant & out of all good order, braving out speeches not meet nor seemelie. For (saith he) you haue made a wise earle of Mac Artimozee, I keepe as good a man as is he. And albeit I confesse the queene is my soueraigne ladie, yet I neuer made peace with hir, but at hir seeking. And where he had requited to haue his parlement robes sent vnto him as earle of Aron, which title he claimed and required (which if it were denied him, then he required a triall to be made in parlement) yet now he cared not for so meane an honour as to be an earle, except he might be better and higher than an erle. For I am (saith he) in blood and power better than the best, and I will giue place to none of them; for mine ancestors were kings of Ulster. And as Ulster was theirs, so now Ulster is mine and shall be mine: with the sword I wan it, and with the sword I will keepe it. Which his words fell out true, though long he inioied not the same: and forthwith he fell into most horrible tyrannies and cruelties, whereby he became execrable and hateful vnto all his people and countrie who were wearie of him.

Now hir maiestie, being græued and annoied with his treasons and rebellions of long time, was fullie minded either to haue him clearelie rooted out, or chastised: but therein she was stayed, being bozne in hand that the best waie to bring him to reformation, was to yeld to him in sundrie things of him desired. But now the seeing him to haue manifested himselfe a notorious traitor, and past all grace; she gaue commandement to the lord deputie to imploye his whole care, consideration, and wisdom, how such a cankered and dangerous rebell might be utterlie extirped. And seeing the matter also to haue to manie accidents and circumstances belonging vnto it, as which by letters to and fro could not be well concluded: therefore she sent ouer sir Francis Anolles vicechamberleine, to conferre with the lord deputie, who arrived at Dublin the seventh of Aprill 1566, aswell concerning these matters of warre, as the whole state and gouernment of this realme. When he was arrived, and hauing at large conferred with him about the same, the time betwene them was concluded and appointed, that the seruice should be in the winter; & accordingly things necessarie, as well monie, men, munitions, and vittels were sent ouer, and Edward Randolph coronell of the footmen, and sundrie other capteins arrived with their soldiers from out of England, and all things were disposed both for the garrison and the campe, as it was conuenient conuentsent to be.

Likewise the archtraitor knowing that preparation was made against him, he doth the like also on his part against his maiestie; and at a lordship or manour of his, about six miles out of Dundalke, he mustered all his whole armie, which was of foure thousand footmen, and seven hundred horsemen. And gloried much in himselfe of such his great force and puissance, which he thought to suffice to haue conquered all Ireland withall; and that no man durst to adventure vpon him: he marcheth vnto the towne of Dundalke, where he incampeth himselfe, & besiegeth the same. He was no more busie to giue sundrie attempts of inuasion, and to enter the towne, but the souldiers within were as valiant to resist and defend: which in the end turned to his reproch, and hee had the repulse, being with shame driuen to raise his siege, and to depart with the losse.

The like successe he had at Whites castell, and when he made his rode and inuasion into the English pale, when his great multitude stood him not in so much head, as a farre smaller companie of the English souldiers deserved commendation: which perforce and maugre of his teeth compelled him to retire with shame, and to returne with losse. About this time in the moneth of Iulie 1565, and the first yeare of the deputation of sir Henrie Sidneie, Edward Randolph, a verie expert and a valiant souldier, was sent ouer out of England, and arrived at the Dirrie with seven hundred men vnder his regiment, and he himselfe by the counsell in England appointed to be the coronell. This man as soone as he was landed, intrenched himselfe at the Dirrie, where he remained in garrison without doing of anie thing, vntill the coming of the lord deputie from Dublin, with the residue of his maiesties forces, appointed to be ioined with the said coronell, for the better seruice against the arrogant traitour Shane O'Neill.

And after that the said lord deputie was come, and had staid there about six daies, and had set all things in such good order as that seruice required; he returned backe to Dublin through O'Donells countrie, and so thorough Connagh, leaving the coronell accompanied with one band of fiftie horsemen vnder the leading of capteine George Heruie the elder, and with seven companies of hundreds of footmen vnder the charges of capteine Robert Cornewall, and capteine John Ward, and others; all well furnished, both with munitions, vittels, and all other necessaries meet and requisite. Shane O'Neill who knew well of the garrisons, of their forces & numbers, and he not minding that they should there rest in peace, but standing now vpon his honor and reputation, incamped himselfe about two miles from the garrison, hauing then in his armie a thousand five hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. And from daie to daie he would continuallie with his horsemen houer and range the fields, and shew himselfe ready to trie the matter if the Englishmen durst to adventure the same.

The coronell not liking these daillie offers, and thinking it to be a verie great dishonour vnto him, and all the English nation, which were come over to serue against him, and now would do nothing, but were daillie bearded by the enimie: notwithstanding that his forces when they were at the best, were but small in respect of the enimie; and by reason of the sickness in the campe, that his small companie was much weakened and vnable to serue: yet he was determined with a full resolution to take the offer of the enimie, and either he would lose his life, or remoue him from his so neere a seat. Wherevpon he drew out of his companie to the number of three hundred men, whome he thought most meet to serue, and being accompanied with fiftie horsemen vnder capteine George Heruie, marched toward O'Neills campe, who pretending a great toy to see the forwardnesse of the Englishmen, he with all his forces issued out, and with speed prepared to incounter with them; perswading himselfe that he should that daie be master of the field, and haue a conquest to his hearts desire.

The coronell made chosse of the ground to fight in, and prepared himselfe to stand and abide the charge. O'Neill in great furie, and with a great multitude charged the coronells footmen, and his maine battell; but he was so receiued with the English shot and so galled, that he made some staie. Wherevpon capteine Heruie taking his oportunitie, most valiantlie with his small band of horsemen brake in to the battell of O'Neill. Likewise coronell Randolph with his few horsemen gaue the charge vpon the left wing of them. The one of them being well followed and accompanied with his band, did the seruice which he desired: but the coronell verie valiantlie making waie through the enimies, and no man following him, was in fighting wounded to death, and whereof immediatlie he died. The rebels being astonished and amazed at the valour of the Englishmen, fled and turned their backs, whome the souldiers followed, and had the slaughter of them so long as their weapons lasted in this conflict. The rebels were slaine that daie in this chase about foure hundred persons, besides the like number of such as were hurt and wounded. The coronell O'Neill was slaine, but capteine Heruie and diuerse of the horsemen were verie sore hurt and wounded.

After the death of this valiant coronell, whose funeralle the lord deputie did afterwards celebrate with great honour at Dublin, Edward Sentlow was made coronell: vnder whose gouernement the garrison liued verie quietlie. For this last overthrow he quailed the spirits and courages of O'Neill and his companie, that they had no desire of anie further incountering with the Englishmen. And thus all the winter following little was done: and being determined in the spring to adventure some peece of seruice, but the lord otherwise appointed it. For about the foure and twentieth of Aprill, by a misfortune neuer yet knowne by what means, the fort and towne of the Dirrie was all burned, and the storehouses where the munitions and vittels laie were blowne vp with the gunpowder, and twentie men killed with the same: and so manie of the souldiers as laie sicke there were burned in their beds. Wherevpon the coronell calling all his capteins together, and considering the distresse which they now were in, by the losse of their vittels and munitions, and not knowing where to be furnished otherwise, they all concluded and determined to abandon that place, and to imbarke themselves for Dublin, which immediatlie they all did, sauing capteine George Heruie: for he rather did chosse to hazard his life to returne by land, than to impouerish his souldiers by killing their horses (which perforce they must needs haue done) for want of shipping. And therefore euen almost against all hope he returned towards Dublin through the enimies countrie, who followed and chased him foure daies together without intermission, both with horsemen and footmen: but at length he recovered Dublin, not without great wonder and admiration. The lord deputie he wanted not his espials, both about O'Neill, and in all places thorough out Ulster: and thereby knew the forces, bent, and determinations of euerie of them, whereby he knew how to meet with them euerie waie for the best seruice of his maiestie. And yet considering the great importance of the service, he could not be satisfied herein, but that he would make a tourne into Ulster himselfe. And being accompanied with the earle of Kildare, and certeine of the counsell, and with such capteins and souldiers as he thought good: he advanced & set forth out of Drogheda the seventeenth of September 1566, and incamped that night at Kosslekeagh, & so from thence he travelled through out Ulster, and passed thence unto Athlon in Connagh, where he came the six and twentieth of October.

In this tourne the rebell neuer durst (for all his brags) once to shew his face, nor to offer anie sight at all: saving once at and nere a wood not far from Blogher, where he offered a skirmish, and gaue the charge with horsemen, footmen, and certeine Scottish shot: which continued a good space, and sundrie hurt on both sides, but none died of his lordships men. He shewed himselfe also once with a great multitude of horsemen and footmen, not farre from the castell of Lirlough Lenough, called the Salmon, but took his ease and durst not to giue the aduenture. In this tourne the lord deputie restored Donnell to the possession of his lands and castels, kept by Dneile from him; & sundrie lords and men of the best sort submitted themselves. By which this his lordships tourne he recovered to his highnesse a countrie of foure score miles in length, and eight and fortie miles in bredth, without losse of anie man saving Mac Swier, who being sicke died in this tourne; and saving a few persons which by the waie upon an occasion would aduenture the winning of a certeine Island in the middle of a lough, wherein was supposed to be great store of wealth and vittels of the enimies, and in assailing of it they were drowned.

Immediatlie upon the discharge of the armie at Athlon, the lord deputie fortified all the frontiers of the English pale with garrisons sufficient for the same. And as concerning the troublesome state of Spounser, the earle of Desmond was in the field with two thousand men, and incamped himselfe in places indifferent to aniove at his pleasure the earle of Desmond, the lord Barrie, the lord Roch, and sir Morris Fitzgiralde of the Decies; but he did not hurt anie man at all: saving one Mac Donogh a rebell and a disloyall savage man. The lord deputie being overlaid with the continuall cares to resist Dneile, could not in person traueil into Spounser, nor yet without great perill disaide his armie: wherefore he sent capteine Herne constable of Leighlin unto the said earle, wherby he might be aduertised of his intendment and meaning: which appeared to be but a mere insolencie and an outrage to be reuenged upon the earle of Desmond, although the rumor was, that he would consone with Dneile. Which report when it came to his eares, and being aduertised that the lord deputie was offended with him that he had gathered such a force, and was in the fields. He for his purgation herein, without further delaie, took his horse, and hauing in his companie onelle the baron of Dunboine, and capteine Herne, with their companies, made hast to present himselfe before the lord deputie: where and before whom for purging of himselfe, and to declare his dutie, he offered himselfe to his lordships denotion, either to go and attend him unto Ulster in that sort as he then was, or else to follow him with all such force as he could get; the lord deputie finding him vittels: and then to abide & serue in Ulster in despite of Shane Dneile; or else that he would in his lordships absence remaine upon the borders there, with such a number of horsemen, as should be appointed unto him; shewing also and pretending such dutifullnesse to his maiestie, as was met for a subject to shew to his soveraigne. The deputie having some liking of his offers, and considering the sickle state of these presents, accepteth his last offer, willing him to go backe againe; and to prepare a crew of one hundred horsemen, at the least, and so to returne againe within fouretene daies: which he did, and with him came sir John Desmond, his uncle the baron of Dunboine, the lord Potoge and others: who accompanied with the baron of Deluin, sir Warham Bentleger, and capteine Herne, did remaine upon the borders, untill his lordships returne from out of his tourne in Ulster.

And as the realme at large was much infected with the cruell warres of Dneile and the troubles in Spounser; so also there wanted no daily complaints of griefs unto the lord deputie of sundrie persons one against another. For Oliver Sutton, a gentleman dwelling in the English pale, did exhibit a certeine booke in writing, containing an information of sundrie notozious disorders in that realme, hurtfull to the good policie of the same; and contrarie to sundrie good lawes and acts of parliament, whereof a great part did touch the earle of Kildare. The matter was referred by his maiesties order to the hearing of the lord deputie and counsell. Likewise sir Edmund Butler and Piers his brother were grievously complained upon by the lorde of Dunboine, Mac Brian Arra, Oliver Fitzgiralde, sir William McCarell, and others; for their dailie outrages, robberies, murders, preies, and spoiles taken. For the hearing and appealing of such matters, and for the better ministracion of iustice, the lord deputie had bene a long tyme to his maiestie and counsell for a chancelor to be sent ouer, who at length were resolved upon doctor Weston, deane of the arches, who arrived at Dublin in Iulie 1567, a notable and a singular man: by profession a lawyer, but in life a diuine, a man so bent to the execution of iustice, and so seuerer therein, that by no meanes would he be seduced or auerted from the same: and so much good in the end ensued of his bright, diligent, and dutifull service; as that the whole realme found themselves most happy and blessed to haue him serue among them. Now he taking upon him to deale in all matters of complaints, both eased the lord deputie of a great burthen, and did most good to the countrie, and acquitted himselfe against his maiestie.

But to returne to the L. deputie, who immediatlie upon the dismissing of the armie at Athlon, he took order (as is aforesaid) for placing of his garrisons in such convenient places upon the frontiers, as then appertained and was most meet & convenient. The rebell on his part leaueth nothing undone, which might be for the furtherance of his enterprises: and being in great tollitie of himselfe deuised manie things; and to make some shew of his abilitie, entered into the English pale, with sword and fire wasted the countrie, slue manie of his maiesties subjects, and in the end besieged his highnesse towne of Dundalk: where his pride and treason were iustlie scourged, who came not with so much glorie to besiege it, as he did returne with shame to leaue and lose it. The lord deputie not abiding the same, nor sleeping his matters, determined to make a new rode upon him; and in the meane time, he so handled the matter, that he had unfettered him of his best friends, aids, and helps. For besides the whole countrie, as is before said, gained from him the last tourne, Mac Swier, a mightie man in his countrie forsooke him, and submitted himselfe to his maiestie, offering all loiall obedience and faithfull service, and to receiue his lands and countrie at his highnesse hands.

Alexander Og and Mac Donnell offer to serue hir maiestie, with all the Scots vnder them against the rebell. Con Donnell late deliuered from the rebell, offereth seruice against him. Tirlogh Lenough with the helps of his neighbours daile backed the said Oneile, that his force was quailed that waie.
The lord deputie had continuallie foure regiments residing nere the English pale, who continuallie as it were by turnes were occupied in persecuting of the rebell: & his lordship being at Drogheda did also 10 issue out, and in one morning took a preie of two thousand nine, 500 garrons, and innumerable other small beastes and cattell. The rebell seeing himselfe thus distressed of his goods, and forsaken of his helps and followers, his men, some by Donnell, and some by others to the number of three or foure thousand persons at times slaine, himselfe discomfited, his passages stopped, and all places of his refuge preuen-ted, and now but one poore castell left wherein he trusted to commit himselfe vnto; he being thus weake-20 ned, and beholding his declination and fall towards, was fullie bent and determined to disguise himselfe, and so as not knowne to come with a collar or halter about his necke to the presence of the lord deputie, and in all humble and lowlie manner to submit himselfe: hoping that by this kind of humilitie to find mercie at hir maiesties hands. But his conscience was so cauterised, and his hands so imbued with infinit and most horrible murders, bloodsheds, trea-30 sons, whoredomes, drunkenness, robberies, burnings, spoiles, oppreSSIONS, and with all kinds of wickednesse, that his heart was ouerlaid and ouerladen with an vtter despaire to obtaine anie grace or fauor: and therefore was the more easilie persuaded by those whome he took to be his friends, to trie first and to intreat the Scots for friendship, and that they would ioine and aid him in his most wicked rebellion. Whereupon he took his iournie towards Clandeboie, where Alexander Og and his companie, 40 to the number of six hundred persons, were then in-camped: and for the better gaining of his purpose, he had a little before enlarged Charleie Bote brother to the said Alexander, and who had bene prisoner with him.

The Scots disguised the matter with him, pretending and promising him aid and assistance: which they ment not. For as soon as Oneile together with Donnells wife, whom he kept, & the small companie which he brought with him were come into the tent, and they assured of him; they called to remembrance 50 the manifold iniuries which they had receiued at his hands, and namelie the murdering of one James Mac Conell, & one Mac Guille their nere cousins and kinsmen: and being inflamed with malicious minds to reuenge their deaths, they fell to quarelling with the said Shane Oneile, and with their slaughter swords helued him to peeces, and slue all those of his companie that were with him: his bodie they wrapped in a kernes shirt, and so without all honor was carried to a ruinous church not farre off, and there interred; but after a few daies he was taken vp againe by capteine Piers, by whose deuise this stratagem or rather tragedie was practised, and his head was sundred from the bodie, and sent to the lord deputie, who caused the same to be set vpon a stake or pole on the top of the castle of Dublin. A fit end for such a beginning, and a iust reward for such a wicked traitor and sacrileger: who began his tyrannie in blood, did continue it with blood, and ended it with blood. The lord deputie being then at Drogheda, and aduertised of the death of this Shane, and of the iust iudgements of God laid vpon him; for the same prostrated himselfe before the high and eternall God, and gaue his most humble and hartie thanks for the delinerie of that land from so wicked a tyrant, sacri-liger and traitor; and with all the conuenient speed that might be, he dispatched the messengers to hir maiestie and counsell, aduertising this hap and good successe. Which done, his lordship with all speed made his repaire into Ulster, and incamped himselfe in the middle and heart of the countrie, vnto whome all the noblemen and gentlemen of Tiron being glad that they were deliuered from the tyrant, made their repaire vnto his lordship: and especiallie all they which were competitors of the captainrie of Tiron, who most humbly and obediently presented and submitted themselves vnto hir highnesse. And when his lordship had set all things in such order as the time required, he assembled all the gentlemen of the countrie, and most pithily and effectually instructed and perswaded them to obedience, teaching them the great blessings of God which cometh thereby, as also putteth them in mind what inconueniences, miseries and calamities they had felt by the contra-rie: and for their greater quietnesse and peace, he promised shortly to send commissioners amongst them, who should haue authoritie to decide all controuersies betwene partie and partie (title of land and death of man excepted.)

Also he proclaimed and commanded hir maiesties peace to be kept, and commanded all churchmen and husbandmen to returne to their accustomed exercises: and that all men of warre should liue vpon their owne, or vpon that which their friends with a good will would giue them: and so publishing peace vniuersallie, euerie man departed home iofullie.
The lord deputie likewise returned to Dublin, and commanded the sonne of the late rebell, who laie for an hostage of his father, to be safely kept in the castell of Dublin, according to hir maiesties letters of commandement in that behalfe, dated the first of Iulie 1567. The quenes maiestie being deliuered from this traitorous rebell, and hauing all Ulster at hir commandement and disposition, was verie desirous to haue a true plot of the whole land, wher-by the might in some sort see the same, & did send ouer into Ireland one Robert Leith, skilfull in that art, and that he should make the perfect descriptions of the same. Likewise also she being aduertised of the outrageous dealings of the earle of Desmond, in maintaining proclaimed rebels, and continuing of warres against the earle of Desmond (whose info-lencie to seeke to be reuenged vpon the said earle, was the disturbance of the whole realme, the spoile of the whole countrie, and the onelie cause of great murthers, bloodshed, and bndwing of manie people) she willed the lord deputie by hir letters to apprehend the said Desmond, and to commit him to the castell of Dublin, which was so done. And after both he and his brother sir John of Desmond were sent into England, and there committed to the towre.

After all the foresaid broiles and ciuill wars were appeased, and the realme set in quietnesse and good order, the lord deputie hauing receiued hir maiesties letters for his repaire into England vnto hir presence, he did accordingly prepare himselfe therevnto, to, and by a commission vnder hir hode seale of Ireland did appoint doctor Weston then lord chancelor, and sir William Fitzwilliams treasurer at wars, to be lords iustices in his absence: the one of them being verie well learned, iust, and vpright; the other verie wise, & of great knowledge and experfence, in the affaires of that land. Both which two being like well minded to do hir maiestie seruice, did most louingly and brotherly agree therein, each one aduising and aduertising the other according to the seuerall gifts which God had bestowed vpon them: by which meanes they passed their government verie well and quietlie to the great contentation of hir maiestie, the commendation of themselves, and the common peace of the countrie; and so the said sir Henrie hauing placed the said iustices, he passed the seas into England, and carried with him the earle of Desmond and Conno; Sligo, he was with great honor receiued at the court, and the other was sent to the tower. Hir maiestie lay at this time at Hampton court, and looking out at a window, she saw him to come in with two hundred men attending vpon him, and not knowing at the first sight who it was, it was told hir that it was sir Henrie Sidneie hir deputie in Ireland. Then it is well (quoth she) for he hath two of the best offices in England. So he presented himselfe before hir highnesse, and was welcome to hir. Neuerthelesse, after his departure, the particular grudges betwene some certeine men, brake out into great and outrageous disorders, as sir Edmund Butler with great hostilitie maketh inuasion vpon Oliuer Fitzgerald, being accompanied with Piers Grace. The outlawes of the Conno; and Imores proclaimed traitors, and hauing in the field a thousand of Gallowglasses, horsemen, and horses, threaten to burne the towne of Kilkennie, and spoile Dearell of his countrie. But they as also Oliuer Fitzgerald, a man not apt in times past to complaine, but rather bent to satisfie himselfe with double reuerge, leauing to seeke reuenge by armes, made their recourses to the lords iustices, and by law requested redresse. The earle of Clancart was puffed vp with such insolencie, that he named himselfe king of Mounster, and did confederate with the Mac Swaines, Mollian Hore, and others of the Irishie of that prouince, and in warlike manner and with banners displayed inuade the lord Roches countrie, and in burning of his countrie, he destroyed all the corne therein, seven hundred sheepe, and a great number of men, women and children, and carried awaye fiftene hundred kine, and a hundred garons. Also James Fitzmoris of Desmond maketh cruel warres against the lord Fitzmoris baron of Lixenew, which albeit they were but priue displeasures, yet troublesome to the whole countrie: and the lords iustices being not prepared to stop the same, they did yet so temporise with them, as they gained time, till further order might be taken vpon aduertisement of hir maiesties pleasure here in. About this time one Hore a runnigate priest, hauing latelie bene at Rome, and there consecrated by the popes bull archbishop of Cashell, arrived into Ireland, and made chalenge to the same see: which being denied vnto him by the archbishop which was there placed by hir maiestie, the said supposed bishop suddenly with an Irish skaine wounded the bishop, and put him in danger of his life.

This yeare sir Peter Carew of Mhor: estrefe in the countie of Deuon knight, one descended of a noble and high parentage, whose ancestors for sundrie hundred of yeares were not onelie barons of Carew in England; but marqueses of Corke, barons of Dron, and lords of Malton Twete; and sundrie other seignories in Ireland. When he had looked into his euidences, and had found how by right these great inheritances were descended vnto him: he made the queens maiestie and counsell acquainted therewith, and prayed that with their fauor and furtherance he might haue libertie to follow, and by order of law to recouer the same. Which was granted vnto him, as also he had hir highnesse and their lordships severall letters to them, then lords iustices and officers there to that effect: and willing them to aid and assist him with all such hir maiesties euidences remaining in the records of the castell of Dublin, or else where in that land; and by all such other good meanes they might. Wherevpon he sent the witer hereof to be his agent: who hauing by search found his title to be good, and confirmed by sundrie records and presidents, found in hir maiesties treasure and castell of Dublin, answering and agreeing with the euidences of sir Peter Carew: then the said sir Peter passed in person into Ireland, and made title and claime to the lordship of Malton, then in the possession of sir Christopher Chiuers knight, and to the baronie of Dron, then in the occupation of the Caucnaughts.

The first, when it was found good in law, and sir Christopher Chiuers yielded, and compounded for it: the other was trauced before the lord deputie and counsell, and vpon good and substantiall euidences, records, and proofes; a decree passed by the lords of the counsell, in the behalfe of sir Peter Carew, and the same confirmed by the lord deputie, and by that meanes he recouered the possession of the baronie, which was before taken from his ancestors; as the records doe impart, about the eighteenth yeare of king Richard the second. But as for the marqueship of Corke, being a matter of great weight and importance, and the prouince of Mounster then not settled in antequietnesse: he would not as then nor yet thought it good to deale therein. Sir Henrie Sidneie, hauing spent a long time in England, was commanded to returne to his charge in Ireland, where he arrived at Crag Fergus, in September 1568; and took the sword of gouernement vpon him, and so discharged the lords iustices. And then he and the counsell by their letters of the fourth of November 1568, did aduertise hir maiestie of the state that the said realme of Ireland then stood in. Which in brieue consisted in these points immediate following.

That sir Edmund Butler had made a prae in Shillelagh vpon Oliuer Fitzgerald, and done sundrie murders, burnings, and great spoiles vpon his countrie: who was forthwith sent for, and refused to come, excusing that he had businesse about the execution of certeine seruices in the counties of Kilkennie, and Tipperarie, and that the residue of all Leinster was quiet. That Connagh was in indifferent good order, sauing some contention betwene the earle of Clancart, and Mac William Enter; and an old controuersie renewed betwene McDonell and Conner Sligo for the title of a rent in Enter, Connaghs countrie. In Thomond great complaints made against the earle thereof, by Mthaghnes, who by reason of the oppression of the said earle, he was compelled with his followers to forsake his countries. As for Mounster, it was all in disorder by the warres of James Fitzmoris of Desmond, against Fitzmoris baron of Lixenew: and of the earle of Clancart, against the baron of Roch: and also by the disorders of Edward Butler, who being combined with Piers Grace and certeine outlawes, did disorderlie spoile and prae the countries to feed their bellies.

The present state of Ulster the lord deputie being desirous to know the certaintie thereof, immediatlie vpon his landing in Ireland he made a iourneie throughout the same, and found the Irishie to stand in waivering terms: wherevpon he sent for Turlogh Lenogh O'Neill, who yielding himselfe somewhat guiltie, because he somewhat swarued from his dutie, and differed from the articles in his lordships absence before, concluded with him in making a iourneie vpon Fernelte, and in combining with the Scots, of whom he had in retinue about one thousand; he desired pardon: which it was long and vaine hable obtained, and not until his lordship had caused the pledges to be executed, which the Scots

Scots had put in for their loltaltie. Adonelle quietlie possessed the countrie of Tirconell, and continued a dutifull subiect to his maiestie; saving the old grudge betwene him and Turlogh did rather increase than decate. Whan lord of the land betwene Loughfole and the Ban, being for the same sometime molested by Turlogh Kenogh, did beare with all iniuries, and desired to be exempted from Turlogh, and to hold the same of the quenes maiestie. He like did the two princippall men, eligible for the capitaine of Tircon, desire for their parts all the residue of Ulster in god staie and quietnesse.

The lord deputie after this iourneie returned to Dublin, and there, when by the aduise of the council he had disposed all things in god order concerning the gouernement: he caused the writs for summons of the parlement to be awarded out vnto euerie noble man for his apperance; & to euerie thirde for choosing of knights and burgeses for their like apperance at Dublin the seuenteenth of Ianuarie, in the eleuenth yeare of his maiesties reigne; at which time and date apperance was then and there made accordinglie. On the first date of which parlement, the lord deputie, representing his maiesties person, was conducted and attended in most honorable manner vnto Christes church, and from thence vnto the parlement house: where he sat vnder the cloth of estate, being apparelled in the princelie robes of crimson velvet doubled or lined with ermin. And then & there the lord chancelor made a verie eloquent oration, declaring what law was, of what great effect and value, how the common societie of men was thereby mainteined, and each man in his degree conserued; as well the inferior as the superior, the subiect as the prince: and how carefull all god common-wealths in the elder ages haue bene in this respect: who considering the time, state, and necessitie of the common-wealth, did from time to time ordeine and establish most holsonne lawes, either of their deuises, or drawn from some other god common-wealth: and by these meanes haue prospered and continued.

And likewise, how the quenes most excellent maiestie, as a most naturall mother ouer her children, and as a most vigilant prince ouer her subiects, hath bene alwaies, & now presentlie is verie carefull, studious, & diligent in this behalfe: hauing caused this present parlement to be assembled, that by the counsell and aduise of you her nobilitie, & you her knights and burgeses, such god lawes, orders, and ordinances maie be decreed, as maie be to the honor of almightie God, the preservation of his maiestie, and of his imperall crowne of this realme, and the safetie of the common-wealth of the whole realme: for which they were not onelie to be most thankfull; but also most carefull to do their duties in this behalfe. And then he the lord speaker directing his speeches to the knights and burgeses, who were there in the behalfe of the whole commons of the realme, willed them that for the auoiding of confusion, and for an orderlie proceeding in this action: they should assemble them selues at and in the house appointed for that assemble; and there to make choise of some wise and sufficient man to be their mouth & speaker. And then concluding with an exhortation of obedience and dutifulnesse, he ended, and the court adourned vntill thursdaie next, the twentieth of Ianuarie. In the meane time, the knights and burgeses met in the lower house, and appointed for their speaker one Stanhurst, recorder of the citie of Dublin, a verie graue, wise, and learned man; who vpon thursdaie aforesaid was presented to the lord deputie, and to the lords of the higher house: & then he hauing done most humble his obedience and dutie, made his oration and speech; Stanhursts first abasing himselfe, being not a man sufficientlie adorned and furnished with such gifts of knowledge and learning, as to such an office and calling dooth appertene: wherein he was so much the more vnfit, as the cause he had in hand was of great weight and importance. And therefore he wished, if it might so seme god to his lordship, some man of more grauitie, and of better experience, knowledge, and learning might supplie the place. Neuerthelesse, for so much as he might not refuse it, he was the more willing, because he did well hope his seruise being done with his best god will, and in all dutifulnesse, it would be accepted. And againe his comfort was the more, because he had to deale in such a cause, as was for the establishing of some good and holsonne lawes, whereof he was a professor.

And hereupon he toke an occasion, according to the argument that was before handled by the lord chancelor, speaker in the higher house, to discourse of the nature and good effect of lawes, and what good successe there insueth to all such realmes, countries, and common-wealths, as by lawes are well ruled & gouerned. And when he had spoken at large hereof, there he declared what great causes that realme of Ireland had, to giue for euer most hartie thanks and praises to God for his goodnesse, in sending such a vertuous, noble, and a most goodlie prince, as was his maiestie; who not onlie was carefull by the sword to stand in their defense against all enemies, traitors, and rebels, in times of wars and rebellions: but also for their conseruation in times of peace would haue such lawes, statutes, and ordinances to be made in a parlement of themselves, as should be most expedient for the common-wealth of the same land. When he had at large discoursed of this matter, then he concluded with an humble petition, that it might please his maiestie to grant vnto them their liberties and freedoms of old belonging to euerie assemble of a parlement. The first was, that euerie man being a member of the lower house, should and might haue free coming and going to and from the parlement: and during their abode at the same without molestation or impeachment of anie person or persons, or for anie matter then to be laid against anie of them. The second, that they and euerie of them might haue libertie to speake their minds freely to anie bill to be read, & matter to be proposed in that parlement. Thirddie, that if anie of the said house should misorder and misbehaue himselfe in anie vndercent manner, or if anie other person should euill intreat or abuse anie of the said house, that the correction and punishment of euerie such offender should rest and remaine in the order of the said house. When he had ended his speech, and in most humble manner done his obeisance; the lord deputie hauing paused vpon the matter, made answer to euerie particular point in most eloquent and effectual manner, which consisted in these points: Nothing mistaking with the speaker for so much abasing of himselfe, because he knew him to be both graue, wise, and learned, and verie sufficient for that place, doubting nothing but that he would performe the same in all dutifulnesse, as to him appertained. And concerning the benefit which groweth to all nations and common-wealths by the vse of the lawes; besides that dallie experience did confirme the same generallie, so no one nation particularlie could better anouch it than this realme of Ireland: and therefore he did well hope that they would accordinglie frame themselves to liue accordinglie, and also to praise for his maiesties safetie and long life, whereby vnder his might intole a peaceable and a quiet life in all prosperitie. And concerning the priuileges, which they requested requested to be allowed, forsomuch as the same at the first were granted to the end that they might the better and more quietlie serue hir highnesse in that assemble, to hir hono^r, and to the benefit of the common-wealth, it pleased hir maiestie so long as she were not impeached, no^r hir imperiall state derogated, that they should intoie the same. And so after a long time spent in this oration the court was adjourned.

The next daie following being fridaie the lower house met; and contrarie to the order of that house, and dutie of that compante, in stead of unitie there began a diuision, and for concord discord was received. For all, o^r the most part of the knights and burgesses of the English pale, especia^llie they who dwelled within the countie of Meth and Dublin, who seeing a great number of Englishmen to haue place in that house began to except against that assemble as not good, no^r warranted by law. Their vantage was sir Christopher Barnwell knight, who being somewhat learned, his credit was so much the more, and by them thought most meetest and worthie to haue bene the speaker for that house. And he being the spokesman alleged thre speciall causes, whie he and his complices would not yeld their consents. The first was, because that there were certeine burgesses returned for sundrie towne, which were not corporat, and had no voice in the parlement. The second was, that certeine shiriffes, and certeine maiors of towne corporat had returned themselves. The third and chiefest was that a number of Englishmen were returned to be burgesses of such towne and corporations, as which some of them neuer knew, and none at all were resiant & dwelling in the same, according as by the lawes is required.

These matters were questioned among themselves in the lower house for foure daies togither, and no agreement: but the more words, the more choler; and the more speeches, the greater boiles; untill in the end, for appealing the matter, the same was referred to the lord deputie and iudges of the realme: vnto whom the said speaker was sent to declare the whole matter, and to know their resolutions. And they hauing at large discoursed and conferred of this matter, returned their answer; that concerning the first and second exceptions, that the burgesses returned for towne not corporat, and for such shiriffes, maiors, and souereignes as haue returned themselves, shall be dismissed out of the same: but as for such others as the shiriffes and maiors had returned, they should remaine, and the penaltie to rest vpon the shiriffes for their wrong returns. The messenger of this answer, howsoeuer he were liked, his message could not be received no^r allowed: which being aduertised vnto the lord deputie and the iudges, then Lucas Dillon hir maiesties attorneie generall was sent vnto them, to ratifie and confirme their resolutions: and yet could not be credited, neither would they be satisfied, vntesse the iudges themselves would come in persons and set downe this to be their resolutions. Upon this answer the speaker commanded a bill to be read, but the foresaid persons would not suffer no^r abide the reading thereof: but rose vp in verie disordered manner, farre differing from their duties in that place, and as contrarie to that grauitie and wisdom, which was o^r should be in them. Wherefore, for pacifieng of the same, the chiefe iustices of the quenes bench, and the chiefe iustice of the common places: the quenes sergent, at some generall, and sollicito^r, the next daie following came to the lower house, and there did affirme their former resolutions, which thought it might haue sufficed. Yet certeine lawyers who had place in that house, did not altogether like thereof.

And albeit this matter were orderlie compassed, and sufficient to haue contented euerie man: yet the same was so stomached, that the placing of the Englishmen to be knights and burgesses, could not be digested, as did appere in the sequelle of that assemble, where euerie bill furthered by the English gentlemen was stopped and hindered by them. And especia^llie sir Edmund Butler, who in all things which tended to the quenes maiesties profit o^r common-wealth, he was a principall against it: fearing that their capteinries should be taken awaie, and coine, and liuerie be abolished, and such other like disorders redressed, which he and his complices mistaking, it did euen open it selfe of a rebellion then a breiuing and towards. Which in deed followed. For immediatlie after the parlement, he returned home with a discontented mind, and gathered his forces, and followed his purpose. But to the purpose.

There were two billes put in of moment & great consequence. The one was concerning the repeale of an act for that sessions, onelie made in the time of sir Edward Poynings lord deputie, in the tenth yere of king Henrie the seventh, which though it were meant most for their owne benefit and common-wealth of that realme: yet so gelous they were, that they would not in long time enter into the consideration thereof. The other was for the granting of the imposs for wines then first read. And in this matter they shewed themselves verie stoward & so vniquiet, that it was more like a bearebaiting of disordered persons, than a parlement of wise and graue men. Wherewith a certeine English gentleman (the writer hereof) being a burgesse of the towne of Athenrie in Connagh, who had before kept silence, and still so meant to haue done; when he saw these foule misorders and ouerthwarting, being græued, stood vp, and praied libertie to speake to the bill, who made a preamble, saying, that it was an vblage in Pythagoras schooles, that no scholars of his should for certeine yeares reason, dispute, o^r determine, but glue eare and keepe silence: meaning that when a man is once well instructed, learned, and aduised, and hath well deliberated of the things he hath to do, he should with more discretion and wisdom, speake, order, and direct the same. Notwithstanding, now he being but a man of small experience, and of lesse knowledge in matters of importance, and therefore once minded to haue bene altogether silent, is inforced euen of a verie zeale and conscience, and for the discharge of his dutie, to praie their patience, and to beare with his speeches. And then vpon occasion of the bill read, and matter offered, he entred into the discourse what was the office & authoritie of a prince, and what was the dutie of a subiect: and lastlie, how the quenes maiestie had most honorablie and carefullie performed the one, and how vndutifullie they had considered the other: for that the neither found that obedience in that land, which still liued in rebellion against hir; neither that beneuolence of the better sort, which for hir great expenses spent for their defenses and safeties they ought to haue yeldd vnto hir. It appered manifest in sundrie things, and especia^llie in this present assemble, namelie one bill concerning the repeale of Poynings act, for this time onelie meant for your owne benefit, and for the common-wealth of this realme: and the other concerning the bill now in question, the one by you denied, and the other liketh you not. And yet hir maiestie, of hir owne roiall authoritie, might and may establish the same without aie of your consents, as she hath already done the like in England; sauing of hir courttesie it pleaseth hir to haue it passe with your owne consents by order of law, that she might thereby haue the better triall and assurance of your dutifullnesse.

outfulness and goodwill towards him. But as he hath and doth find your bent farre otherwise, so doth the right honorable the lord deputie find the like. For notwithstanding his long services in times past, his continuall and daileie travels, toynesies, and hostings, with the great perill of his life against the rebels for your sake and safetie; and his endlesse turmoiles and troubles in ciuill matters and priuat sutes for your quietnesse, and to you well known, he hath deserued more than well at your hands: yet as the vniuersall thankfull Israelites against Moses, the vniuersall Romans against Camillus, Scipio, and others: and as the vniuersall Atheniens against Socrates, The mistocles, Apeltiades, and others; you haue and doe most vngratfullie requite and recompense this your noble gouernour: against whome and his doings you doe kicke and spurne what in you lieth. But in the end it will fall vpon you, as it hath done vnto others to your owne shame, ouerthrow, and confusion. And when he had spent a long time in this matter, and proued the same by sundrie histories of other nations, he proceeded to the bill, which by sundrie reasons and arguments he proued to be most necessarie, and met to be liked, allowed, and consented vnto.

Now when he had thus ended his speeches, he sat downe, the most part of the house verie well liking and allowing both of the person and of the matter; sauing the persons before named, who did not heare the same so attentiuely as they did digest it most vniuersally, supposing themselves to be touched herein. And therefore some one of them rose vp and would haue answered the partie, but the time and daie was so far spent about the ordinarie houre, being well nere two of the clocke in the afternoone, that the speaker and the court rose vp and departed. Howbeit such was the present murmurings and threatenings breathed out, that the said gentleman for his safetie was by some of the best of that assemble conducted to the house of sir Peter Carew, where the said gentleman then late and resided. The lord deputie in the meane time, hearing that the lower house were so close, and continued together so long about the ordinarie time, he doubted that it had bene concerning the questions before proponed, and therefore did secretly send to the house to learne and know the cause of their long sitting. But by commandement of the speaker, order was given to the doorekeepers, that the doores should be close kept, & none to be suffered to come in or out, so long as the gentleman was in deliuerie of his speeches; and after the court was ended, it was aduertised to the said lord deputie, who thanked God that had raised vp vniuersall friends vnto him in that place.

The next daie following being fridaie, as soon as the court of the lower house was set, sir Christopher Barnwell, and the lawiers of the English pale, who had conferred together of the former daies speeches, stood vp and desired hearing: who leauing the matter in question, did in most disorderly manner inueigh against the said gentleman, affirming, anouching, and protesting, that if the words spoken had bene spoken in any other place than in the said house, they would rather haue died than haue borne witness thereto. Wherevpon the speaker by consent of the residue of the house commanded them to silence, and willed that if they had any matter against the said gentleman, they should present and bring it in writing against mondaie then next following. And for so much as their dealings then were altogether disordered, being more like to a bearebaiting of lone persons than an assemble of wise and graue men in parlement; motion and request was made to the speaker, that he should reforme those abuses and disordered behauiours; who not onely promised so to doe, but also prayed assistance, aduise, and counsell for his doings therein, of such as were acquainted with the orders of the parlements in England. Which was promised vnto him and performed, and also promised that a booke of the orders of the parlements used in England should in time be set forth in print, which the said gentleman did, and presented & bestowed the same among them in forme following.

A booke of the orders of a parlement house imprinted for Ireland.

The order and vsage how to keepe a parlement in England in these daies, collected by Iohn Vowell alias Hooker gentleman, one of the citizens for the citie of Excester at the parlement holden at Westminster, Anno Domini 1571, & Elizabeth Reg. decimo tertio and the like used in hir maiesties realme of Ireland.

And here you must note, that what the kings and queenes of England do in their persons in England, the same is done in Ireland by the lord deputie, and who in the like parlement robes and vnder the like cloth of estate representeth hir maiestie there in all things.

By whom and for what cause a parlement ought to be summoned and called.

The king, who is Gods annointed, being the head and chiefe of the whole realme, and vpon whom the gouernement and estates thereof doe wholly and onely depend, hath the power and authoritie to call and assemble his parlement, and therein to seeke and aske the aduise, counsell, & assistance of his whole realme, and without this his authoritie no parlement can properly be summoned or assembled. And the king, hauing this authoritie, ought not to summon his parlement but for weightie and great causes, and in which he of necessitie ought to haue the aduise and counsell of all the estates of his realme, which be these and such like as followeth.

First for religion, for so much as by the lawes of God and this realme, the king next and immediately vnder God is his deputie and vicar in earth, and the chiefest ruler within his realms and dominions: his office, function, and dutie is, about all things to seeke and see that God be honored in true religion and vertue, and that he and his people doe both in profession and life liue according to the same.

Also that all idolatries, false religions, heresies, schismes, errors, superstitions, & what soeuer is contrary to true religion, all disorders and abuses, either among the cleargie or laitie, be reformed, ordered, and redressed.

Also the assurance of the kings and queenes persons, and of their children, their advancement & preferment in marriages, the establishing of succession, the suppression of traitors, the auoiding or eschewing of warres, the attempting or moving of wars, the subduing of rebels, and pacifying of ciuill wars and commotions, the leuelling or hauling ante and subsidie for the preservation of the king and publike estate: also the making and establishing of good and wholesome lawes, or the repealing and debarring of former lawes, as whose execution may be hurtfull or prejudiciall to the estates of the prince or commonwealth.

For these and such like causes, being of great weight, charge and importance, the king (by the aduise of his counsell) may call and summon his high court of parlement, and by the authoritie thereof establish and order such good lawes and orders as then shall be thought most expedient and necessarie.

The order and maner how to summon the parlement.

The king ought to send out his writs of summons to all the estates of his realme, at least fortie daies before the beginning of the parlement; first to all his lords and barons, that is to wit, archbishops, bishops, dukes, marqueses, earls, vicounts and barons; and euerie of these must haue a speciall writ. Then to the clergie, and the writ of their summons must be addrested to euerie particular bishop for the clergie of his diocesse. All these writs which are for the clergie, the king alwaies sendeth to the archbishops of Canturburie and Poike, and by them they are sent and dispersed abroad to euerie particular bishop within their seuerall prouinces, and so the bishops giue summons to the clergie.

Lastlie, for the summoning of the commons, he sendeth his writ to the lord warden of the fine ports, for the election of the barons thereof, and to euerie seuerall shiriffe for the choise and election of knights, citizens, and burgeses within his countie.

How and what persons ought to be chosen for the clergie, and of their allowances.

The bishop ought upon the receipt of the writ sent vnto him for the summoning of his clergie, forthwith to summon and warne all deanes and archdeacons within his diocesse to appere in proper person at the parlement, vnlesse they haue some sufficient and reasonable cause of absence, in which case he may appere by his proctor, hauing a warrant or prozie for the same.

Then must he also send the like summons to the deane and chapter of his cathedrall church, who shall forthwith assemble their chapter, and make choise of some one of themselves to appere in their behalfe, and this man thus chosen must haue their commission or prozie.

He must also send out his summons to euerie archdeaconrie and peculiar, requiring that the whole clergie do appere before him, his chancelor or officer, at a certeine daie, time, and place: who being so assembled, shall make choise and election of two men of the said clergie to appere for them, and these shall haue their commission or prozie for the same.

These proctors thus to be chosen ought to be graue, wise, and learned men, being professors either of diuinitie or of the ecclesiasticall lawes; and that can, will, and be able to dispute in cause of controuersie, conuincing of heresies, appeasing of schismes, and deuising of good and godlie constitutions concerning true religion and orders of the church.

These proctors (thus elected) ought to haue reasonable allowances for their charges, according to the state, qualitie, or condition of the person, as also a respect had to the time. The proctors of the deane and chapter are to be paid out of the exchequer of the cathedrall church. The proctors of the clergie are to be paid of the clergie, among whom a collection is to be leuied for the same, according to an old order vied among them.

How and what maner of knights, citizens, and burgeses ought to be chosen, and of their allowances.

The shiriffe of euerie countie, hauing receiued his writs, ought forthwith to send his precepts and summons to the maiors, bailiffes, and head officers of euerie citie, towne corporate, borough, and such places as haue bene accustomed to send bur-geses within his countie, that they do choise and elect among themselves two citizens for euerie citie, and two burgeses for euerie borough, according to their old custome and vsage. And these head officers ought then to assemble themselves & the aldermen and common counsell of euerie citie or towne, and to make choise among themselves of two able and sufficient men of euerie citie or towne, to serue for and in the said parlement.

Likewise at the next countie daie to be holden in the said countie after the receipt of this writ, the shiriffe ought openlie in the court of his shire or countie, betwene the houres of eight and nine of the forenone, make proclamation; that euerie freholdere shall come into the court, and choise two sufficient men to be knights for the parlement; & then he must cause the writ to be openlie & distinalie read. Whereupon the said freholders, then and there present, ought to choise two knights accordinglie, but he himselfe cannot giue anie voice, neither be chosen.

These elections aforesaid so past and done, there ought to be seuerall indentures made betwene the shiriffe & the freholders of the choise of the knights, and betwene the maior and the head officers of euerie particular citie & towne of the choise of their citizens & burgeses & of their names, & of their mainperners and suerties. Of these indentures, the one part being sealed by the shiriffe, ought to be returned to the clerke of the parlement; and the other part of the indentures, sealed by such as made choise of the knights, & such as made choise of the citizens & burgeses vnder the seuerall common seales of their cities and townes, ought to remaine with the shiriffe, or rather with the parties so elected and chosen.

The charges of euerie knight and citizen was wont to be a like, which was thirtene shillings and foure pence by the daie: but now by the statute it is but eight shillings, that is, to euerie knight and euerie citizen foure shillings, and to euerie burgesse the old vsage to haue five shillings: but now it is but thre shillings and foure pence limited by the statute, which allowance is to be giuen from the first daie of their iourneie towards the parlement, vntill the last daie of their returne from thence. Provided, that euerie such person shall be allowed for so manie daies as by iourneies six and twentie miles euerie daie in the winter, and thirtie miles in the summer, he may come & returne to and from the parlement.

In choise of these knights, citizens, and burgeses, god regard is to be had that the lawes and customs of the realme be herein kept and obserued: for none ought to be chosen, vnlesse he be resiant and dwelling within the shire, citie, or towne for which he is chosen. And he ought to be graue, wise, learned, skilfull, and of great experience in causes of policie, and of such audacitie as both can and will boldlie utter and speake his mind according to dutie, and as occasion shall serue; for no man ought to be silent or dum in that house, but according to his talent he must and ought to speake in the furtherance of the king and commonwealth.

And the knights also ought to be skilfull in martiall affaires, and therefore the words of the writs are that such should be chosen for knights as be Cinili gladio: not bicause they shall come into the parlement house in armour, or with their swords: but bicause they should be such as haue god experience and knowledge in feats of warre and martiall affaires, whereby they may in such cases giue the king and relme god aduise and counsell. Likewise they ought to be laie men, and of god fame, honestie, and credit, being not outlawed, excommunicated, or perjured, or otherwile infamous: for such persons ought not to haue place or be admitted into the parlement house.

The degrees of the parlement.

In times past there were six degrees or estates of the parlement, which euerie of them had their seuerall officers and ministers of attendance; but now the same are reduced into foure degrees.

The first is the king, who in his personage is a full and whole degree of himselfe, and without whom nothing can be done.

The second degree is of the lords of the clergie and of the tempozaltie, and are all called by the names of barons.

The third is of knights, citizens, and burgeses, & these be called by the names of the communalitie.

The fourth is of the clergie, which are called by the name of conuocation, & these persons haue no voice in the parlement; neither can they do any thing other than to intreat in causes of religion, which from them is to be commended to other estates.

Of the places and houses of the parlement.

As it lieth in the king to assigne and appoint the time when the parlement shall begin, so that he give at the least fortie daies summons: so likewise he maie name and appoint the place where it shall be kept. But wheresoever it be kept, the old vsage and maner was, that all the whole degrees of the parlement sat together in one house; and euerie man that had there to speake, did it openlie before the king and his whole parlement. But here of did grow manie inconueniences, and therfore to auoid the great confusions which are in such great assemblies, as also to cut off the occasions of displeasures which ensues did happen, when a meane man speaking his conscience freely, either could not be heard, or fell into the displeasure of his betters; and for sundrie other great græfs, did diuide this one house into three houses, that is to wit, the higher house, the lower house, and the conuocation house.

In the first sitteth the king, and his lords spirituall and tempozall, called by the name of barons, and this house is called the higher house.

The second is where the knights, citizens and burgeses do sit, and they be called by the name of commons, and this house is called the lower house.

The third is, where the prelates and the doctors of the cleargie, being called by the name of the cleargie, and this house is called the conuocation house. Of euerie of these houses, their orders and officers, we will breuie subiect and declare particularlie in order as followeth.

Of the higher house.

The higher house (as is said) is where the king and his barons do sit in parlement, where the king sitteth highest, and the lords & barons beneath him, each man in his degree: the order is this. The house is much more in length than in breadth, and the higher end thereof in the middle is the kings seat or throne hanged richlie with cloth of estate, and there the king sitteth alwaies alone. On his right hand there is a long bench next to the wall of the house, which reacheth not so farre vp as the kings seat, and upon this sit the archbishops and bishops, euerie one in his degree. On his left hand there are two like benches, upon the inner sit the dukes, marquesses, earles and vicounts. On the other, which is the hindermost & next to the wall, sit all the barons euerie man in his degree. In the middle of the house, betwene the archbishops seat and the dukes seat, sitteth the speaker, who commonlie is lord chancelor, or keeper of the great scale of England, or the lord chiefe iustice of England, as pleaseth the king, who dooth appoint him: and he hath before him his two clerks sitting at a table before them, upon which they do write and late their bookes. In the middle roome beneath them sit the chiefe iustices and iudges of the realme, the barons of the exchequer, the kings sergeants, and all such as be of the kings learned council, either in the common lawes of the realme, or of the ecclesiasticall lawes, and all these sit upon great woolsacks, covered with red cloth.

At the lower end of all these seats is a barre or raile, betwene which & the lower end of the house is a bold roome seruing for the lower house, and for all suitors that shall haue cause and occasion to repaire to the king or to the lords. This house as it is distinct from the others, so there be distinct officers to the same belonging and appertaining, which all be assigned and appointed by the king, and all haue allowances for their charges at the kings hands, of which officers what they are, what is euerie of their offices, and what allowances they haue, shall be written in order hereafter.

Of the officers of the higher house, and first of the speaker, and of his office.

The chiefe officer of the higher house is the speaker, who is appointed by the king, and commonlie he is the lord chancelor or keeper of the great scale, or lord chiefe iustice of England, his office consisteth in diuerse points.

First, he must on the first daie of the parlement make his oration in the higher house, before the king, his lords and commons; and then and there declare the causes why the king hath summoned that parlement, exhorting and aduising euerie man to do his office and dutie, in such sort as maie be to the glorie of God, honoz of the king, and benefit of the commonwealth.

Also he must make one other oration, but in waite of answer to the speakers oration, when he is presented to the king.

Likewise he must make the like on the last daie of the parlement. And you shall vnderstand, that upon these three daies he standeth on the right hand of the king nere to his seat, at a barre there appointed for him; but at all other times he sitteth in the middle of the house, as is before said.

When he hath ended his oration upon the first day, he must giue order vnto the lower house in the kings behalfe, willing them to repaire vnto their house, and there (according to their ancient orders and customs) make choise of their speaker.

All bills presented vnto the higher house he must receiue, which he hath forthwith to deliuer vnto the clerks to be safely kept.

All bills he must cause to be read twice before they be ingrossed, and being read three times he must put the same to question.

If any bill put to question do passe with their consent, then the same must be sent to the lower house, vntlesse it came first from thence, and in that case it must be kept vntill the end of the parlement.

If any bill be denied, impugned, and clere ouerthrowne, the same is no more to be thenceforth re- ceiued.

If any bill be put to question, & it be doubtfull whether side is the greater, & giuen most voices; then he must cause the house to be diuided, and then iudge of the bill according to the greater number.

If any bill be imperfect, or requireth to be amended, he must choise a certeine number of that house, as he shall thinke good, and to them commit that bill to be reformed and amended.

If anie bill or message be to be sent to the lower house, it is his office to make chosse of two of the kings learned counsell there being, to be the messengers thereof.

If any bill or message be sent from the lower house, he must come from his place to the bar, and there receive the same; and being returned to his place, and everie stranger or messenger departed, he must disclose the same to the lords.

Item, if anie disorder be committed or done in the house by anie lord or other person, he ought with the aduise of the lords to reforme the same: but if it be among the lords, and they will not be reformed, then he must forthwith aduertise the king.

Item, he ought at the beginning of the parlement, to call by name all the lords of the parlement, & likewise at other times as he seeth occasion, whose defaults ought to be recorded, & they to paie their fines, unlesse they be dispensed withall by speciall licence from the king, or haue some iust and reasonable cause of absence.

Item, he must see and cause the clerks to make true entries & true records of all things done there, and to see that the clerks do giue and deliuer the copies of all such bills there read, to such as demand for the same.

Item, he shall keepe the secrets, & cause & command everie man of ech degree in that house to do the like.

Also he ought not to go anie where, but the gentle, man sergent ought to attend upon him, going before him with his mace, unlesse he be the lord chancellor, for then he hath a sergent of his owne.

His allowance that he hath is at the kings charges.

Also for everie privat bill that passeth and is enacted, he hath ten pounds for his part.

Of the chancellor of the higher house.

The chancellor is the principall clarke of the higher house, and his charge is safelie to keepe the records of the parlement, & the acts which be pass.

All such statutes as be enacted, he must send to the kings severall courts of records to be inrolled, as naimelie the Chancerie, the Kings bench, the Common pleas, and the Exchequer.

All such acts as are to be imprinted, he must send to the printer.

All such privat acts as are not imprinted, if anie man will haue the same exemplified, he must transmit the same to the lord chancellor, to be ingrossed and sealed, and for the same he to take the fees appointed and accustomed.

He hath for his allowance an ordinarie fee for terme of life of the king.

Of the clerks of the parlement.

There be two clerks, the one named the clarke of the parlement, & the other named the clarke of the crowne. The clarke of the parlement his office is to sit before the lord speaker, and to read such bills presented as he shall be commanded.

He must keepe true records, and true entries of all things there done and to be entred.

If anie require a copie of anie bill there, he ought to giue the same, receiving the ordinarie fees.

If anie bill after his ordinarie readings be to be ingrossed, he must do it.

The counsell of the house he may not disclose.

At the end of the parlement he must deliuer up unto the chancellor all the acts and records of that house, saving he may keepe a transumpt and a copie thereof to himselfe.

He hath his allowance of the king.

Also for everie privat bill which is enacted, he hath three pounds.

Also for everie bill thereof he giueth a copie, he hath for everie ten lines a penie, according to the custome.

The clarke of the crowne, his office is to supplie the place and roome of the clarke of the parlement in his absence, & hath in all things the like charges and profits as the clarke ought to haue.

He must giue his attendance to the higher house from time to time, & do what shall be intimated him.

All such acts as be not imprinted, if anie man will haue them exemplified vnder the brode scale, he must exemplifie them, and haue for the same his ordinarie fees.

These two clerks, at the end of the parlement, ought to be present in the house, and within the lower bar at a board before them, their faces towards the king: and there the one must read the bills which are pass both houses, and the other must read the content of disagreement of the king.

Of the sergeants or porters of the higher house.

There is but one sergent, which hath the charge of keeping of the doores: for though there be diuerse doores, yet the keepers thereof are at his assignment.

He ought to see the house be cleane & kept sweet.

He ought not to suffer anie manner of person to be within the house, so long as the lords be there sitting, other than such as be of the learned counsell, and of that house; and except also such as come in message from the lower house with bills or otherwise, and except also such as be sent for, and be admitted to haue anie thing there to do.

Also he must attend and go alwaies with his mace before the speaker, unlesse he be lord chancellor, or keeper of the great scale: for then he hath a sergent of his owne.

He ought to keepe safelie such prisoners as be commanded to his ward, and to fetch or send for such as he shall be commanded to fetch.

This porter or sergent hath (besides his ordinarie fee) a standing allowance for everie date of the parlement.

Also he hath for everie privat bill which is enacted, fortye shillings.

Also he hath for everie prisoner committed to his ward, a certeine allowance for his fees.

Also he hath of everie baron or lord of that house, a certeine reward.

Of the lower house.

The lower house (as is said) is a place distinct from the others, it is more of length than of breadth, it is made like a theater, having foure rowes of seates one aboute an other round about the same. At the higher end in the middle of the lower row, is a seat made for the speaker, in which he alwaies sitteth: before it is a table board, at which sitteth the clarke of the house, and thereupon laith his bookes, and writeth his records. Upon the lower row on both sides the speaker, sit such personages as be of the kings priuie counsell, or of his chiefe officers; but as for anie other, none claimeth, nor can claime anie place; but sitteth as he cometh, saving that on the right hand of the speaker, next beneath the said counsell, the Londoners, and the citizens of London do sit, and so in order should sit all the citizens accordinglie. Without this house is one other, in which the under clerkis do sit, as also such as be tutors and attendant to that house. And when soever the house is divided upon any bill, then the come is voided; and the one part of the house cometh downe into this to be numbered.

The office of the speaker of the lower house.

The chiefe or principall officer of this house is the speaker, and is chosen by the whole house, or the more part of them; he himselfe being one of the same number, and a man for gravitie, wisdom, experience, and learning, chosen to supplie that office, during the time of the parliament; and is to be presented to the king the third daie following.

His office is to direct and guide that house in good order; and to see the ordinances, usages, and customs of the same to be firmelie kept and observed.

When he is presented unto the king, sitting in his estate rofall in the parlement house for the purpose, he must then and there make his oration in commendation of the lawes and of the parlement; which done, then he hath (in the name of the house of the commons) to make to the king three requests.

First, that it maie please his maiestie to grant, that the commons assembled in the parlement, may haue and intiole the ancient priuileges, customes, and liberties, as in times past haue appertained, and bene used in that house.

Then, that euerie one of that house maie haue libertie of speech, and freelie to utter, speake, and declare his mind and opinion to any bill or question to be proposed.

Also, that euerie knight, citizen, and burgesse, and their seruants, maie haue free coming and going to and from the said parlement; as also during the said time of parlement; & that they, nor any of their seruants or retinue to be arrested, molested, swad, imprisoned, or troubled by any person or persons.

And lastlie, that if he or any other of that companie, being sent or come to him of any message, and do mistake himselfe in doing thereof; that his maiestie will not take the aduantage thereof, but graciously pardon the same.

He must haue good regard, and see that the clerke do enter and make true records, and safelie to keepe the same, and all such bills as be deliuered into that house.

He must on the first and third daie, and when soeuer he else will, call the house by name, and record their defaults.

All bills, to be brought and to be presented into that house, he must receiue & deliuer to the clerke.

He ought to cause and command the clerke to reade the bills brought in, plainelie, and sensiblie; which done, he must breuilie rectie and repeat the effect and meaning thereof.

Of the bills brought in he hath choise, which and when they shall be read: vnlesse order by the whole house be taken in that behalfe.

Euerie bill must haue three readings, and after the second reading he must cause the clerke to ingrosse the same, vnlesse the same be reiecte and dashed.

If any bill or message be sent from the lords, he ought to cause the messengers to bring the same vnto him, and he to receiue the same openlie; and they being departed and gone, he ought to disclose and open the same to the house.

If when a bill is read, diuerse do rise at one instant to speake to the same, and it cannot be discerned who rose first; then shall he appoint who shall speake; neuertheless, euerie one shall haue his course to speake if he list.

If any speake to a bill and be out of the matter, he shall put him in remembrance, and will him to come to the matter.

If any bill be read three times, and euerie man haue spoken his mind; then shall he aske the house whether the bill shall passe or not: saying thus: As manie as will haue this bill passe in manner & forme as hath bene read, saie Aye: then the affirmatiue part saie Aye. As manie as will not haue this bill passe in manner and forme as hath bene read, saie No.

If upon this question the whole house, or the more part, do affirme and allow the bill: then the same is to be sent to the higher house to the lords. But if the whole house, or the more part do denie the bill: then the same is to be dashed out, and to be reiecte: but if it be doubtful upon giuing voices, whether side is the greater; then must a diuision be made of the house, and the affirmatiue part must arise and depart into the better come, which (by the sergeant) is voided before hand of all persons that were there. And then the speaker must assigne two or foure to number them first which sit within, and then the other which be without, as they do come in, one by one: and as upon the trial the bill shall be allowed or disallowed by the greater number: so to be accepted as is before said.

If upon this trial the number of either side be like, then the speaker shall giue his voice, and that onelie in this point; for otherwile he hath no voice.

Also if any of the house do misbehaue himselfe, & breake the order of the house: he hath to reforme, correct, and punish him, but yet with the aduise of the house.

If any foreign person do enter into that house, the assemblie thereof being sitting, or do by arresting any one person thereof, or by any other meanes breake the liberties and priuileges of that house, he ought to see him to be punished.

Also during the time of the parlement, he ought to sequester himselfe from dealing or intermeddling in any publike or priuat affaires, and dedicat and bend himselfe wholly to serue his office and function.

Also he ought not to resort to any noble man, counsellor, or other person, to deale in any of the parlement matters: but must and ought to haue with him a competent number of some of that house, who maie be witnesses of his doings.

Also during the time of parlement, he ought to haue the sergeant of armes with his mace to go before him.

Also he hath libertie to send any offender, either to sergeants ward, or to the tower, or to any other prison at his choise, according to the qualitie and quantitie of the offense.

He hath allowance for his diet one hundred pounds of the king for euerie sessions of parlement.

Also he hath for euerie priuat bill passed both houses, and enacted, five pounds.

At the end, and on the last daie of the parlement, he maketh his oration before the king in most humble manner, declaring the dutifull seruice and obedience of the commons then assembled to his maiestie: as also most humbly praying his pardon, if any thing haue bene done amisse.

Of the clerke of the lower house.

There is onelie one clerke belonging to this house, his office is to sit next before the speaker at a table, upon which he writeth & laith his bookes. He must make true entrie of the records and bills of the house, as also of all the orders thereof.

The bills appointed vnto him by the speaker to be read, ¶.iii.

read,

read : he must read openlie, plainelie, and sensible.

The billes which are to be ingrossed, he must do it.

If anie of the house aske the sight of anie bill there, or of the booke of the orders of the house ; he hath to deliuer the same vnto him.

If anie desire to haue the copie of anie bill, he ought to giue it him, receiuing for his paines after ten lines a pennie.

He maie not be absent at anie time of sitting, without speciall licence.

He ought to haue for euerie priuat bill passed and enacted, fortie shillings.

He hath allowed vnto him for his charges (of the king) for euerie sessions, ten pounds.

Of the sergeant or porter of the lower house.

The sergeant of this house is commonlie one of the kings sergeants at armes, and is appointed to this office by the king. His office is to keepe the doores of the house ; and for the same he hath others vnder him, for he himselve keepeth the doore of the inner house, where the commons sit, and seeth the same to be cleane.

Also he maie not suffer anie to enter into this house, during the time of the sitting there ; vntil he be one of the house, or be sent from the king or the lords, or otherwise licenced to come in.

If anie such person doe come, he ought to bring him in, going before him with his mace vpon his shoulder.

If anie be committed to his ward, he ought to take charge of him, and to keepe him in safetie vntill he be required for him.

If he be sent for anie person, or to go in anie message, he must leaue a substitute behind him, to do his office in his absence.

He must alwaies attend the speaker, and go before him, carling his mace vpon his shoulder.

His allowance (during the time of the parlement) is twelue pence the daie of the kings charges.

Also he hath of euerie knight and citizen, two shillings six pence ; and of euerie burgesse, two shillings.

If anie be commanded to his ward, he hath of euerie such prisoner, by the daie, six shillings and eight pence.

If anie priuat bill doe passe and be enacted, he hath for euerie such bill, twentie shillings.

Of the conuocation house.

The conuocation house is the assemblie of the whole clergie, at and in some peculiar place appointed for the purpose.

But as the barons and lords of the parlement haue their house seuerall and distinct from the commons : euen so the archbishops and bishops doe sequester themselves, and haue a house seuerall from the residue of the clergie. And this their house is called the higher conuocation house, the other being named the lower conuocation house. Both these houses haue their seuerall officers, orders, and vsages ; and each officer hath his peculiar charge and function ; as also certeine allowances, euen as is vied in the parlement houses of the lords and commons.

The archbishops and bishops doe sit all at a table, and doe discourse all such causes and matters as are brought in question before them, either of their owne motions, or from the higher court of parlement, or from the lower house of conuocation, or from anie priuat person. Euerie archbishop and bishop sitteth & taketh place according to his estate and degree, which degrees are knowne by such degrees & offices in the church as to euerie of them is assigned : for one hath the personage of a priest, an other of a deacon, this is a subdeacon, he is a sexton, and so forth, as such officers were wont to be in the church.

The bishops doe not sit at forenone, but onelie at afternone, because they, being barons of the higher house of parlement, doe resort and assemble themselves there at the forenones with the temporal lords.

The conuocation house of the rest of the clergie doe obserue in a manner the like orders as the lower house of the commons doe vse. For being assembled together on the first daie, with the bishops, are by them willed to make chise of a speaker for them, whom they call the prolocutor : when they haue chosen him, they doe present him vnto the bishops : and he thus presented, maketh his oration, and doth all things as the speaker of the lower house for the commons doth, as well for the ordering of the clergie & of the house, as for the order in sitting, the order in speaking, the order of recording things done among them, and all other such like things.

And this is to be vnderstood, that the whole clergie can deale and intreat but onelie of matters of religion, and orders of the church, which their doings and conclusions can not bind the whole realme, vntil they be confirmed by act of parlement : but yet sufficient to bind the whole clergie to the keeping thereof ; so that the king (who is the supreme gouernor of both estates) doe consent and confirme the same. And forsomuch as by knowing the orders of the parlement house, you may also know the orders of both the conuocation houses, which are like & correspondent to the others : these shall suffice for this matter.

Of extraordinarie persons which ought to be summoned to the parlement.

Besides the personages of the former degrees, which ought to be summoned to the parlement : the king also must warne and summon all his counsellors both of the one law and of the other ; and these haue their places onelie in the higher house, namely the two chiefe iustices and their associates of the kings bench and the common ples, the barons of the exchequer, the sergeants, the attorneie, the solicitor, the maister of the rolles, and his fellows of the chancerie.

The offices of these personages are to giue counsell to the king and parlement, in euerie doubtfull cause according to the lawes.

Also if anie bill be conceived and made disorderlie, they ought to amend and reforme the same, vpon order and commandement to them giuen.

Also they must attend to come and go at the commandement of the king and parlement.

Also they may not speake nor giue aduise, but when they be asked and put to question.

Also they haue no voice in parlement, because they are commonlie counsellors to the same.

They are all reteined at the kings charges. Likewise all officers of the parlement are to be summoned, as namelie the chancelor of the parlement, the clerks, the sergeants, the porters, and such others, who likewise are reteined at the kings costs. Of their offices and charges it is already partly declared.

Of the daies and houres to sit in parlement.

All daies of the weeke are appointed, saving and Accepted the sundaies and all principall feasts, as namelie the feast of Alhallowes daie, Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, and saint John the baptists daie, and also such other daies as the parlement by consent shall appoint and assigne.

The beginning is at eight of the clocke in the moꝝ ning, and dooth continue untill eleuen of the clocke.

They do not sit at afternoones, for those times are reserued for committees and the conuocation house.

In the morning they beginne with the common prayer and the letanie, which are openlie read in the house.

Of the king, his office and authoritie.

Having declared of all the estates, degrees, and personages of the parlement, it resteth now to speake also of the king, and of his office, who is all in all, the beginning and ending, and upon whome resteth and dependeth the effect & substance of the whole parlement. For without him and his authoritie nothing can be done, and with it all things take effect.
Nevertheless, when he calleth & assembleth his par-lement, there are sundrie orders which of him are to be obserued, and which he ought to see to be kept and executed; or else the parlement ceaseth to be a par-lement, and taketh not his effect, of which orders these be the chiefe which do inſue.

First, the king ought to send out his summons to all the estates of his realme, of a parlement, assigning and appointing the time, daie, and place.

Also his summons must be at the least forty daies before the beginning of his parlement.

Also he must appoint and prouide all such officers as ought to attend the parlement, who must be found at his charges.

Also the king ought not to make anie choise, or cause anie choise to be made of any knight, citizens, burgesses, proctors of the clergie, speaker of the common house, or proloquutor of the conuocation house: but they must be elected and chosen by the lawes, orders, and customs of the realme, as they were wont and ought to be, and the kings good aduise yet not to be contemned.

Also the king ought to grant, permit, and allow to all and euerie of the estates, and to euerie particular man lawfullie elected, and come to the par-lement, all and euerie the ancient freedoms, priuileges, immunities, and customs, during the par-lement; as also during the times and daies, comming and going to and from the parlement: but yet the same humble to be requested of his highnesse by the speaker in his oration at the beginning of the par-lement.

Also the king in person ought to be present in the parlement three daies at the least, during the time of the parlement; that is to saie, the first daie, when the whole estates according to the summons make their appearance, which is called the first daie of the par-lement. On the second daie, when the speaker of the common house is presented, which is counted the beginning of the parlement. And the third daie, which is the last day, when the parlement is proroged or dissolved: for upon these daies he must be present, un-lesse in case of sickness, or absence out of the realme, for in these cases the king may summon his par-lement by commission, and the same is of as good effect as if he were present in person: and as for anie other daies, he is at his choise and libertie to come or not to come to the parlement.

Also the king ought to propound to the parlement house in writing all such things & matters of charge, as for which he calleth the said parlement. And accor-dinglie as the same shall then by the consent of all estates be aduised, concluded, and agreed: so the king either hath to allow or disallow the same, for he can (of himselfe) neither adde nor diminish anie bill; but accept the same as it is presented unto him from the estates of the parlement, or else altogether reiect it.

Also the king as he dooth prefix and assigne the daie and time when the parlement shall begin; so also he must assigne & appoint the time when the same shall be proroged or dissolved: which ought not to be as long as anie matters of charge, weight, or importance be in question, and the same not decided nor determined.

Of the dignitie, power, and authoritie of the parlement, and of the orders of the same.

The parlement is the highest, chiefe, and greatest court that is or can be within the realme: for it consisteth of the whole realme, which is diuided into three estates; that is to wit, the king, the nobles, and the commons, euerie of which estates are subiect to all such orders as are concluded and established in parlement.

These three estates may iointlie and with one consent or agreement establish and enact anie lawes, orders, and statutes for the common wealth; but being diuided, and one swaruing from the other, they can do nothing. For the king, though he be the head, yet alone can not make anie law; nor yet the king and his lords onelie, nor yet the king and his commons alone; neither yet can the lords and the commons without the king do anie thing of auaille. And yet nevertheless, if the king in due order haue summoned all his lords and barons, and they will not come, or if they come they will not yet appeere; or if they come and appeere, yet will not do or yeld to any thing, then the king with the consent of his commons (who are represented by the knights, citizens, and burgesses) may ordeine and establish anie act or law, which are as good, sufficient, and effectuell, as if the lords had giuen their consents.

But of the contrarie, if the commons be summoned and will not come, or comming will not appeere, or appeering will not consent to do anie thing, alleging some iust, weightie, and great cause; the king (in these cases) cannot with his lords deuisse, make, or establish anie law, the reasons are these. When parlements were first begun & ordeined, there were no prelats or barons of the parlement, and the tempo-rall lords were verie few or none, and then the king and his commons did make a full parlement, which authoritie was hitherto neuer abidged. Again, e-uerie baron in parlement dooth represent but his owne person, and speaketh in the behalfe of himselfe alone.

But in the knights, citizens, and burgesses are represented the commons of the whole realme; and euerie of these giueth not consent onlie for himselfe, but for all those also for whome he is sent. And the king with the consent of his commons had euer a sufficient and full authoritie to make, ordeine, and establish good and wholesome lawes for the common wealth of his realme. Wherefore the lords being law-fullie summoned, and yet refusing to come, sit, or consent in parlement, can not by their folleie abidged the king and the commons of their lawfull procéding in parlement.

The lords and commons in times past did sit all in one house, but for the auoiding of confusion they be

be now divided into two severall houses, and yet nevertheless they are of like and equall authoritie, euerie person of either of the said houses being named and counted a peere of the realme (for the time of the parlement) that is to saie, equall: for Par is equall. And therefore the opinion, censure, and iudgement of a meane burgesse, is of as great auail as is the best lords, no regard being had to the partie who speaketh, but the matter that is spoken.

They be also called pærs, as if were fathers, for Pier is a father, by which is meant that all such as be of the parlement should be ancient, graue, wise, learned, and expert men of the land: for such were the senatores of Rome, and called Patres conscripti, for the wisdom and care that was in them in governing of the common-wealth. They are also called counsellors, because they are assembled and called to the parlement for their aduise and good counsell, in making and deuising of such good orders and lawes as may be for the commonwealth.

They therefore which make choise of knights, citizens and burgesse, ought to be well aduised that they doe elect and choise such as being to be of that assemble, and thereby equall with the great estates, should be graue, ancient, wise, learned, expert and carefull men for their commonwealth, and who (as faithfull and trustie counsellors) should doe that which should turne and be for the best commoditie of the commonwealth, otherwise they doe great iniurie to their prince and commonwealth.

Also euerie person of the parlement, during the times of the parlement, and at his coming and going from the same, is free from all troubles, arrests and molestations: no action or sute taking effect which during that time is begun, entered, or commenced against him, in what court so euer the same be, except in causes of treason, murder, and felonie, and except also executions in law, awarded and granted before the beginning of the parlement.

Also euerie person having voices in parlement, hath free libertie of speech to speake his mind, opinion, and iudgement, to anie matter proponed; or of himselfe to propone anie matter for the commoditie of the prince and of the commonwealth: but hauing once spoken to anie bill, he may speake no more for that time.

Also euerie person once elected & chosen a knight, citizen or burgesse, and returned, cannot be dismissed out of that house; but being admitted, shall haue his place and voice there, if he be a layman. But if by error a man of the cleargie be chosen, then he ought and shall be dismissed; also if he be excommunicated, outlawed, or infamous.

Also euerie one of these houses ought to be incorrupt, no briber nor taker of anie rewards, gifts, or monie, either for deuising of anie bill, or for speaking of his mind; but to doe all things by rightie, and in such sort as best is for the king and commonwealth.

Also euerie one ought to be of a quiet, honest and gentle behauiour; none taunting, checking, or misusing an other in anie vnseemlie words or deeds: but all affections set apart, to doe and indeuour in wise, done, sobrietie and knowledge, that which that place requireth.

Also if anie one doe offend or misbehaue himselfe, he is to be corrected and punished by the aduise and order of the residue of the house.

Also all the prisons, wards, gales, within the realme and the keepers of the same are at the commandement of the parlement, for the custodie and safekeeping or punishment of all and euerie such prisoners, as shall be sent to anie of them by the said parlement houses, or anie of them: howbeit most commonlie the towne of London is the prison which is most vsed.

Also if anie one of the parlement house be seized, sued, arrested, or attached by anie writ, attachment, or minister of the kings bench, Common pleas, Chancerie, or what court so euer within this realme: the partie so troubled and making complaint there, of to the parlement house: then forth with a sergeant at armes is sent to the said court, not onelie aduertising, that the partie so molested is one of the parlement house; but also inhibiting and commanding the officers of the said court to call in the said processe, and not to deale anie further against the said partie: for the parlement being the highest court, all other courts as inferior yeld and giue place to the same.

Also as euerie one of the parlement house is free for his owne person, for all manner of lites to be commenced against him: so are also his seruants free, and not to be troubled nor molested; but being troubled, haue the like remedie as the maister hath or may haue.

Also no manner of person, being not one of the parlement house, ought to enter or come within the house, as long as the sitting is there, vpon paine of imprisonment, or such other punishment as by the house shall be ordered and adiudged.

Also euerie person of the parlement ought to keepe secret, and not to disclose the secrets and things spoken and done in the parlement house, to anie manner of person, vnlesse he be one of the same house, vpon paine to be sequestred out of the house, or otherwise punished, as by the order of the house shall be appointed.

Also none of the parlement house ought to depart from the parlement, without speciall leave obtained of the speaker of the house, and the same his licence be also recorded.

Also no person, being not of the parlement house, ought to come into the same, during the time of the sitting: so euerie one coming into the same oweth a dutie and a reuerence, to be giuen when he entresth and cometh in.

If a baron or a lord come and enter into the higher house, he ought to doe his obeisance before the cloth of estate, and so to take his place.

Also when he speaketh, he must stand bare headed, and speake his mind plainlie, sensiblie, & in decent order.

If anie come in message or be sent for to the higher house, they must staie at the inner doore vntill they be called in, and then being entered, must first make their obeisance; which done, to go to the lower end of the house, and there to staie vntill they be called: and being called, they must first make one lowe courtesie and obeisance, and going forwarde must in the middle waie make one other lowe courtesie, and then being come forth to the barre, must make the third courtesie; the like must be done at the departure.

Also when anie knight, citizen or burgesse doth enter and come into the lower house, he must make his dutifull and humble obeisance at his entrie in: and then take his place. And you shall vnderstand, that as euerie such person ought to be graue, wise, and expert; so ought he to shew himselfe in his apparel. For in time past, none of the counsellors of the parlement came otherwise than in his gowne, and not armed nor girded with weapon. For the parlement house is a place for wise, graue, and good men; to consult, debate, and aduise, how to make lawes and orders for the commonwealth, and not to be armed as men readie to fight, or to trie matters by the sword. And albeit the writ for the election of the knights haue expresse words to choise such for knights knights as be girded with the sword: yet it is not meant thereby that they should come and sit armed, but be such as be skilfull in feats of armes, and besides their good abilities can well serue in martiall affaires. And thus the Romane senators used, who being men of great knowledge and experience, as well in martiall affaires, as in politike causes, sat alwaies in the senat house and places of counsell in their gownes and long robes. The like also was alwaies and hath bene the order in the parlements of this realme, as long as the ancient lawes, the old customes, and good orders thereof were kept and obserued.

Also if anie other person or persons, either in message or being sent for, doe come: he ought to be brought in by the sergeant, and at the first entring must (following the sergeant) make one lowe obeisance, and being past in the middle waie, must make one other; and when he is come before the speaker, he must make the third, and then do his message; the like order he must keepe in his returne. But if he doe come alone, or with his learned counsell, to plead anie matter, or to answer to anie objection: he shall enter, and go no further than to the bar within the doore, and there to do his three obeisances.

Also when anie bill is committed, the committees haue not authoritie to conclude, but onelie to order, reforme, examine, and amend the thing committed vnto them, and of their doings they must giue report to the house againe, by whome the bill is to be considered.

Also euerie bill, which is brought into the house, must be read three severall times, and vpon three severall daies.

Also euerie bill, which vpon anie reading is committed and returned againe, ought to haue his three readings, vnles the committees haue not altered the bill in anie substance or forme, but onelie in certeine words.

Also when anie bill vpon anie reading is altogether by one consent reiecte, or by voices after the third reading ouerthrowen, it ought not to be brought anie more to be read, during the sessions of parliament.

Also if anie man doe speake vnto a bill, and be out of his matter; he ought to be put in remembrance of the matter by the speaker onelie and by none other, and be willed to come to the matter.

Also whensoever anie person doth speake to anie bill, he ought to stand vp, and to be bareheaded, and then with all reverence, grauitie, and seemelie speech to declare his mind. But whensoever anie bill shall be tried either for allowances, or to be reiecte: then euerie one ought to sit, because he is then as a iudge.

Also euerie knight, citizen, and burgeise, before he doe enter into the parliament, and take his place there, ought to be sworn and to take his oath, acknowledging the king to be the supreme and onelie gouernour of all the estates within this realme, as also to renounce all forren potentates.

The order of the beginning and ending of the parlement.

On the first daie of the summons for the parlement, the king in proper person (vnlesse he be sicke or absent out of the realme) being apparelled in his roiall and parlement robes, ought to be conducted and brought by all his barons of the cleargie and laitie, and the commons summoned to the parlement, vnto the church, where ought a sermon to be made by some archbishop, bishop, or some other famous learned man. The sermon ended, he must in like order be brought to the higher house of par-ment, and there to take his seat vnder the cloof of estate: likewise euerie lord and baron (in his degree) ought to take his place.

This done, the lord chancelor, or he whom the king appointeth to be the speaker of that house, maketh his oration to the whole assemble, declaring the causes whie and wherefore that parlement is called and summoned, exhorting and perswading euerie man to do his best indeuour in all such matters as shall be in the said parlement proponed, as shall be most expedient for the glorie of God, the honor of the king, and the commonwealth of the whole realme. Then he directeth his talke vnto the knights, citizens, and burgeses, aduertising them that the kings pleasure is, that they doe repaire to their house; and there according to the old and ancient custome, doe chuse and elect some one, wise, graue, and learned man among themselves to be speaker for them, and giueth them a daie when they shall present him to the king. And these things thus done, the king ariseth, and euerie man departeth. This is accounted for the first daie of the parlement.

The second or third daie after, when the speaker is to be presented: the king with all his nobles (in like order as before) doe assemble againe in the higher house, and then come by all the commons of the lower house, and then and there doe present their speaker vnto the king. The speaker forthwith maketh his dutifull obeisances; beginneth and maketh his oration before the king, and prosecuteth such matters as occasion serueth, and as is before recited in the office of the speaker; and this done, euerie man departeth. And this is accounted for the beginning of the parlement, for before the speaker be presented, and these things orderlie done, there can no bills be put in, nor matters be intreated of.

Lastlie when all matters of weight be discussed, ended, and determined, the king commandeth an end to be made. And that daie the king, his nobles, and commons doe againe assemble in the higher house in their robes, and in like order as is before recited, where the speaker maketh his oration, and is answered by the lord chancelor or speaker of the higher house. Then all the bills concluded and past in both houses, that is to saie, in the higher house of the lords, and in the lower house of the commons, are there read by the titles: and then the king giueth his consent or dissent to euerie of them as he thinketh good. And when the titles of all the bills are read, the lord chancelor or lord speaker, by the kings commandement, pronounceth the parlement to be proroged or cleane dissolved. And this is called the last daie or the end of the parlement, and euerie man is at libertie to depart homeward.

The mondate following, sir Christopher Barne, well and his complices, hauing better considered of themselves, were quiet and contented, and the parlement begun with some troubles had his continuance and end with better successe. In the time of this parlement, and after the same, sundrie grievous complaints were exhibited to the lord deputie and counsell by the late wife of the deceased baron of Dunboin, Mac Brian Arra, Oliver Fitzgiralde, sir William Mearrell, and diuerse others the quenes good subiects, against sir Edmund Butler and his brethren, for sundrie routs and riots, spoiles and outrages which they were charged to haue done vpon his maiesties subiects. Whereupon first letters and then commissioners were sent in to the counties of Bilkennie and Tipperarie for the hearing and redressing thereof: but they returned without doing of anie thing. For sir Edmund, conceiuing some hard dealings to be meant toward him by the lord deputie, tie, and minding to stand vpon his defense and gard, did not appeere before the said commissioners, but both he and his brethren combined themselves with James Fitzmoris Desmond, Mac Artie More, Mac Donagh, and the senechall of Imokille and others of Hounster, who before (and unwittingly the Butlers) had sent the usurped bishops of Cashell and Cmelie together with the yongest brother of the erle of Desmond vnto the pope & to the king of Spaine, for reformation of the popish religion, & for freeing the land from the possession of his maiestie and of the imperfall crowne. Which matter in the end brake out into an open and aduall rebellion, and the lord deputie by proclamation published them all to be traitors, and against whom he prepared an hosting. But before the same was fullie prepared, he sent his letters and commandement vnto sir Peter Carew knight then being at Leigblin, to enter into the action of warres against sir Edmund Butler, who being accompanied with capitaine Gilbert, capitaine Malbie, capitaine Wasenet, and others, latelie sent vnto him from the lord deputie, followed his commandement, and first assaulted the castell of Cloughgriman in the Duloogh belonging to sir Edmund Butler, and took it, and gaue the spoile vnto the soldiers.

From thence they removed to Kilkennie towne, where they laie for a time, where a man of the earle of Dymonds, espieing vpon a certaine daie sir Peter Carew to be walking in the garden of the castell of Kilkennie alone, he charged his peere, and leueled the same vnto the said Peter Carew, and minded to haue discharged it vpon him out of a window in the castell. At which verie instant a chapleinc of the said earls & his steward, comming by him, & suspecting some euill thing towards, turned by the mouth of the peere, which therewith was discharged, and so no bodie hurt; and vnderstanding the thing was meant against sir Peter Carew, blamed the fellow, and for a time thrust him out of the house. Whilest these capitains laie at Kilkennie, it was aduertised vnto them, that a great companie of the rebels were incamped about thre miles out of the towne, & were there marching in verie good order. Wherevpon sir Peter Carew, being then the generall, assembled all the capitains, and taking their aduise what was best to be done, they concluded that Henrie Dauels a verie honest and a valiant English gentleman, who had serued long in that countrie, and was verie well acquainted, especiallie in those parts, for he had married his wife out of that towne, and him they sent out to discover the matter, who about thre miles off had the view, and espied a great companie of about two thousand, resting vpon a little hill in the middle of a plaine, being all armed and marching in battell arate. When he returned with this report, then sir Peter Carew appointed the vordard to capitaine Gilbert, who together with Henrie Dauels and twelue other persons of his companie galloped before the rest, and finding as it was before aduertised, gaue the charge. The residue of the companie followed with the like hast vnder sir Peter Carew, and then capitaine Malbie, and capitaine Wasenet, seeing and assured that all things were clere behind them, followed so nere, that all the companie even as it were at one instant gaue the like charge, where they slue foure hundred Gallowglasses at the least, besides others. The residue of the companie were fled into the mountains fast by, and none or few escaped but the horsemen and kerns. And of his maiesties side no one man slaine, but a man of capitaine Malbies was hurt.

Sir Peter Carew, hauing had and obtained this victorie, and marching in good order, did returne with all his companie to the towne of Kilkennie, euerie capitaine and souldier carieng two Gallowglasses axes in his hand; but left the spoile to their followers. Sir Edmund Butler at this instant was not in the campe, but was at his uncles house at dinner. The townesmen of Kilkennie were verie soie for this the slaughter of so manie men. And yet neuertheless not long after, James Fitzmoris came to this towne, and besieged it; but the towne being well garonised with certeine soldiers, & they themselves well appointed, did so carefullie and narrowlie looke to themselves, that they defended and kept the towne, notwithstanding all his force. But yet the countrie and other small townes did not so escape, for the countie of Waterford, and the lord Polowe, the countie of Dublin, and all the countrie were spoiled, preied, and overrun; and among all others the old Fulco Quimerford a gentleman, of long time seruant to thre earles of Dymond, was robbed in his house at Callon of two thousand pounds, in monie, plate, and household stufte, besides his coine and cattell. When they had taken their pleasure in this countrie, they went to the countie of Wexford, which thing had not lightlie bene sene before, and at a faire kept then at Enescoth, these the souldiers committed most horrible outrages, lamentable slaughters, filthie rapes, and deslourings of yong women, abusing mens wines, spoiling the towne, & slaughtering of the men, and such as did escape the sword were caried captiues & prisoners. From hence they went into Dierie and into the quenes countie, and spoiled the countrie, burned townes and villages, murdered the people: and then they met with the earle of Clancare, and James Fitzmoris Desmond, with whom they then combined, and agreed to canse Tirlough Lennough to procure in the Scots, they sent new messengers to the pope, and to the king of Spaine. Finally, nothing was left vndone, which might ante waies tend to the subuersion of his maiesties imperfall crowne of Ireland, and to discharge that land from all Englishmen and English gouernement, and by these means (the English pale and the good cities & townes excepted) the most part, if not the whole land, was imbued & infected with this rebellion.

The earle of Dymond himselfe, a man of great honour and nobilitie, was all this time in England: but from time to time was aduertised of the trouble, some state in that land: and whereof no little detriment redounded to his lordship, by reason that a great and most part of all his lordships throughout that land were spoiled and wasted, which did not so much grieve him as the follies of his brethren. For great were his griefs, & verie much was he vniquieted therewith: for when he bethought himselfe of his brethren, nature moued him, and reason perswaded him, that no such outrageous parts could proceed from them, which in antie waies should either concerne his maiestie, or the dishonour of him and his house, which hitherto hath bene alwaies found sound and true. Wherefore, when he heard of antie matter against them herein, he would plead their innocencies, and defend their causes, vntill such time as by credible letters, aduertisements, and reports, he saw apparant matter and manifest proofes of the contrarie. Which reports albeit they grieved him verie much, yet (as I said) nothing grieved him more, than their disolaltie and breach of dutie against his maiestie, and the dishonour of his owne house. Wherefore to acquite himselfe and his dutie towards his highnes: he offereth to serue against them & others, by the sword, or by some other means, to reconer and reclaime them.

Wherevpon his maiestie, standing assured of his his fidelitie, and hauing a speciall trust in him, sent him ouer into Irel and, who arrived at Wexford the fourteenth of August 1569, at that verie time when that wicked massaker was committed and done at the faire at Innescoth. Immediatlie vpon his landing, he aduertiseth vnto the lord deputie his coming, and with all conuenient speed maketh his repaire vnto him, who then was incamped and laie nere Limerike: and then and there offereth his seruice with all his best power, and brought with him his brother Edmund Butler, who in the open view and sight of the whole campe did yeeld and submit himselfe simplie to hir maiesties mercie, confessing his follie and craving pardon. And then was he delivered to the earle his brother vpon his bonds, to bee forth comming before the said lord deputie at his comming to Dublin: and also promised to doe the like with his two other brothers, which he did vpon the sixteenth of October 1569. At which time when they all appeared before the lord deputie and counsell, they were charged with manie and sundrie things: but sir Edmund Butler for himselfe alledged, that others were the causers whie he did that which he did. And for himselfe he alledged, first that the lord deputie did not bzoike noz like him, for he could haue no iustice at his hands, noz against sir Peter Carew, who claimed and had entered vpon some part of his lands, noz yet against any other person. When that the said lord deputie had thetred him that he would lie in his skirts, and would pull downe his loffie lokes, whirle, that the said lord deputie should go about to kill all the Butlers in Ireland, and would then go into England, and there would doe manie things.

When all these things were heard at full, and nothing in pzoof falling out as was anonched, the three brethren were committed to ward into the castell of Dublin, out of which sir Edmund escaped, and made breach: neuertheless the earle brought him againe. And vpon the last of Februarie 1569 he brought also his two other brethren, for whome he had vnder taken, and presented them before the lord deputie and counsell, where the matter being heard at large, the counsell conferred herof among themselves, and in the end they all the three brethren were againe called before the lord deputie and counsell, and then and there kneeling vpon their knees, did confesse their follies, and submitted themselves in all dutifullnesse and simplicitie to the quens mercie: where the earle not onlie naturallie as a brother made humble petition for them: but grauelie as a father recited their errors, repzoined them of their outrages, and counsellled them to their duties: and in the end condiscended in the due consideration of hir maiesties rofall estate. And therevpon they were committed to safe keeping within hir maiesties castell of Dublin, at hir highnesse disposition; and not long after vpon hope of amendment were pardoned. But to the matter againe.

The lord deputie followed his first begun hosting, who when he was incamped nere Clonmell, where it was thought he should haue bene fought withall, he wrote to the maior and his brethren of the citie of Wexford, to send vnto him the assistance of a few souldiers onelie for three daies; who did verie insolentlie and arrogantlie returne an answer by waie of disputing their liberties with hir maiesties prerogatiue, and so sent him no aid at all. Wherein the more they shewed their affection to the rebels; the more was their ingratitude & disolaltie to hir highnesse, the reward whereof they felt in the end. The camp at this time being within half a mile of Clonmell, the lord deputie before his dislodging from thence went into the towne, where the souereigne and his brethren receiued him with all the honour they could, and gaue him a banquet in their townehouse, where, vnto them & the whole multitude then present, he made a verie eloquent speech, teaching them the dutifullnesse and obedience of a subiect, and the great inconuenience which groweth by the contrarie to all commonwealths, and each member of the same: and therefore laung before them their present estate for example, did moue and persuaide them to hold fast the dutie & obedience which they owght to hir maiestie, and not to be dismayd at the doings of the rebels and disobedient: who though for a time they had their will and pleasure, yet God, in whose hand is the heart of the prince, and vnder whome all kings and princes doe rule, hath bene alwaies, is, and will be, a swift reuenger against them for the same: euen as of the contrarie he sendeth his manifold blessings of peace, wealth and prosperitie to the obedient and dutifull subiect. And so hauing used sundrie and notable sentences and exampls to this effect, he left them and returned to his campe.

And from thence he remoued and marched towards Cathell, which lieth in the countie of Tipperarie, nere vnto which place Edmund Butler had warded a castell: who when he saw the armie approaching, he set all the out houses on fire, and prepared themselves to defend the pile. The lord deputie taking the same as a defiance, approached therevnto and besieged it: and whilest the assault was in preparing, it was yeilded by composition, and after restored to one Cantrell the owner thereof. From thence by iourneies he marched and went to Corke, being met in the waie by the vicounties of Roch and Barrie, and by sir Cormac Mac Leage: and being aduertised that Fitzedmund seneschall of Imokille, a principall rebell, and combined with James Fitzmorris, had spoiled and pzeied the whole countie, and had also warded and vittelled his castell of Ballee martz, which by his tenure he was of himselfe bound to mainteine and defend it, he marched thither and laid siege to the same, and in the end toke it full of vittels. But the seneschall in the dead of the night fled out through a hole of the house in a bog, and there escaped.

The spoile was giuen to the souldiers, & the castell with a gard of twentie men was giuen to Jasper Wolfe, & so he returned to Corke, and from thence he toke iourneie to Kilmallocke, and finding that place most necessarie for a fort, he appointed and named Humfrete Gilbert hir maiesties seruant to be coronell, and besides his owne band of an hundred horsemen he appointed foure hundred footmen, and certeine harnes there to remaine. And there he bid knit and conioine vnto him by oth, and vnder good pledges, the vicounties of Roch and Derris, with the lord Powze, the lord Courcie, sir Cormac Mac Leage, sir Donogh Clancartie, and Barrie Age, and the most part of the freeholders in the counties of Limerike and Corke. And this done he passed by iourneies to Limerike, and from thence he went to Gallewaie, and there established a president and a counsell, and placed sir Edward Fitton to be lord president, the earles of Thomond and Clancircar, and all the noble men & septs of gentlemen of that prouince yeilding to the same.

Thence he marched to Athlon, taking in the waie the castell of Rosocomen, which he left with the ward of twentie horsemen, to Thomas le Strange, and then dismissed the armie; but himselfe by iourneies trauelled and came to Dublin, and there remained. Captaine Gilbert in the meane time, hauing a speciall respect and regard to his charge, his balliance and courage was such, and his god hap so well answering his worthe and forward attempts, that he in short time broke the hearts, and appalled the

The description of Sir

And that proud earle of Clancare, which in his glorie not long before usurped this name to be king of Mounster; when he now, and Mac Donagh his chiefe follower, went to Limerike unto him, and there falling upon their knees acknowledged their treasons, and most humbly desired his maiesties pardon: and offered to put in his eldest sonne, and the sonnes of his chiefeest freholders for pledges and hostages. Liketwise the president of Connagh in such wisdom, courage, & brightness, directed his gouernement, that he was obeyed of all the whole people in that prouince, as well the nobilitie as the commons. The wicked he spareth not, but being found faultie either in open sessions, or by martiall inquisition, he causeth to be executed: and by these meanes hauing rid awaie the most notable offenders and their fosterers, the whole prouince rested in good quietnesse and in dutifull obedience to his maiestie and his lawes.

The Canenaghs, the ancient enemies to the English gouernement, and who in the rebellion were conioined with the Butlers: these bordering vpon the frontiers appointed to Sir Peter Carew, were so by him chased and persecuted, that finding no place of rest or quietnesse, he hath brought them to submit themselves simple to his maiesties mercie, and haue put in their pledges to abide such orders and conditions as shall be laid vpon them. Turlough Lennogh in Ulster, being at supper with his now wife, aunt to the earle of Argile, was shot through the bodie with two pellets out of a caluer, by a leafer or rimer of the Doniloghs. Wherevpon the Scots whome he retained were in a maze, and the countie standing vpon the election of a new captaine: howbeit, he was in hope of recouerie. And thus after long troubles was the state of the whole realme recovered to quietnesse. Wherevpon captaine Gilbert, when he had settled Mounster in outward appearance in a most perfect quietnesse, and brought it to good conformitie: he made his repaire to Dublin to the lord deputie, where he aduertised and recounted all his doings at full.

And hauing matters of great importance in England, he desired licence to depart ouer: whome the said deputie did not onelie most courteously receiue; but also most thankfullie did accept his good seruice, and in some part of recompense, vpon Newpeares daie in the church at Drogheda, he did bestow vpon him the order of knighthood; which he well deserved, and at his departure gaue him letters of credit to his highnesse, and to the lords of the counsell. And now by the waie, if without offense a man maie, after the maner of Cambrensis in his historie, and after the vsage of noble gouernors and captaines in other realmes, who for the increase of vertue, and encouraging of worthy persons, do attribute to such as do deserue well their due praises & commendations, I hope it shall not be offensive to the reader, nor impertinent to the historie, to set downe somewhat of much, what maie be said of these two worthy personages, Sir Peter Carew, and Sir Humfreie Gilbert: both which were of one countie and birth, bozne in the countie of Deuon, and of next blood, kintred, and consanguinitie.

Sir Humfreie Gilbert, he was a second brother, and bozne of a great parentage, whose ancestors came and descended from the earle of Cornwall, a man of a higher stature than of the common sort, & of complexion chelerike; from his childhoo of a verie pregnant wit and good disposition: his father died leauing him verie yong, and he conceiuing some great good thing to come of his towardnesse, prouided some portion of liuing to mainteine and keepe him to schole. And after his death, his mother, being no lesse carefull of him, did cause him to be sent to schole to Eton college: from thence, after he had profited in the elements & principall points of grammar, he was sent to Oxford, & did there prosper & increase verie well in learning and knowledge. And being (as his friends thought) verie well furnished, they would haue put him to the ins of court. But an aunt of his, named mistres Katharine Ashleie, who was attendant to the queenes maiestie, after that she saw the yong gentleman, and had had some conference with him, she fell in such liking with him, that she preferred him vnto his maiesties seruice: and such was his countenance, forwardnesse, and behauiour, that his maiestie had a speciall good liking of him; and verie oftentimes would familiarly discourse and conferre with him in matters of learning. After a few yeares spent in the court, he passed ouer into Ireland, being commended by his highnesse to Sir Henrie Sidneie then lord deputie: who gaue him intertainment, and made him a captaine ouer an hundred horsemen: wherein he so well acquitted himselfe, that he was also made colonell of Mounster; and had appointed vnto him, besides his owne band of one hundred horsemen, foure hundred footemen, besides such Geraldines as Thomas of Desmond, brother to the erle of Desmond had procured, & vpon his oath of loyalty and pledges had promised his faithfull seruice.

And albeit he were but yong of yeares, which might seme to hinder his credit: yet such was his deuout mind to serue his maiestie, and so effectually to his great praise he followed the same; that with manie good gifts and excellent vertues he supplied euen as much as manie men of elder yeares & greater experience did not commonlie attaine vnto. For in seruice vpon the enimie he was as valiant and courageous as no man more; and so good was his hap to answer the same: for he alwaies for the most part daunted the enimie, and appalled their courage; as did appere in the ouerthrow giuen nere Bilkennie in the Butlers warres, when he with threue persons gaue the onset vpon a thousand men, of which six hundred were armed Gallogglashes, who then were overthowne: and liketwise in Mounster, which was altogether by in rebellion; and he colonell, did not onelie in martiall affaires shew himselfe most valiant; and in short time reduced the whole troope of the rebels, and the proudest of them to obedience, hauing vnder him but sixe hundred against fundrie thousands; and enforced that proud earle of Clancart to follow him to Limerike, and there humbly vpon his knees to aske pardon and merite: but also, after that he had subdued and overcome them, did most brightnessly order and direct his gouernement, and with all indifferencie would heare, decide, & determine the complaints & griefes, and compound all the causes of euerie sort. Which was so rare a thing in one of his yeares, as scarce was credible, had not eietwitnesses and daile experience proued and iustified the same.

After that he had established peace and tranquillitie in that countie, he went to Dublin: where when he had recounted all his seruices, and the good success thereof, and in what quiet state he left the countie, he desired leaue to passe ouer into England, for and about certeine matters of great importance, which he had to follow, which he did obtaine: as also in reward of his service, and for his good deserts he (as is before said) was honozed and dubbed a knight; and with letters in his praise and commendation to his maiestie, and the lordes of the counsell, he departed. Althow as he had presented himselfe before his highnesse, his good countenance and fauour, in respect of his good service to his maiestie was increased and doubled; and he speciallie aboue all others magnified and well accepted. Not long after, he was married to a yong gentlewoman, and an inheritor: and thenceforth he gaue himselfe to studies pertaining to the state of gouernement, and to nauigations. He had an excellent and readie wit, and therewith a toung at libertie to utter what he thought. Which being adorne with learning and knowledge, he both did and could notable discourse anie matter in question concerning either of these, as he made good proofe thereof, as well in familiar conference with the noble, wise, and learned; as also in the open assemblies of the parlements, both in England and in Ireland: in which he shewed the great value of knowledge, wisdom, and learning which was in him, and the great zeale he had to the commonwelth of his countrie. He had a great delight in the studie of cosmographie, and especiallie in nauigations; and finding out by his studies, certaine nations and vnknowne lands, which being found, might redound to the great benefit of his countrie: he made his maiestie acquainted therewith, and obtained of his licence to make a nauigation, which he took in hand. But before he could compass the same to effect, he was in a foule storme drowned at the seas. Onelie he of all his brethren had five sonnes and one daughter, children by their countenances giuing a hope of a good forwardnesse. And albeit he in person be deceased, yet in their visages, and in the memorie of his great vertues, and a life well spent, he shall liue in fame immortall. Turlough Lenough thinking to innade vpon the English pale, for the bending of the lord deputies force against him, he was repressed, and diuened to keepe himselfe within his owne limits, and by that meanes brought to disperse his power: for being not able to paie and satisfie the Scots, the one was wearie of the other; and his wife and he not agreeing, they were vpon a point to sunder. The earle of Thomond reuolteth from his due obedience, and becommeth a rebell: whome the earle of Thomond so hardlie pursued, that he dyaue him out of that land, and he fled into France, and from thence into England. For the discouerie of whose treasons and rebellions to his maiestie & to the lordes of the counsell, one Mase Rochelete chiefe iustice of Connaugh was sent into England, where after long sute made for his submission, he was sent backe into Ireland, there to receiue according to his deserts: his maiesties pleasure yet being such, that if he were not found culpable of treason against the state, that he should be spared from iudgement of death.

The balsh was in Ireland, and the whole countie in gouernement of Sir Humfreie Gilbert.

This yere the queenes maiestie, considering the good service of Lucas Willon his generall attorneie in Ireland, was vpon the death of baron Bath made chiefe baron of the exchequer there; & capitaine Piers for his good service at Knockfergus was liberallie considered and countenanced by his maiestie. And likewise after manie motions, suites, and requestes made to his maiestie for a president and counsell to be established in Mounster; and the same once determined and appointed: but by the sicknesse and vna- bilitie of sir John Pollard, appointed to be the president, it was lingered and deferred, is now renewed and renewed: and sir John Perot knight was made lord president, and a counsell of good assistants chosen, as also his diet houses, intertainment, and all other things necessarie ordered, assigned, and appointed. This knight was borne in Denbroke-shire in South Wales, and one of great reuenues and woorthip, valiant, and of great magnanimitie; and so much the more meet to gouerne and tame so faithlesse and unrulie a people, as ouer whome he was now made ruler. They heard no sooner of his comming, but as a sort of wasps they sting out, and reuolting from their former feined obedience, became open rebelles and traitors vnder James Fitzmorris an archtraitor, and as dogs they returne to their vomit, and as swine to their durt and puddles.

Sir John Perot appointed to be lord president of Mounster.

The rebelling of Mounster against the president.

The nature of the Irishmen.

And here may you see the nature and disposition of this wicked, effrenated, barbarous, and vnfaithfull nation, who (as Cambrensis writeth of them) they are a wicked and peruerse generation, constant alwaies in that they be alwaies inconstant, faithfull in that they be alwaies vnfaithfull, and trustie in that they be alwaies trecherous and vntrustie. They do nothing but imagin mischief, & haue no delite in anie good thing. They are alwaies working wickednes against the god, and such as be quiet in the land. Their mouths are full of vnrighteousnesse, and their tongues speake nothing but cursednesse. Their feet swift to shed blood, & their hands imbued in the blood of innocents. The waies of peace they know not, & in the paths of righteousness they walke not. God is not knowne in their land, neither is his name called rightlie vpon among them. Their queene and soueraigne they obete not, and his gouernment they allow not: but as much as in them lieth do resist his imperiall estate, crowne, and dignitie. It was not much aboue a yere past, that capitaine Gilbert with the sword so persecuted them, and in iustice so executed them, that then they in all humblenesse submitted themselves, craued pardon, and sware to be for euer true and obedient: which, so long as he mastered and kept them vnder, so long they performed it; but the cat was no sooner gone, but the mice were at plate; and he no sooner departed from them, but forthwith they skipped out, and cast from themselves the obedience and dutifullnesse of true subiects. For such a peruerse nature they are of, that they will be no longer honest and obedient, than that they cannot be suffered to be rebelles. Such is their stubbornnesse and pride, that with a continuall feare it must be brydeled; and such is the hardnesse of their hearts, that with the rod it must be still chastised and subdued: for no longer feare, no longer obedience; and no longer than they be ruled with severity, no longer will they be dutifull and in subiection; but will be as they were before, false, trucebreakers & traitorous. Being not much unlike to Mercurie called quicke silver, which let it by art be neuer so much altered and transposed, yea and with fire consumed to ashes; yet let it but rest a while vntouched nor medled with, it will returne againe to his owne nature, and be the same as it was at the first. And euen so dallie experience teacheth it to be true in these people. For withdraw the sword, and forbear correction, deale with them in courtesie, and intreat them gentle, if they can take anie aduantage, they will surelie slip out; and as the dog to his vomit, and the sow to the durt & puddle they will returne to their old and former insolencie, rebellion, and disobedience. This is to be meant of the Irish, and savage people, who the further they are from the prince and court, the further from dutie and obedience; the more they are loosed from their Mounster government, the lesse dutifull to their naturall soueraigne and prince. But concern-

The government of Sir John Perot.

His seruice against the rebellies.

James Fitzmoris is both for peace, and submitteth himselfe.

The ciuill government of Sir John Perot.

The quietnes and safetie in Mounster.

Sir John Perots assistants.

George Bourcier his birth and seruices.

Well, this worthy knight knowing that he should haue to doe with a sort of netles, whose nature is, that being handled gentle, they will sting; but being hard crushed together, they will doe no harme: neuer so he began with them. The sword and the law he made to be the foundation of his gouernement, by the one he persecuted the rebell and disobedient, and by the other he ruled and gouerned in iustice and iudgement. Great troubles he had in both, but little he did preuaile in the latter, before he had ouercome the first: and therefore minding to chastise the rebellies, and to bring them to obedience, he followed and chased them from place to place: in the bogs he pursued them, in the thickets he followed them, in the plaines he fought with them, and in their castles and holds he besieged them, and would neuer suffer them to be at rest and quietnesse, vntill he had fired and wearied them out, and at length inforced James Fitzmoris and his complices to come vnto Killmalocke vnto him, and there simple to submit himselfe, and vpon his knees in the open sight of all the people to confesse his disloyalties, and in all humble manner to craue mercie and pardon. Whome though vntill his maiesties pleasure knowne he did forbear, yet the residue he spared not; but after their deserts he executed in infinit numbers. And hauing thus rid the garden from these weeds, and rooted by the fields from these thornes, he entred into the gouernement by order of law, and from place to place throughout all Mounster he trauelled and kept his sessions and courts, hearing euerie mans complaints, and redressed their grieues, and in short time brought the same to such a quietnesse and peaceable estate, that whereas no man before could passe through the countrie, but was in danger to be murdered and robbed, and no man durst to turne his catell into the fields without watch, and to keepe them in barnes in the night time: now euerie man with a white sticke onlie in his hands, and with great treasures might and did trauell without feare or danger where he would (as the writer hereof by triall knew it to be true) and the white sheepe did keepe the blacke, and all the beasts laie continually in the fields, without any stealing or preieng.

Now when he had thus quieted this prouince, and settled all things in good order, then he beginneth to reforme their manners in life and common conuersation and apparell, suffering no glibes nor like vices of the Irishie to be vsed among the men, nor the Egyptianall rolles vpon womens heads to be worn. Whereat though the ladies and gentlewomen were somewhat grieved, yet they yielded: and giuing the same ouer, did weare hats after the English manner. In this his seruice he had two verie good & notable assistants, the one concerning the martiall affaires, and the other for his gouernement by the course and order of the law. Concerning the affaires martiall George Bourcier esquier was ioined with him in commission, and did him notable good seruice, he was the third sonne to John earle of Bath, whose ancestors were descended from out of the loines of kings, and men of great honor and nobilitie; and they were no more noble of blood than valiant, wise and prudent in all their actions, both in the seruices of chivalrie and masters of policies, and whereof the histories of England in many places doe make mention and report. And this gentleman, hauing some motion of the valie and valiantnesse of his ancestors deriued and descended vpon him, was affected and giuen to all feats of chivalrie, and especially to the seruice in the warres, wherein he proued a verie good souldior, and an expert captaine, both as an hoileman, and as a footeman, both which waies he serued, as the seruice and time required. If he serued vpon foot, he was apparelled in the manner of a Kerne and a foot souldior, and was so light of foot as no Kerne swifter: for he would pursue them in bogs, in thickets, in woods, in passes, and in streets whatsoeuer; and neuer leaue them, vntill he did performe the charge and seruice committed vnto him. If he were to serue vpon his horsebacke, his valie seruice can witness sufficientlie how much, and how often he preuailed against the enimie, and appalled their courages, and with whom he would encounter if he might by any means.

Notwithstanding, as couragious and circumspect as he was, that he would not be highlie intrapied in the field, yet was he deceiued in the house. For vnder the colour of a parley, and vpon a truce taken, he was invited to a supper, and little thinking that any breach of the truce should be made, he went into the castell whereas he was bidden. But in his being there, he was taken prisoner, and banished, and so kept for a space; but yet not long after he was restored and set at libertie. Concerning his other assistant, his name was George Welles borne in Wiltford, and a gentleman of an ancient familie, he was brought vp in learning, and was a student in the innes of court at London, and prospered verie well therein: and albeit his yeares were but yong, yet his knowledge, grauitie, and sinceritie counteruailed the same with an ouerplus. In deciding of all matters he was byright and iust, being not affected nor knowne to be corrupted for any mans pleasure. In iudgement byright, in iustice seuer, and without respect of persons would minister what the law had prescribed, he spared neither partie, nor would be affected to any; by which means he did marvellous much good in that seruice, and happy was that gouernor that had so good a counsellor.

Immediatlie vpon the placing of this gouernement in Mounster, Sir Henrie Sidneie had libertie and licence to returne ouer into England, and received his maiesties letters dated the thirtieth of December one thousand five hundred, seuentie and one, & in the thirtieth yeere of his maiesties reigne, for the placing of Sir William Fitzwilliams to be lord deputie in his place. Which when he had done, he passed ouer the seas, and by iourneies came to the court. He was verie honorablie receiued, and by his highnesse well commended, there being many noblemen and gentlemen of the court, which met him before he came to Whitehall, where his maiestie then laie, who (as time convenient serued) did recount vnto him the whole estate in all things of the realme of Ireland, which his maiestie liked verie well.

But this Sir John Perot president of Mounster continued still in his office, and there remained for certeine yeares vntill he was reuoked, which was too soone for that countrie. For neuer man was more fit gouernour for that effrenated and hardnecked people than was he, nor was that countrie euer in better estate for wealth, peace and obedience, than he in the time of his gouernement did reduce the same vnto. Happy was that prouince, and happy were those people, which being eaten out, consumed and deuoured with caterpillers, he had brought and reformed to a most happy, peaceable, and quiet estate; and he left it euen in the same manner. Which if it had bene continued by the like, to haue followed him in the gouernement, the same would so haue continued: but the want of the one was in short time the decaye of the other, and that reformed countrie brought to a most miserable estate, as by the consequence may

Sir William Fitzwilliams, hauing a speciall care and respect to his charge and office, disposed all things in the best order he could by the aduise of the counsell, and finding the state somewhat quiet, lanning Pountier, his care and studie was so to keepe and mainteine it. And he bring a wife and a graue man, and of so great experience in that land, he diuised the plot of his gouernement into certeine speciall points and articles. First, that the religion established according to Gods holie word, should haue a free passage through the whole land, and by euerie man aswell of the clergie as of the laitie to be receiued, embraced and followed. Then that the common peace and quietnesse throughout the whole land might and should be conserued, and all occasions of the breach thereof, and of all mutinies and diuisions to be cut off. Thirdlie, that his maiesties great and excessive charges to the consuming of his treasure might be shortned, and his reuenues well husbanded and looked vnto, according to his fundrie commandments tofore giuen. Lastlie, that the lawes and iustice might haue their due course and be current throughout the whole land, and the iudges and officers should by sightlie minister iustice to each man according to his desert, and that all the souldiers should be kept in that discipline as to them apperteneith.

These considerations and such like, being ordered and established with the consent and aduise of the whole counsell, and well liked of euerie good subject, because the same was grounded vpon verie good reasons: yet it toke not that effect as it was meant and wished it should. For that wicked race of the Irishie, in whom was no zeale in religion, and lesse obedience to his maiestie, and least care to liue in an honest conuersation and common societie, but alwaies watching the best opportunitie and time to breake out into their wonted outrages, robberies, and rebellions: these (I saie) in sundrie places began to plate their agents. The first was Brian Mac Bahir of Knocking in the countie of Catherlough Caenagh, who vpon certeine wrongs which he complained he had receiued by one Robert Browne of Malrenham, he tyrannized ouer the whole countrie, committed manie outrages, and spoiles, preied the countrie & burned sundrie towne. Likewise the gentlemen of the countie of Wexford, and namelie sir Nicholas Deuereux knight, being grieved with the death of Robert Browne, who was his nephue, being his sisters sonne, were as vnquiet on their parts, and all rose vp in armour against Brian Mac Bahir, and each one with all the forces they could make did resist the other, so that all the whole countrie was thereby in a verie troublesome state; and no end could be had before they had tried it with the sword. For the Wexford men following their matters verie egarlie, and being in a great companie well appointed, they sought out Brian Mac Bahir, and gaue the onset vpon him; but he so watched the matter, and toke them at that aduantage; that although he and his companie were but small in respect of the others, yet he gaue them the foile and ouerthrow, and killed the most principall gentlemen of that shire about 20 about thirtie persons.

In this companie was an English gentleman, who after was in great credit & office among them, and he in danger to haue drunken of the same cup, was driuen to leape vp on horsebacke behind another man, and so escaped, or else he had neuer bene seneschall of that prouince. After this fight, though the grudge were not forgotten nor a reuenge vnto sought, yet by little and little it quailed. About two yeares after, Brian Mac Bahir made humble sute to the lord deputie for his pardon, and submitted himselfe to his lordships deuotion, confessing in writing his fowle disorders and outrages; and yet firme lie auouching that the quarrell did not begin by him nor by his meanes: his submission was such and in so humble sort, as that he obtained the same. And according to his promise then made, he did therewith vse and behaue himselfe most dutifullie, and liued in a verie good order. This Brian was a Caenagh, and the sonne of Charels, the sonne of Arthur, which Arthur was by king Henrie the eight made a baron for terme of his life: for he was a man of great power within the counties of Wexford & Catherlough. And this Brian Mac Bahir Arthur was a younger sonne to Charels, but the chiefest for valiantnesse, magnanimitie and wisdome; and none of all the sept of the Caenaghs, though they were manie and vallant men, to be compared vnto him euerie waie, and vnto whom they all would giue place.

Now he being assured of them, and also being assisted by marriage vnto Helwen Mac Shane, whose daughter he married, he was also assured of the Dairnes and of the Omroughs, & so a man of great strength and abilitie. He became in the end to be a follower vnto sir Peter Carew, with whom he neuer brake his promise, but stood him in great stead aswell in matters of counsell, as of ante seruice to be done in those parts. A man (which is rare among these people) verie constant of his word, and so faithfullie he serued, and so much he honoured sir Peter Carew, that after his death, being as one maimed, he consumed and pined awaie, and died in peace.

The Omroughs, notwithstanding the earle of Rutland was waged by his maiestie to persecute and chastise them, yet without ante resistance or impediment they rage and outrage in all traitorous manner and rebellious disorders. They invaded the English pale, spoiled and burned sundrie towne and villages, and carried the preies and pillage with them without anie resistance. The whole prouince of Connagh was altogether in a full rebellion by the earle Clanricard sonnes, and they for their aid had called & waged a thousand Scots. And though they and the Irishie were of diuerse nations, yet of one and of the same dispositions and conditions, being altogether giuen to all sinne and wickednes, and their hearts were altogether imbued in bloud and murther. The earle himselfe was at this time prisoner in the castell of Dublin for the same rebellion, who hearing of the outrages of his sonnes, made sute to the lord deputie, that if he might be set at libertie, he would undertake to bring in his sons, and to quitte the countrie.

The lord deputie, desiring nothing more than peace, after sundrie conferences had with him, did by the aduise of the counsell enlarge him, in an assured hope that he would effectually performe in deed what he had promised in word. But he came no sooner home among his people, and had conferred with his sonnes, but he forgot his promise and performed nothing at all. Likewise the Ochoonners and the Omroughs, accompanied with a rabble of like rebels, fell into open rebellion, spoile the countrie, deuoure the people, and make all wast and desolate. Although enough in Wexford was ready to reuolt, but that he stood in doubt of the earle of Essex, who lieng vpon the fynes and marches in Wexford, was not onelie in readinesse to haue bearded him: but also he had set Odoneile in open warres against him. Pountier was likewise in open rebellion. But sir John Perrot then president so coursed and followed them, that notwithstanding a great combination and league was betwene James Fitzmorris and all the rebels in Connagh and Leinster, yet he kept them asunder and so Tharpelle pursued James, that he left him no one place to rest in, nor anie followers to follow him. Besides these vniuersall troubles, which were sufficient to haue appalled the best and wisest gouernour, these three things increased his griefe and sorrow. First the losse of a most faithfull counsellor and one of his chiefest and trustiest assistants doctor Weston then lord chancelor, whom it pleased God to call out of this miserable life, a man in his life time most godlie, vpright and vertuous, and such a one as that place was not possessed of the like in manie currentes of yeares, in his life most vertuous and godlie, in matters of counsell most sound and perfect, in iustice most vpright and incorrupted, in hospitalitie verie bountious and liberall, and in manners and conuersation most courteous and gentle, faithfull to his prince, firme to his friend, and courteous to all men. And as was his life so was his death, who a little before the same called his household, and gaue them such godlie instructions, as to their callings appertained. Then he set his priuate things in order, and he spent all the time that he had in prayers and exhortations.

At last, feeling a declination towards, he appointed a generall communion to be had of his household and friends in his chamber, vnto which all the counsell came and were partakers. And then these godlie actions finished, he gaue a most godlie exhortation to the counsell, perswading them to be vertuous and zelous in Gods true religion: then to be mindfull of their duties to hir maiestie, and lastlie remembryng their callings and estate, and the great charge of the gouernement laid vpon them and committed vnto them, that they would be baliant, carefull, and studious to perfoyme the same, as might be to the glorie of God, honor to the queene, & benefit to the whole realme. Which points he handled so godlie, learnedlie & effectualle, that he made their teares to trill, and their hearts to be heauie. After this done he bid them farewell, and not long after he being seruent in his prayers, he died most godlie, vertuouslie, and chrystian like.

The next was the breach of the earle of Desmond, who was a prisoner in the castell of Dublin, and he hauing giuen his faith and oth to be a true prisoner, and to shew himselfe a dutifull subiect, did yet make his escape: which being done in so troublesome a time, it was doubted verie much what would insue thereof. Wherefore not onelie in that land, but in England also, hir maiestie vpon knowledge did cause mufters to be made in all the parts vpon and towards the south and west parties, and men to be in readinesse to be transported, if anie occasion by his escape should happen to follow. For it was greatly doubted what would follow of that his breach, sauing that the president in Mounster was thought to be sufficientlie prepared and furnished against him, if he did or would attempt anie disorder that waie.

The third was the reuocation of the earle of Essex, who had taken vpon him to recouer the whole prouince of Ulster to obedience, with hir maiesties aid. And he hauing with great charges brought the same to a great likelihood and towardnesse, the armie was calhed, and he dismissed and discharged, and the enterpryse dissolued. These with sundrie other accidents of the like nature, were sufficient to haue swallowed by anie man in the gulfes of despair, had not the lord God looked vpon him, and hir maiestie most gratiouslie pondered his manie & sundrie most humble requests for his reuocation, which hir highnes by hir letters vnto him granted; and immediatlie wher vpon he (after foure yeares painfull seruice) was discharged of his office, & returned into England. Manie good & notable things were done in the time of this mans deputation worthie to be remembred, and for euer to be chronicled. But forsomuch as the records and presidents of the same cannot be had, and the impinter cannot staie his impression anie longer time, the same with patience must be borne withall, vntill a better opportunitie shall serue as well for it, as for the commendation of his honorable & ancient gentleman, who hath deserued well and honourable of his prince and countrie for his seruice and gouernment. After that this man was cleane discharged, the sword and office was deliuered vnto sir Henrie Sidonie, who now the third time entred into the gouernment of this curled land, and arrived at the Skirries the twelue of September 1575, who at his comming found the infection of the plague so generallie dispersed, and especiallie in the English pale, that he could hardlie find a place where to settle himselfe without danger of infection. And even as this plague reigned, so the old rebellious minds of the northerne Ulsterians brake out. For he was no sooner knowne to be entred into the land, but for a bien venen to welcome him into the countrie, Serlo Boie with his companie came to Knockfergus, there to make prete of the towne, & so proudlie assailed the same, that he slue a capteine named Baker, and his lieutenant, with fortie of his souldiers, besides diuerse of the townsmen, of whome some were hurt, some maimed, and some slaine; and yet neuertheless by the valour & courage of the rest of the souldiers and townsmen, the prete was rescued, and the Scots perforce driuen awaie.

The lord deputie, considering with himselfe that of such beginnings euill would be the enents and sequels thereof, if the same were not out of hand prevented; and knowing also by his owne experience, how perillous delaies be in such cases, thought it verie necessarie and expedient (according to the old saying Principijs obsta, sero medicina paratur, &c.) forthwith to withstand the same. And therefore by the aduise of so manie of hir maiesties priuie counsell, as could in that queste time be assembled, he toke order for the safe keeping of the English pale, and committed the custodie thereof in his absence, to certeine gentlemen of best account and wisedome, to see the same to be kept and quieted. And he himselfe in his owne person, taking with him hir maiesties armie, which was then about six hundred horsemen and footmen, and accompanied with such gentlemen and counsellors as he had appointed for that seruice, toke his iourneie towards Ulster. And as he passed, he found the whole countrie throughout wasted, spoiled, and impouerished, sauing the Newtowne, which sir Nicholas Bagnoll knight marshall did inhabit, and the Glins and Mouts which Serlo Boie with the Scots possessed, and Killulagh.

Now in all that tyme few came to submit themselves, sauing Mac Mahon, and Mac Swier, & Tirlough Lenough, who first sent his wife; and she being a woman verie well spoken, of great modestie, nurture, parentage, and disposition, and aunt to the then earle of Argile, was verie desirous to haue hir husband to liue like a good subiect, and to be nobilitated. Tirlough himselfe followed verie hoztly after his wife, & came before the lord deputie without pledge, promise or hostage, and simple & without anie condition did submit himselfe in all humblenesse and reuerence to his lordship, making the like lutes as his wife before his comming had motioned vnto his lordship, referring himselfe neuertheless to be ordered and directed by his lordship in all things. And after that he had spent two daies, vsing himselfe in all the time of his abode in all dutifulnesse, subiection, and and reverence, did in like manner take his leaue, and returned to his owne home. And as for Odonell lord of Tirconnell, and Mac Swier lord of Farmanagh, albeit they came not in persons, yet they wrote their most humble letters of submission, and offered all such rents and seruices, as to them appertained to yield, making request that they might onelie serue vnder his highnesse, and be discharged from the exactions of all others.

After that the lord deputie had performed this 10 journeie, and was returned to Dublin, then he made the like journeyes towards the other parts of the land. And beginning in Leinster, he found the whole countie of Kildare, and the baronie of Carberie, extreamelie impouerished by the Omeries, both in the time of the late rebellion, and also since, when they were vnder protection. The kings and queenes countiees were all spoiled & wasted by the Oconnors and the Omeries, the old native inhabitants of the same, and of them Korie Og had gotten the possession, and the setting of himselfe in sundrie lands there, whether the tenants will or no, and as a prince occupieth what he listeth, and wasteth what he will. After this lesse, vpon the word of the earle of Desmond, he came to the lord deputie at his being in Kilkennie; and in the cathedrall church there he submitted himselfe: and in outward appearance repented his former faults, and promised amendment: but how well he kept and performed it, his rebellions in the yeare following can witness.

The lord deputie at his comming to Kilkennie was receiued by the townsmen in all the best manner they could, and the earle of Desmond himselfe feasted and intreated him most honourable, and had great care that his lordship and all his traine should not want any thing. At this towne the two cousins and kinsmen of sir Peter Carew late deceased, that is, Peter Carew, and George Carew, and the gentleman who had bene his agent in all his causes within that land, came before the lord deputie, and there communicated with his lordship the state of the deceased knight, and of his countie; submitted the same to his order and direction, as also made humble sute vnto his lordship for his presence at the funerals at Waterford, where it was appointed he should be buried. Whose lordship as vpon the first newes of this knights death, so now also vpon the new recitall thereof, maruellouslie lamented and bewailed the losse of so worthy a knight, and the want of so wise and faithfull an assistant and counsellor. And then he took order therein, shewing most honourable not onelie the offices of a faithfull and good friend to the dead; but also the like good will to the two young gentlemen, of which one was then his heire, and to inioy his baronie. And according as things were determined, the corps was removed from Kille where he died, and caried to Waterford against his comming thither, where it was buried in verie honourable manner, as shall hereafter appeare, being not impertinent to the historie to set downe some short discourse of this most worthy gentleman and of his life.

Sir Peter Carew was descended of noble and high parentage, whose first ancestor was named Montgomerie, and in the time of king Henrie the second he married the lady Elisabeth daughter to Roeluis prince of Southwales, by which marriage he was advanced to honour, and made baron of the castle of Carew, whereof his posteritie in time took their surnames, being called Carews. And some of their passing into Ireland did grow to be mightie men, and of great honor and possessions in that land, being marquesses of Cozke, barons of Hydron and Lerneu, lords of Passon, and inheritors to sundrie great lordships and seignories in that land. And likewise in England they were men of great credit, seruice, and honour, and by waie of marriages matched and combined with honourable and great houses.

This foresaid sir Peter, who was lineallie descended from them, was of stature meane, but verie stronglie and well compacted; of complexion cholericke, from his childhood vpwarts bent and giuen to an honest disposition, and in his tender yeares he served vnder, and was page to the prince of Deneg beyond the seas, and by that means had the greater delight & skill in martiall affaires, wherein he had god knowledge, as did well appeare in the manifold seruices he did vnder king Henrie the eight, king Edward the first, and queene Elisabeth, in sundrie places beyond as also on this side the seas. He was in his younger yeares a great traveller, and had bene at Constantinople in the Turkes court, at Vienna in the emperours palace, at Venice, and in the French kings court, and in the houses of the most of all christian princes; in euerie of which places he left some tokens of his value. He was blessed of God with manie singular god gifts, as well of the mind as of the bodie, being vertuouslie disposed even from his verie infancie, sincere in religion (and for which he was partlie an exiled man in the Spanish daies) dutifull to his prince, and faithfull to his countie, by right in iustice, politike in gouernement, and ballant in armes, skilfull in the Italian and French tongues, and a great student in such booke as those tongues did yield; and by that means some knowledge ioined with his pregnancie of wit, he would discourse verie substantiallie in any matter concerning policie or religion, peace or warres, god to euerie man, hurtfull to no man; bountifull & liberall, abhorring couetousnesse and vborndome: a great housekeeper, and of great hospitalitie. And if any fault were in him, it was rather of too much spending, than in reasonable sauing; he would be soone warne, but without gall, and against his enimie most stout and valiant: finally such was his vpright dealing, honest conuersation, and zeale to the commonwealth, as no man was more honoured, nor vniuersallie beloued than was he.

When he had spent the greater part of his age, he bethought himselfe vpon such lands as his ancestors had in Ireland, and which in right did descend vnto him: and finding his title to be good, he acquainted his highnesse therewith; and obtained his fauour and god will to passe ouer into Ireland, to follow the recoverie thereof. Which he did, and made such good proofes of his title, as well by records as by evidences, that he recovered so much as he did then put in sute, namelie the lordship of Passon, of which he had bene dispossessed of about seauen score yeares, which he departed with vnto sir Christopher Chiners knight, then tenant to the same, and the baronie of Hydron then in the possession of the Cauenaghs, the ancient enimies of the English gouernment, and who had expelled his ancestors about two hundred yeares past. But being put once in possession, he dealt in such good order with them, and so honourable bled himselfe, that they all voluntarilie yielded vnto their lands, and submitted themselves to his deuotion; and finding him to be a verie rare man in manie and sundrie respects, as of the like they had not heard nor knowne, they much reioiced of him, and counted themselves happy and blessed to be vnder his gouernment. At his first comming he resumed the whole baronie into his owne hands, and thereof he gave some peeces in free hold, to such gentlemen as he thought good; and for the residue enerie of them what he had before, he took it againe vnder writing by lease. He diuided the baronie into cer-teine manors and lordships, and in euerie one he did erect a court baron, and there all matters in variance betwene them were ended and determined after the English maner, according to iustice & truth. He would not suffer anie wrong to be done vnto them, neither would he beare with anie of them doing wrong. Their complaints he would heare, and with indifferencie he would determine them: he dwelled among them, and kept a verie liberall and a bountifull house, and such hospitalitie as had not bene before knowne among them; and for which he was marvellouslie beloued, and his fame spred through out that land.

His housekeeping and hospitalitie.

He kept continuallie of his owne priuat familie, aboue or nere a hundred persons in house, he had alwaies in readinesse for tie horsemen well appointed, besides footmen, & commonlie one hundred kerns, and all that his countrie at commandement; by which meanes he chased and pursued such as late vpon the frontiers of his countrie, that they if anie had offended, would come and submit themselves simplie to his mercie: & the residue willing to serue him at all needs. If anie noble man or others did passe by his house, there he first staied and was intertained according to his calling, for his cellar doore was neuer shut, & his butterie alwaies open, to all comers of anie credit. If anie garrison either came to assist and attend him, or passed through his countrie, he gaue them intertainment, and vittelled them at his owne charges, and paid readie monie both for it, and for all things taken of the countrie; for without present paiement he would haue nothing: which was a rare thing and not heard of in that land. And as concerning his maiesties seruice, it was so honourable for his highnesse, and so profitable to the countrie, and accomplished with such a disposition and a good will, as all and euerie the gouernours in his time thought themselves happie to be assisted with such a man. In matters of counsell he was verie graue and considerate, in matters of policie verie wise and circumspect, and in martiall affaires verie valiant and noble, and in all of great knowledge and experience: in euerie of which (as occasion serued) his seruice was readie and at commandement, so long as his abode was in that land.

Readie paiement for all things.

His seruice in the Irish wars.

In the Butlers warres, vpon commandement from the deputie, he did first serue at Cloghgreman, a castell of sir Edmund Butlers, where being accompanied with capteine Gilbert, capteine Palbeie, and capteine Basinet, and Henrie Dauels, and their bands, assailed the castell, toke it, and gaue the preie to the souldiers. Then they went to Kilkennie where they issued out and made a sallie vpon the whole armie of sir Edmund Butler: which being about thre miles from the towne, gaue them the ouerthrow, and put all the Gallowglasses and the rest to the sword, sauing the horsemen and kernes which fled into the woods: and then meeting the lord deputie, attended him in the whole iourneie and seruice of the said warres vntill the same was ended. In which he assisted the said deputie with his faithfull aduise and counsell, and with all such dutifull seruice as which his lordship could not lacke, and which he so aduertised to his maiestie. Likewise in Ulster he was in the whole or the most part of that seruice with the earle of Essex, whom he aduised and assisted with all the best seruice and counsell he could, to the great comfort of the earle, and commendation of himselfe.

Sir Peter Carewes seruice in Ulster.

His title to his lands in Downster.

The same and report of this noble gentleman, for his wisdom, valiantnesse, experience, vprightnes, housekeeping, bountifullnesse, liberalitie, and his iust dealings with euerie man, was spred through out all that nation, and he fauoured and beloued of all men. And certeine gentlemen in Downster, knowledging and confessing that he had a iust title to their lands and possessions, and that he (as descending lineallie from the marquesse of Corke) was their lawfull lord, and to whome they ought to yeld their lands; some of them made their repaire, and some wrote their letters vnto him: and all with one consent acknowledged him to be their right and lawfull lord, and offered not onelie true lie to instruct and to aduertise him throughlie of his whole inheritance; but if it would please him to come to the citie of Corke, they would all appeare before him, and submit themselves, and yeld vp their lands into his hands. Sir Peter Carew, when he had considered and well bethought of these offers, and had taken aduise with his friends, thought it not good to refuse the same; and that so much the sooner, because he had made his highnesse acquainted with his title, and had before obtained his letters to sir William Fitzwilliams then lord deputie of Ireland, and to sir John Barret then lord president of Downster, that they should assist him in his sutes, and to call the contrarie parts, and to persuaide them with all quietnesse to yeld to his iust titles. And againe, finding that part of the realme to be now verie quiet, & the people well disposed, he sent first his agent the wyter hereof to Corke, where and before whome there came Mac Artie Kioagh, Cormac Mac Eage, Barrie Dg, the Dmalions, the Ddyscots, the Ddallies, & sundrie others, who of their owne freewill offered to giue in recompense of that which was past, and towards the setting vp of his house, if he would come and dwell among them, thre thousand kine; and so manie sheepe and hogs and corne, as according to that propozition; and would also yereleie giue him in the like maner such a portion as should be to his contentation and god liking. When his agent had aduertised these things vnto him, and according to his order had prepared a house in Kinsale, and one other in Corke for him: the said sir Peter did let the house of Leiglin to his kinsman and cousin Peter Carew, who afterward was his heire, and prepared his ship to passe himselfe with his household stuffe to Corke. And being in readinesse for the same, it pleased God to call him to another passage; for falling sicke at the towne of Kille, he died the seauen and twentieth of Nouember 1575, and was buried verie honourable and in warlike manner at Waterford, the sixteenth of December in the cathedrall church, with all such ensignes of honor as to his degree appertained, there being then present sir Henrie Sidney lord deputie, and the counsell. And thus much concerning that worthy knight sir Peter Carew.

The lord deputie, being accompanied from Kilkennie with the earle of Downster vnto the citie of Waterford, he was verie honourable received at his entrie into the citie, by the maior & his brethren, and an oration congratulatorye made vnto him in the Latine tongue by a yong scholar clad in white attire, verie well and eloquentlie pronounced. Great triumphes were made, both vpon the land and vpon the water; with all such shewes and tokens of iote and gladnesse, as could be deuised. And while he remained in the citie, there wanted not anie thing meet and conuenient for the intertainment of his lordship, and of all his traine: which his lordship did verie well accept and take in good part; as also aduertised it to the lords of his maiesties honorable priuie counsell in England. This citie is a verie ancient citie, and first builded (as the common opinion is) by Sittacus one of the thre brethren, which came out of Porwate, called Easterlings. It standeth and is situated vpon the riuier of Suire, which riseth in the hill or mount Blandina, named in Irish Blomne; blome : and steeeth by Thurles in Tipozarie, where of the earles of Dymond are vicounts : from thence to the Holie crosse, Aromale, Cahir Dowleske, Ardfinan, Inslouagh, Clomnell, Caricke Mac Griffin, and so to Waterford.

It was of it selfe a verie little pile, but strong and well walled, and of late yeares (vpon occasion of warres) enlarged in the time of king Henrie the seuenth and inclosed with a strong wall : when Lamb-berd (named Perkin Warbecke) was crowned king at Dublin, about which king fell great controuersies betwene them and Gilbert erle of Wiltshire. For the said erle being then lord deputie sent his letters to the said maior & his citizens, requiring them to receiue into their citie the new king, as other god cities had done : who refusing to acknowledge anie other king, than king Henrie of England, he threatened them that he would take their citie perforce and hang the maior. Whereupon hot words grew on euerie side, & the same like to haue growne to hand fight : the Waterfordians offering to wage the battell where the erle would appoint. Which their truth at that time auailed them much afterwards, and they in speciall fauour with king Henrie the seuenth and king Henrie the eight, by whome their liberties and franchises were enlarged.

The soile about it is verie barren and full of hills and rocks, and the lesse profitable for lacke of good manurance and husbandrie : but what faileth in the land, is recompensed with the sundrie commodities which the riuer yeldeth, which is not onlie plentifull and abundant of all sorts and kinds of fishes, but also it is a goodlie haven and a receptacle for all sorts of ships : & for this it is called Larga porta. The great of all countries to this citie maketh the same verie populous and rich, & is the chiefest Emporium of that prouince. Great be the priuileges which the kings of England gaue to the maior & citizens, as well concerning the riuer as the citie, by king John, king Henrie the third, and king Edward the first.

The riuer was bounded and limited from the mouth of the seas, betwene Kinsdowan where Hoke tower standeth vpon the east side, and Rodibanke vpon the west side, and from thence vnto Caricke vpon Suire : and so farre beyond, as the said riuer ebbeth and floweth that wate : & from the said mouth vnto the Inostage vpon the riuer of Dtre, and so far as the same water ebbeth and floweth ; and likewise from the said mouth, vnto saint Polins vpon the ri-uer of Barrow ; and so farre beyond the same, as the water ebbeth & floweth. Yet notwithstanding great controuerfies haue bene betwene this citie and the towne of Rosse, which lieth vpon the riuer of Barrow, concerning the bounds and limits that wate, because they of Rosse doe claime a priuilege vpon that riuer as of the gift and grant of Roger Bigod earle marshall : who married Isabell the eldest daughter of Walter earle marshall, and in his right was lord of Rosse and of the riuer of the Barrow.
Whereupon certeine inquisitions were taken in the time of king Edward the third, and of king Richard the second : and then at Clomnell vpon the othes of six knights and eightene esquiers, it was found for the citie of Waterford. And these are the bounds of the port or haven of Waterford ; within the which bounds and limits the citie of Waterford, by the grants of sundrie kings vnder their charters, haue these priuileges : That no ship shall be laden nor vnladen, but at the citie of Waterford, and there to paye all such customes and duties as belong and are due for their merchandise : Also that they haue the priuilege of wike and the iurisdiction of the admeraltie, within the limits of the said riuer.

The citie it selfe was first incorpozated by king Henrie the second, & after confirmed by king John, Henrie the third, and king Edward the first with augmentations. The maior hath the sword bozne before him by the gift of king Edward the fourth, and king Henrie the seauenth, by the name of the sword of iustice. They haue cognisance of all maner of ples as well reall, personall, & mixt. They are iusti-ces of oier and determiner, & maie sit vpon triall of treasons, murthers, and felonies, without anie speciall commission to be sued out for the same. Also that no officer nor officers of the kings or quenes of England, nor their deputies shall intermeddle, nor exercise anie authoritie nor iurisdiction, within the citie and liberties, but onelie the maior & officers of the same. Also they haue a maior and officers of the staple yearelie to be chosen, who haue the liberties for taking of statutes and recognisances staple, not onelic within their owne towne & concerning themselues, but also of sundrie townes in Leinster and Mounster, and the counties of Waterford, Wiltshire, Wexford, and Tipozarie. Also they haue liber-tie from time to time to transport, lade, and carrie awaie coire, biffels, wolle, horses, & hauks ; and to licence anie other within the limits of their iurisdiction to doe the like. Also all forfeitures, amerciaments, fines, felons goods, and deodands goods, they haue to their owne vse. Also that in all doubts, the words of their charters should be expounded to the best sence, and if then there were anie further doubt, the same should be determined and decided by the king or his councell in the realme of England. Also that they should not at anie time be compelled to go and serue in anie hosting, except the king himselfe or anie of his sonnes were present in person.

These and manie other like priuileges of the kings of England from time to time, of their bounteous liberalitie, and in consideration of their dutiful and good seruices, did giue and bestow vpon them. All which, & you the inhabitants of Pana-pia and citizens of Waterford, the offspring of so good ancestozs, ought to be lessons and prebents vnto you, for your continuance in the like offices and duties : that you maie thereby shew your selues to be as were your predecessozs, faithfull, lofall, and obedient : and that your apophegme maie be for e-uer found true, Waterfordia semper manet intacta. And therwise bzag neuer so much of your worthinesse, & glorie neuer so much of your valies (as the Jewes did of their father Abraham) yet it shall so little a-uaile you, that their honour shall be your reproch, and their glorie your shame, if you doe not also the like ; and in the end your vtter confusion. For as the holie scripture saith : If you be the children of light, then as children walke you in the light ; otherwise that light which is in you shall be darkened.
If you be the children of Abraham, then doe you the workes of Abraham : otherwise God, who is able and will raise vp the verie stones to be sonnes to Abraham, shall reiect you, and giue your citie to a people which shall bring forth the fruits of dutie and obedience. For so did he with his owne peculiar people, the Jewes, whom for their disobedience against himselfe, and against his annointed princes, did after sundrie punishments and no amendment giue them ouer vnto their enemies hands : who put their yong men to the sword, & their priestes to slaughter, their virgins were deflowred, their widows defiled, their citie vtterlie destroyed, and not one stone left vpon an other ; and all the people which escaped the sword, carried awaie captiues, & made bagabonds, euen to this daie vpon the face of the earth. If he did this to his owne peculiar people, doe not you of Waterford, whom God hath blessed manie waies, thinke that you doing the like wickednesse, shall escape the like iudgements: Wherefore if you will eschew the wrath to come, beware by their examples, and humble your soldiers in all dutifulnesse & obedience to God and to your prince. Cramine not his authoritie, nor decipher his power: compare not your privileges with his authoritie, nor do you dispute your liberties with his prerogative. For notwithstanding your privileges, liberties, and grants be great and manie: yet they can not abate nor impugne the least part of the princes prerogative: which is so great, as nothing can be greater, if you will take the view of Gods alone ordinances, when he first created and established a king, who gave him so high and so absolute authoritie, that (as the apostle saith) it must be with all humbleness obeyed: because he is Gods minister expectant upon it concerneth the interest of his majesties imperfall crowne of that land, the suppression of rebels and traitors, & the delivrie of your selues and that realme from the enemies and rebels.

And do not you thinke that this digression is impertinent to the historie, for as your ancestors good doings are set downe to their praises and commendations; so the same shall be done of yours, either to your praises for your well doings, or for your reproch to the contrarie. But to the historie. When the lord deputie had given thanks to the maior and his brethren for his good intertainment, he departed thence by iournies towards Corke, and by the waie at Dungarvon the earle of Desmond came unto him, and verie humble offered him all the service he was able to do to his maiestie, and did accompanie him from thence unto the citie of Corke, where the said lord deputie was receiued in the best manner the citizens could, with all humbleness, and with all such triumphs and other shewes and tokens of good will and dutifulnesse as they could give, without grudging or complaining either of the townesmen or of the souldier. To this towne resorted unto him the earles of Desmond, Thomond, Clancarr, and all the noblemen and best gentlemen in all Mounster, and their wives, and there kept their houses the whole Christmasse. During his being there, manie complaints were made of great outrages, murders, spoiles, and thefts done throughout that province; whereupon daile sessions were kept, and the malefactors of which thre and twentie verie notable and notorious offenders were executed and put to death.

It was also ordered, that for the cutting off and abolishing of the great swarms and clusters of the idlers, which like waspes troubled the whole land, and liued onelie by spoile and rapine; that euerie nobleman and gentleman should give and deliuer in the names of euerie servant and follower which he had, and should see the same to be booked and registred. And if any of them were found unbooked and not registred, that he should be used as a felon where so euer he was taken; and for all such, as whose names were registred, his lord and master should answer for him. To this order all the noble and gentlemen gave their full consents, and forthwith the same was openlie proclaimed in their presence, who seemed to receiue it with all joy, and promised that it should be followed with effect, and immediatlie they gave in their pledges. When all things were thus in these parts settled in good and quiet order, he took his iourne towards Limericke, and there he was receiued with much more pompe and shewes than in anie place before. But as before, so here he spent a few daies in keeping of sessions, in executing of iustice, and in hearing of poore mens complaints, and took the like order for registring of euerie noble and gentlemen follower, as he had done at Corke, which when he had done, he rode thence into Thomond, where he was complained unto of manie great murders, rapes, thefts, and other outrages, whereof he found great plentie. And for want of sufficient time to proceed thoroughlie to do iustice and iudgement therein, he referred the same to certeine commissioners appointed for the purpose: saying that he committed the principall offenders to ward, and some he banished and abandoned out of those parts, untill further order were taken for them.

From thence he entred into Connagh, and came to the towne of Gallewaie, where he found the towne much decayed and almost desolated, sundrie of the good householders having sought new habitations vnder Mac William Coughter, and the countie thorough out altogether spoiled and denoured by the Mac an Carles, the hopeles (but much better if they had bene hopelesse) sonnes of the earle of Clancarr, whose outrages were most heinous and horrible. But when these graceles impes perceived of the great complaints made against them, and doubting what would be the sequelle if some waie were not taken, they voluntarilie went to Gallewaie towne, and came to the church vpon a fundaie at the publike service, where the lord deputie then was; and there kneeling vpon their knees confessed their faults, submitted themselves, and most lamentable craved pardon, promising vnfeinedlie amendment, and neuer to reuolt more from their dutifull obedience to his maiestie and his lawes. The deputie moued herewith, and hoping the best, did by the aduise of his maiesties counsell thinke it good, with some sharpe reprehensions and a little punishment for this time to release them, & so he took his iourne towards Dublin, where he came the thirtieth of Aprill 1576, but kept sessions in euerie place as he passed through the countie, and placed his garrisons in places conuenient.

In this his iourne he found a verie ruinous state and most lamentable disorders, which required a speedie reformation. And though the outrages in the ciuill government were great, yet nothing to be compared to the ecclesiasticall state, for that was too far out of order; the temples all ruined, the parish churches for the most part without curates and pastors, no service said, no God honored, nor Christ preached, nor sacraments ministred. And therefore it appeared, yea and it was openlie preached before the lord deputie himselfe, that manie were borne which neuer were christened: and the patrimonie of the church wasted & the lands imbeuelled. A lamentable case, for a more despoiled and a more ouerthrowne church there could not be among christians. The deputie considering and bethinking with himselfe, how the church of God was abused, and that God had in store some wrath and indignation for this defiling of his holie sanctuarie, did for the auoiding thereof write his letters of aduertisement to his highnesse, and most earnestlie prayed his princelie authoritie for redresse thereof; and therewith most humble requested, that the commonwealth being destitute of a chancelor, and other most necessarie magistrates for the gouernement, might likewise with all speed be sent ouer. When his maiestie and counsell had considered this aduertisement, and had entered into the depth thereof, order for a redresse was taken forthwith, and the matters concerning religion and reformation of the church, it was committed to the said lord deputie, and to archbishops and certeine bishops, with others, to see the same to be put in execution. And for the gouernment one William Gerard esquier a possessor of the laws was sent to be lord chancelor, & sir William Durrrie to be president of Mounster, which arrived at Dublin, Dublin, the one the thirteenth of June, and the other the thirteenth and twentieth of the same 1576. The lord chancellor he did forthwith settle and place in his countie. And then his lordship prepareth to take a tourne towards Waterford, to doe the like with sir William Dzurie. But when he was passed a daies tourne, word was brought unto him from the bishop of Meeth, who laie then upon the confines of Meeth and Connagh for ordering of matters in these parties; and the like from the mayor of Gallewaie, and from diuerse others, who affected well the state, crying out with trembling termes and dolefull reports, that the earle of Clanricard his sonnes that baserlie boud, which not scarce two moneths past had humbled themselves to the lord deputie, confessed their faults, and craued pardon, and had most firmelie protested and swozne most dutifull and continuall obedience.

These (I saie) not without the counsell and consent of their father, were on a night stolen ouer the river of Shennon, and there cast auaie their English apparell, and clothed themselves in their old wonted Irish rags, and sent to all their old friends to come auaie to them, and to bring the Scots whom they had solicited, and their Gallowglasses, and all other their forces with them. Who when they met together, they forthwith went to the towne of Athenrie, and those few houses which were newlie builded, they sacked, set the new gates on fire, beat auaie the masons and labourers which were there in working, brake and spoiled the quenes armes, and others, there made and cut to be set vp. Bad and wicked they were before, but now ten times worse than ever they were; being come, euen as it is said in the scriptures, that the wicked spirit was gone out of the man, and wanting his wonted diet, returneth unto the house from whence he came, and finding the same swept cleane, he goeth and seeketh out other feuen wicked spirits, and entred and dwelleth where he did before, and the last state of that man is worse than the first. And if a man should aske of these baserlie boies, and of their sies, what should be the cause that they should thus rage, and so wickedlie and suddenlie reuolue, as dogs to their vomits, so they to their treasons and treacheries, hauing bene so courteouslie vnder, so gentle intertained, so friendly countenanced, so fatherly exhorted, so pithilie perswaded, & so mercifullie pardoned in hope of amendment: surely nothing can they answer, but that they would not be honest, nor in anie part satisfie a little of infinite the robberies, thefts, and spoiles which they had made. For baserlie slips cannot bring forth better fruits, neither can thornes bring forth grapes. It is the god trea onelie that bringeth forth good fruits, which is to be cherished, and to be much made of; but thornes and briers are prepared for the fire, and to be burned. For let the husbandman be slow neuer so much husbandrie vpon the thorne, he will still be but a thorne: yea let him graffe neuer so good a peare vpon him, the same shall be but a stonie peare; and lacking continuall husbandrie, will reuolt to his old nature againe. As the husbandman then prospereth best, when his fields and gardens are weeded and clenched from thornes, brambles & briers, prepared for the fire: euen so shall the magistrat inioie the quiet state of a commonwealth, when iustice taketh place, and iudgement is executed; when the god are preserved and cherished, and the wicked (prepared for the gallows) according to their deserts are punished.

The instrument, when euerie string is streined to his proper tune, then the musike is sweet, and the harmonie pleasant; but if that one string be out of order, the discorde of that one marreth and disgraceth all the whole musike of the rest: euen so is it in a commonwealth, when euerie subiect is dutifull to his prince, obedient to his magistrate, and liueth according to his vocation and calling, the same prospereth and flourisheth; but let the wicked be left at libertie, and be unpunished, the whole state is disturbed, & the commonwealth (as a garden ouergrowne with weeds) in perill and danger to be ouerthrowne. The best commonwealth in all ages then prospered best, when the wicked were as well punished, as the good conserued. And experience teacheth, that a theefe, murderer, a traitor, & such malefactors doe neuer better seruice to their prince & commonwealth, than when they be hanged on the gallows, and so fastened to a gibbet. But to the matter.

The lord deputie vpon these aduertisements, finding the matter to be of such importance, which required some expedition to withstand the same, or else the whole land like to be in danger, altereth his intended tourne, and returneth to Dublin, vising such expedition, that within three daies following he was entered into Connagh. The hute thereof when it was blowing abroad, it was scarce credited by the rebels, because it was so sudden and with such speed. But finding it to be true, and they afraid of their shadowes, they all one and other fled into the mountains, saving certeine gentlemen of the earls countrie, which left the traitorous boies, & came to the deputie, and offered their loialtie and seruice with fidelitie. The earle their father would faine haue excused himselfe, but in the end when no excuses could be accepted, his castles were taken, and he brought to the lord deputie: who notwithstanding his humble submissions and craving of pardons, he was sent to the castell of Dublin, and there kept in close prison. But the lord deputie he passed thence to Gallewaie, and after he had there staied a few daies, for the comforting of the townefemen, who stood much dismayed of their estate, and in feare to be surprised and taken for pledges: he passed through Thomond, and came to Limericke, where he settled sir William Dzurie (who had accompanied him in all this seruice) to be the lord president. And from thence being accompanied and attended vpon with him and the nobilitie of that prouince, and diuerse gentlemen of account, they passed to Corke, & there the lord president remained.

Now he the said president, being thus placed in the gouernement of that prouince, did beare himselfe so vprightlie, and in so honourable a sort, that he reformed the same maruellouslie both in life and manners: and of a fierce people he tamed them to obedience. For the euill men he spared not, but by law and iustice in the open sessions, or by sword without respect of persons he punished according to their deserts: euen as of the contrarie the good subiects he would fauour and protect. If anie seruice were to be done vpon the enimie and rebell, he would be the first in the field, and neuer cease to pursue him, vntill he had either taken him, or giuen him out of the countrie. If anie matters were in variance betwene man and man, or anie bills of complaints exhibited vnto him, the same he would either determine, or referre them to the law, for which he kept courts continuallie, & where the same were heard and ended, and at which for the most part he would be present. The rude people he framed to a ciuilitie, & their manners he reformed and brought to the English order. And by all these means he did maruellouslie reforme that whole prouince to a most peaceable, quiet and ciuill estate, saving the countie palatine in Kerie: which the earle of Desmond claimed to be his libertie, and that no person was to intermeddle nor yet to vse any iurisdiction there, other than his owne officers. But when his lordship had looked into the most most loose and dissolute life there used, and that it was a sanctuarie for all lewd and wicked persons, and how that liberties granted at the first for the maintenance of iustice was now become a cloke and a shroud for all licentiousness: he purposed and was fully determined to make a iourneie into that privileged place, to make a passage for law and iustice to be there exercised, even as he had tofore done in other places, knowing that it could not be safe among a great flocke to leaue a scabbed shepe, nor god for a commonwealth to haue nurseries for sinne.

The erle, when he perceiued this, he was in a great furie and agonie, and used all the waies he could to dissuade the lord president from the same. Which when he by no means could compass, then according to his accustomed dissimulations he maketh faire weather, and offereth all the seruice he could doe to his lordship, and requested him that it would please him to vse his house and countrie at his pleasure, and that it would likewise please his lordship to lie at his house at Tralie when he passed that waie; the earle minding nothing lesse than his welcome thither, but practising in the end openlie what he had dissemblingly and in secret deuised and determined. The lord deputie, nothing mistrusting anie secret practise to be imagined against him, granteth the earles request; and when he saw time, he taketh his iourneie into Kerrie, hauing no more men with him than sufficient, to the number of six score, or seven score persons; and as he passed through the countrie, he kept courts and sessions, and heard euermans complaint; and at length as his iourneie laie, he rode vnto Tralie, where he minded to lodge with the earle. The earle hauing the gouernor (as he thought) within his clothes, and minding to practise that openlie, which he had deuised secretly; had appointed in a readinesse seven hundred, or eight hundred of his best followers to haue intrapped his lordship; and in stead of a bein vnto the countrie, to haue cut him off for euer comming more there.

The lord president entirely into Kerrie.

The treacherous practise of the earle to haue intrapped the lord president.

The lord president giueth the charge vpon the earle of Desmond.

Which his villanous treacherie when his lordship saw and vnderstood; and considering that he was so nere vpon them, as that he was either to aduenture vpon them, or with dishonor to hazard himselfe and his companie: he calleth all his companie together, and with vertie good and pitie words, encourageth them to giue the onset vpon them: and forthwith with a good courage they all march forwards, and gaue the charge vpon them. But they, notwithstanding they were all well armed, and seven to one of the other: yet being as it were affronted at the boldnesse of this noble man, and at his great courage; for which he was famous in & through all that land; both the earle and his companie turned their heeles, forsooke the field, and dispersed themselves into the woods, and elsewhere, for their best safetie.

The countesse, when she heard hereof, fell in a great sorrow and heavinesse for hir husbands so bad dealings; and like a good Abigail went and met the lord president, fell vpon his knees, held vp his hands, and with trilling teares prayed his lordships patience and pardon, excusing as well as she could his husbands follie, saying that he had assembled all that companie onelie for a generall hunting, nothing thinking vpon his lordship; and that the men seeing his lordship could not be persuaded to make anie staie: and so prayed his lordship to take it. And herein the so iustelle and in such modestie did behaue hir selfe, that his lordship granted hir request, and temporized with the earle. But he followed his determination, and used his authoritie to decide matters in and throughout the palantine of Kerrie. This grieved the earle to the hart, who hauing no other waie to be reuenged, he deuisech certaine articles against the president, which he with great clamours exhibited vnto the lord deputie. The lord deputie, when he departed from Corkie, he returned to Dublin, where he was aduertised that the Mac an Carles in Connagh had hired a new supplie of two thousand Scots, and were in actual rebellion. Whereupon he prepared a new iourneie thitherwards: and being come thither, he found the matter to be true, and that they were by in campe and in outrageous maner spoiling the countries. But before his comming they had besieged Baillie Kiogh, which was the earles their fathers house, and for his treacherous dealings confiscated.

In this house the lord deputie, at his last departure from thence, had placed Thomas le Strange, and capitaine Colier with one hundred footmen, and fiftie horsemen to lie in garrison; but the earls sons, thinking themselves of sufficient strength to reconer the same againe, laid siege vnto it, and inuironed it round about: but they were so resisted, that they did not onelie not pzeualle; but the garrison within did make sundrie assaults vpon them, and sune at sundrie times six of their principall captains, and one hundred and fiftie of their men. And in the end, when they saw they could not pzeualle, they raised their siege, and followed their accustomed robbing and spoiling of the countrie; but especiallie vpon Mac William Coughter, from whence they toke sundrie of his castles, and spoiled him of his goods and cattels. The lord deputie, not slackening nor slowing his businesse, followed out of hand the foresaid rebels, who skipped to and fro in such sort, that in no wise could he find them at anie aduantage. Wherefore he did disperse his companies, and according as intelligence was giuen, he caused pursue to be made vpon them. And by that meanes, although he could not meete with the whole troope of them, whereby to haue a full aduantage vpon them; yet many times he met with some of them, sune them, hanged and executed them, toke their pzeies from them, and gained a waie their holds and castles. And at length hauing good espials, it was aduertised vnto him, that the Scots were incamped in the confines and marches of Mac William Coughters countrie: and thereupon he forthwith marched thitherwards, and in his waie manie of them fell into his lap, who had their rewards. Vnto whose lordship refozged the said Mac William with all the force he had, & could make; who in this rebellion, being the onelie man of power in Connagh, & yet not able to saue himselfe a hole from their inuasions, did shew himselfe most loiall, and did the best seruice that was done vpon the rebels: and by the meanes of the said deputie, he recovered, and was repossessed of sundrie his castles, which in this rebellion had bene taken from him.

The Scots, when they heard of the approaching of the deputie towards them, they raised their campe, and suddenlie dispersed themselves, and the most of them, being werie of their abode and intertainment, fled into the rout in Ulster. The residue like vnto the bare armed rebels sculked to and fro; but in the end, they and the others were all dispersed, & durst not to appeare. Wherefore the deputie, when he had broken the galles of them, & had thus dispersed them, he by iourneies returned towards Dublin, and hauing a little before receiued his maiesties letters in the behalfe of Nicholas Spalbie his seruant, whom he commended for his sufficiencie, both for martiall and ciuill causes: and as well for the encouragement of him, as for the nourishing of the like vertues in others of his profession; his pleasure was to commit vnto him the cheefe charge and gouernement

His praising

In matters of pollicie he was verie prudent, and of a great reach: in caues of counsell sound, and of a he was in prayer, and requested all his companie to do the like; and the verie last words that he spake was, The lord Jesus. And when his tong gaue ouer to speake anie moze, he lifted vp his hands & eyes to the Lord his God, vntill most sweetlie, milde, and godlie he did yeld by his ghost, which manie times befoze he had commended to his Lord and God. And thus this noble man vpon the two and twentieth daie of September, and in the yere of our Lord one thousand five hundred seuentie and six, left this world, to the great sorow of his frends, and losse of the commonwealth; but to the gaine of himselfe, who by all apparant arguments and testimonies of his vndoubted faith, doth assure vs of his euermore sole, and eternall felicitie.

About thre daies befoze his death, he wrote his last letters to the lord deputie, being then in the remote parties of Connagh; and verie desirous he was to haue spoken with him. In which letters he gaue his lordship most hartie thanks for all the good friendships past betwene them, and wished that the god and faithfull dealings betwene them were knowne as well in England as elsewhere. Then he commended to him all his seruants generallie, and some by particular name; and therein a speciall request for his sonne and heire, that though he himselfe should die to his frends, yet his sonne the earle of Essex might liue to the seruice of his prince, and the good of the commonwealth. And lastlie, he touched somewhat concerning his buriall, and herewith he sent vnto his lordship a little George and a garter, the ensignes of the order of the garter, whereof they both were knights and companions, to be a memorie of the loue and goodwill past betwene them. And now leauing this honozable earle in his heauenlie soie and blisse: let vs returne to the historie of this effere and effrened nation.

The province of Mounster was indifferent quiet, but some repinings were betwene the earles of Thomond and Desmond, the one not abiding nor digesting the orders, which vpon sundrie complaints were made against him, which he refused to obeie, vntill Potens nolens he were pressed therevnto by the lord president: the other, who was alwaies a verie wilfull man, notwithstanding he had at Cork yelded himselfe (of his owne free consent) to abide the orders there made for the quietnesse of the countrie, yet now hauing taken the aduise of his disordered followers, he would not be withdrawen from his wonted exactions, and therefore repined to beare further anie celsse; and wrote his letters to the lords of his maiesties priue counsell in England, complaining much, and prouing nothing, and aggravating the taking of the celsse, with most manifest vntuths. And so far he was carried in misliking the government, because he saw his owne wonted swaie was much abated, that he would verie faine haue slipped out if he could. And it was verelie thought that he was combined in a secret conspiration with the forlorne sonnes of the earle of Clanricard, as was his brother sir John of Desmond, who for his conference had with Shane Burke, was suspected to haue joined with him in his rebellion; as also because he had promised him aid out of Mounster, if he would hold out, and for which he was committed to ward. Which carried the more likelihood, because his intention was to put awaie his owne wife, & to haue matched himselfe in marriage with Shanes sister, who was Mowches wife, & of late forsaken by him. Reuer the lesse, the erle was fearefull to offend the state, for the president was so watchfull to espy out both his and all the rest of their doings, and in such a readinesse to be at inches with them, and vpon their bones if they started out neuer so little, that he kept himselfe quiet, and came in to the said president, and deliuered in his men that were demanded, & which befoze he dented, being verie notozious malefactors and pzadisers of vniquietnesse.

And now that the whole land was (as was thought) in quiet, or at least in outward shew more quiet than in times past, the noblemen & gentlemen in the English pale, of whome least suspicion of anie euill was thought: they began verie inconsideratlie to repine against the celsse: who if they had entred into the due consideration thereof, they (although somewhat to their further charge) should haue maintained it: because that the same was procured for the defense of themselves, and they onelie had the benefit thereof. For you shall vnderstand that the lord deputie, being a man of great wisdom, knowledge, and experience, when he considered the sickle state of that wauering and rebellious nation of the Irish, who notwithstanding they had neuer so firmly promised, sworn, and vowed all allegiance and obedience to his maiestie: yet vpon enerie light occasion, without anie respect of faith and dutie, would sing out into secret conspiracies, and so into open rebellion; and then for the appeasing thereof, and the preservation of his good subiects, his highnesse was driuen to enlarge his garrisons, and to increase his armie to his excessive charges, and all which companies were vittelled by the English pale: and further, considering that the benefit which grew hereby, was generallie extended to the whole pale, who in equitie should be contributozie to the burthen, as they were partakers of the ease, and yet manie of them, pretending to haue liberties and priuileges, claimed to be exempted from anie contribution at all, whereby the residue were the moze grieued, & the greater burthened, to their impouerishing, & the hindersance of their seruice: the lord deputie caused a thorough search to be made in his highnesse court of the exchequer in Ireland, of all the records, for and concerning all and all manner of liberties which at anie time had tofoze bin granted to anie person or persons whatsoever: and in the end found that (verie few ancient liberties excepted) all were vsurped, or by statute repealed.

Wherevpon to ease the oppressed, and to make the burthen to be borne moze vniuersallie, and so moze indifferentlie; and for the better furtherance of his highnesse seruice: he commanded by proclamation all such liberties and freedoms to be dissolved, as which either had no grant at all, or which had not that continuance of times out of memorie of man. And of this latter sort were manie made by a statute but to indure onelie for ten yeares, and all which were expired. And for this cause they neuer found fault before now that they are grieued, and therefore do repine against celsse; and with open mouths cry out, that they were so poore that they could not beare anie celsse, and that it was against the law. And here for your better vnderstanding what celsse is, and what is meant thereby; it is a prerogative of the prince, to impose vpon the countrie a certeine proportion of all kind of vittels for men and horse, to be deliuered at a reasonable price called the quens price, to all and euerie such souldiours as the is contented to be at charge withall, and so much as is thought competent for the lord deputies house; and which price is to be yerelie rated and assessed by the lord deputie and the counsell, with the assistants and assent of the nobilitie of the countrie, at such rates and prices as the souldiours may liue of his wages, and the said deputie of his intertainment.

These things although they were orderlie done, yet certeine malecontents, finding themselves grieued, because they should alow now beare a portion, and be contributaries: first they draw their heads together, and make there supplication to the lord deputie and counsell, which was receiued verie willinglie, and offer made that conference should be had with them, how and what waie it might best be deuised to ease there griefes, & not to charge the queene. Whereupon at a time appointed they all met, and came in persons before the deputie and counsell, where the said malecontents first opened their griefes, that they had certeine old and ancient priuileges and liberties which were taken from them; then that they were compelled to yeld to an unreasonable cesse, which they were not able to beare, and that was will and pleasure onlie, and contrarie to all law and reason, that anie such charge should be imposed vpon them without a parlement or grand counsell.

When the lord deputie and counsell heard them at full, they appointed a date, when they should come and receiue their answer. In the meane time the lord deputie and counsell consulted and considered of the matter, and resolved themselves vpon an answer. And when the date came and they appeared, answer was made vnto them by the mouth of the lord chancelor, that they had no charters nor liberties at all to be found in his highnesse records, other than such as were expired and of no validitie. And as for the greatnesse of the cesse, the burden whereof they had alleged to be unreasonable and not to be borne, because they said & auouched that it was ten pounds & twelue pounds of ech plough land; it was offered that they should be discharged, if they would paie but five markes for euerie plough land. And whatsoeuer they said in deniall of the pateng of the cesse, it was and is to be proued, that it was not onelie his maiesties prerogative which may not be impeached; but also to be proued by most ancient records, that euer since the time of king Henrie the fourth, for the space of eight or nine score yeares, there hath bin still from time to time, as occasion hath required, the like charges imposed by the name of cesse by the deputie and counsell, and such nobilitie as were sent for; and did come to the same, now in question and by them repined at. Neuerthelesse, they repined and flatlie denied that they would yeld to anie cesse, saying and alledging as before, that it was against reason and law, and therefore prayed that they might haue his lordships libertie to make their repaire ouer into England, and to acquaint his highnesse with their case. Wherevnto he answered, that he would neither giue any such leaue nor denie them to go. Wherevpon they assembled themselves together againe, and by the aduise of certeine busie headed lawyers and malecontented gentlemen, who had stirred and set them a worke to confoine themselves to follow this sute, and contributed a masse of monie amongst themselves, for the charge of the said lawyers, namelie Barnabie Scurlocke, Richard Peteruill, and Henrie Burnell, who hauing bene sometimes students in the ins of the court in London, & acquainted with Littletons tenures, thought themselves so well fraughted with knowledge in the laws, as they were able to wade in all matters of the deepest points of the law. But if they had first (as it becometh dutifull subjects) to haue looked in the booke of God, they should haue found it written there, that it was God himselfe who first made kings and established their thrones, and gaue them most excellent preeminences next to himselfe, that they should be vnder him the supreme gouernours vpon the earth; and haue that authoritie and prerogative, that all inferiours and subjects should and ought in all humblenesse and dutifulnesse submit themselves vnto the obedience of them for the Lords sake: because so is it the will of God, without siffing of his authoritie or examining his gouernment. For there is no power (as the apostle saith) but of God; & they are ordeined of God; wherefore who so resisteth them, resisteth God, and whose resistances & disobediences the Lord himselfe hath reuenged oftentimes on the disobedient. Wherefore euerie man is to be subiect in all humilitie & obedience vnto them in all maner of ordinances, being not against God, nor onlie because of wrath, but also for conscience sake, especiallie in matters being well considered, & which doe concerne their one benefit and safetie. If this be the infallible truth, how farre were these men ouershot, that thus would dispute the princes prerogative with their Littletons tenures; and measure the same with their owne rules and deuises? It had bin much better for them, & moze to their commendations, if they had (as the scholars of Pythagoras) kept silence and had held their peace, vntill such time as they had bene better studied in their owne lawes; and then they should haue found it written that the prince or king is the head and most excellent part of the bodie of the commonwealth; and through his gouernance the preseruer and defender of the whole bodie, and (as the prophet termeth them) to be nourishing fathers of the people which are the rest of the bodie, and for which causes the lawes doe attribute vnto him all honoz, dignitie, prerogative, and preeminence aboue all others; and which his prerogative doth not onelie extend to his owne person, and all that which he hath of his owne, but also to all his subjects. And the law prescribes themselves do so far stretch this for a Maxime, that whatsoeuer lawes be made and established either for the benefit of holie church or common profit, it is alwaies implied salua in omnibus regis prerogativa; and that nothing shall be intended to be preiudiciall to his crowne and dignitie. But by all likelihood these men were not so farre read; or if they had, their malice or desire of some peltting lucre, which blindeth manie of that profession, had made them forgetfull of themselves & of their duties. Well, these great lawyers beare the malecontented lords & gentlemen in hand, that their cause & sute was good and reasonable, and by the law to be warranted; & not to be doubted but the same would haue good successe. Wherevpon they made by their supplication and letters to his maiestie, with the like letters to his honorable priuie counsell, dated the tenth of Ianuarie, 1576, and vnder the hands of Rowland vicount of Balinglas, Ed. of Deluin, Christopher of Hoth, Peter of Trimleston, James of Kellew, and Patrike Paugle barons; sir Oliuer Plunket, sir Thomas Pugeat, sir Christopher Chiucers, and sir William Searesfield knights; Edward Plunket, Patrike Paugle, Patrike Husseie, George Plunket, Francis Pugeat, Laurence Pugeat, Nicholas Tasse, James Pugeat, and William Talbot, in the names of all the inhabitants within the English pale, had subscribed. And then also they deliuered in the like order their letters of attorneie vnto their said agents, and so much monie for their expences as was thought sufficient, with their order and promise to supplie what soeuer they should need. And thus being furnished with all things to their contentments, they pass ouer the seas, and made their repaire vnto the court of England, and there at time conuenient did exhibit their supplications and letters to his maiestie and the lords of the counsell, which in effect consisted in these points.

First, that where there was a cesse imposed by the lord deputie and counsell vpon the English pale for his maiesties garrisons, they finding themselves grieved therewith, made their complaint thereof vnto the said lord deputie and counsell for redresse, and could not be heard.

2 Secondarilie, they affirmed that the said cesse, or anie other like to be imposed upon them, was against the lawes, statutes, and vsages of that realme.

3 Thirdlie, that the cesse was a most intollerable and grieuous burden, there being eracted out of euerie plough land ten and twelue pounds.

4 Fourthlie, that in the leueng and eracting, there were manie and sundrie abuses done and committed.

The matter is referred to the counsell.

When hir maiestie had throughlie read both the complaints and letters, the forthwith sent and set them ouer to the lords of hir priue counsell to be considered, and the same to be throughlie examined; who forthwith assembled themselves, and having read and heard the contents thereof, did compare them with the like letters sent vnto them from the said malecontented lords & gentlemen; as also with the instructions and aduertisements, which they likewise had receiued from the lord deputie and counsell out of Ireland, concerning the same. And after long debating of the matter, that they might the better proue and vnderstand the greatnesse thereof, did by hir highnesse commandement call befoze them the earles of Kildare and Dunmoyne, the viscount of Ossington, and the baron of Dunsany, who then were attendant at the court, and declared vnto them the whole matter, and the manner of these mens proceedings both here and in that realme, whose intent and meaning was in verie deed, vnder color to seeke some reliefe, to haue taken awaie wholie the imposing of anie cesse, and so consequentlie to haue taken awaie the right & prerogative, which hir maiestie & predecesors haue alwaies inioined, and without which that realme could not be defended, nor themselves preserved.

These foure noblemen, when they had heard the whole matter, seemed to be forie, and to mislike of their vndisputed proceedings: they confessing and acknowledging that cesse hath bene alwaies vsed to be taken, and they thought him not to be a dutifull subject, who would denie or impugn the same: although they wished and did praye, that the poore inhabitants in times of scarcitie might be eased of some part of the burthen which they now presentlie did beare. When the lords of the counsell had proceeded herein so farre as they could, they deliuered by their opinions to hir maiestie, aduertising that concerning the first article they could say nothing; but that they supposed that the doings of hir highnesse deputie was not so strict as was complained: because he had written otherwise.

The answers of the counsell to the articles of the complainers.

To the second their opinion was, that it touched hir maiesties prerogative, so much to be denied of that imposition, which hath bene vsed, allowed, and continued for manie yeares, and in times of hir sundrie predecesors; that now it might not be suffered to be impeached, vnlesse hir highnesse would lose and forgo hir title, right, and interest to the crowne of Ireland, or else support the whole burthen and charge to defend the same of hir owne purse: neither which extremities could or might in anie wise be tolerated.

To the third, that the cesse was intollerable, and not able to be borne, they thought that to be true, if ten pounds and twelue pounds should be demanded out of euerie plough land, as they complained: but they vnderstood by credible informations from the deputie and counsell the contrarie, & that they were offered at five marks the plough land: which was supposed to be verie easie and reasonable.

To the fourth article their opinion was, that if anie such abuses were done, it were good the same were set downe and knowne, and a redress thereof to be ordered.

When hir highnesse had read and thoroughlie considered their opinions and resolutions, and finding hir selfe vndutifullie to be handled by hir subjects, commanded by the aduise of hir counsell the said agents which followed their sute, to be committed to the Fleet, and forthwith wrote hir letters to the said hir deputie and counsell, finding hir selfe grieved with the said hir subjects of the pale, that the releasing of hir armie with vittels by waie of cesse, should be auouched to be a matter against law, and ancient custome: and yet the same both in hir time and in the times of hir progenitors, hath vsuallie bene imposed, and now impugned by some such as in times past had subscribed therevnto, in prejudice of hir prerogative, and hinderance of hir seruice. And therfore she did not onelie mislike, & was greatly offended with these their presumptuous and vndutifull manner of proceeding; but also found fault with the said deputie and hir counsell there, that they would and did suffer hir prerogative in contempt of hir highnesse and authoritie to be so impugned, & the parties not committed & punished: by which meanes the matter at the first and in the beginning might haue bene remedied. And therfore as hir highnesse had alreadye giuen order for committing them to the Fleet, for the punishment of the agents which were sent ouer with the complaints and letters, for such their insuffieng and mainteining the imposition of the said cesse to be against the lawes and customes of that hir realme, and therefore seeking to impeach hir prerogative and roiall authoritie: but also willed and commanded him and all hir whole counsell to send for those lords and gentlemen, which subscribed the letters sent vnto hir highnesse, who if they will stand to mainteine their assertions, and auoid the imposition of the cesse to be against the lawes and customes of the realme, and not warrantable by hir prerogative, that then hir pleasure was, that these persisting and auoiding to be likewise committed.

And concerning the abuses perpetrated in the manner of the leueng the said cesse, hir commandement and order was, that whosoever were culpable therein, he should be punished with all severity. And herewith also she was contented, and had giuen order for some qualification to be yielded vnto, as by the said hir deputie and counsell should be thought meet: considering the scarcitie and the dearth which was then in the said English pale. And in case the said lords and gentlemen vpon better consideration will be contented to acknowledge their offenses, and submit themselves simple, and vnder their hand, writings: that then they to receiue fauour. And as for those and such hir learned men, as were present at the debating of the matter, and did forbear (contrarie to their dutie & knowledge) to stand in maintenance against the said prerogative, to be displayed and discharged out of hir fauour, and their places to be supplied by such others as by the deputies shall be thought meet. Immediatlie vpon the receipt of hir maiesties letters, and the like from the counsell, the lord deputie and counsell by their letters sent not onelie for those malcontents, which had before subscribed to the letters sent to hir highnesse and counsell; but also in discretion for such others who for their disguised and cunning manner of dealings were speciallie noted to be counsellors, ringlers, and procurers of these letters to hir maiestie and the lords of hir counsell: who when they were come, and then being dealt withall, touching their claime of freedome from cesse: their answers were arrogant and wilfull, and repining against hir maiesties prerogative, and affirming boldlie in plaine speeches and without anie sticking, that no cesse celle could be imposed but by parlement or a grand counsell; and whatsoeuer was otherwise set downe, was against the law: and so stubbornlie they were bent therein, that they would not yeld to anie consent: whereupon they were all committed to the castell of Dublin, notwithstanding some of them (after they had better aduised themselves) yeldd a submission and praied mercie.

Which doings when the lord deputie and counsell had forthwith aduertised to hir highnesse & the council in England; they nothing liking these arrogant and disloyall parts of these impaled malecontents, sent for their agents; and hauing the like conference with them, found them of like disposition, being as a fit couer to the pot, verie forward, arrogant, and wilfull: whereupon they were removed from the Fleet to the Tower: a place appointed for the offenders in capitall causes, and for such (being impugnors of hir prerogative) as be supposed to offend in the next degree to the highest. These things when they were notified unto the lords and gentlemen in Ireland, they were maruellouslie grieved; but not the one nor the other would giue ouer, untill their arrogancies and insolencies were by apparant matter and good records fullie conuicted, and condemned: for which the lord chancelor of verie purpose was sent ouer into England, who so fullie, effectually, and discretly did resolve hir maiestie and counsell in euerie point, which the parties agents could not denie.

Now in the end they considered better of themselves, and sent their humble submission in writing vnder their hands to the said lords of hir maiesties priuie counsell, confessing that they had disloyallie and insolentlie, both in words and writings offended most greivously; protesting yet that their intent was neuer to denie hir roiall prerogative, to vse the same as occasion should serue, but onelie to redresse certaine abuses; and therefore most humbly praied they might find some mercie, and that the hard and painfull imprisonment which they had sustained, might be a sufficient punishment for the same. Whereupon they were released, putting in bonds of one thousand pounds, that within five daies they should depart homewards into Ireland; and after their transportation & arrivall thither, should make their immediat repaire, without staie or lingering, to the lord deputie and counsell, and there to giue their attendance, untill by them they should be licensed to depart. At their comming home they performed the conditions of their obligations, and most humbly in like order submitted themselves to the lord deputie and counsell, and then (according to an order thought good by the lords of the counsell in England, and referred to the liking of the lord deputie and counsell in Ireland) the same was after long trauesse ended and determined. But here to set downe what practises, informations, & deuises were made against the said deputie, by the said malecontents, and some (by their means) of no small calling had informed that he had alienated the hearts of the subjects from total obedience, that he had farmed all the whole reime, that he had waisted hir maiesties treasures and reuenues, that he wanted policie in his gouernement, that he should for this dealing with hir subjects be reuoked, that he did all things by his owne mind without the aduise of others, contrarie to the course of other deputies before him, that he did grant manie pardons, to the imboldening of manie which offended the more.

These and manie such other like vntruths they spred. But truth, which is the daughter of time, did manifest it to the whole world, that their ouerthrow was his credit, and his prouaile was to their reproch and shame. And albeit manie were the pangs and inward griefes, which for a time by the means of their false suggestions he sustained, and with great paines he couered: yet in the end it turned to his great joy and comfort. And here by the way, if a man without offense should fall into the consideration of his their resistance, and repining against the celle, which was then enterprised and taken in hand; when the whole land stood in a broken and doubtfull state, and the time verie dangerous; when the earle of Desmond forwardly kicked at the like, and all the lords in Hounster had contrarie to their owne orders and promises, denied, and commanded their tenants to denie after the manner of the English pale, to pale anie celle; when James Fitzmoris being furnished with men, monie, and munition, by the pope and king of Spaine, was daily looked for to come and innade the land; and when the great ones hauing hollow harts, and addicted to papistrie, did daily gape and expect for the same; when the disloyall Irishie in Hounster and Connaugh were combined and ioined in these conspiracies; when Roze Og, Dmore, Connoe Mac Cormacke, Dconnoe & others, animated by the foresaid conspiracies, were by in open rebellion, and vsed most execrable outrages; when some of the best townes in Leinster did aid, comfort, and mainteine these rebels, and besides manie other circumstances concurring hèrewith: might it not be well presumed (and as it was so doubted) that the cause being like, they should also be combined and linked alike? And might not the whole world iudge that neither barrell was the better hering? And yet notwithstanding it fell in the end to a better effect, for the lords and inhabitants in the English pale, since the time of the conquest by king Henrie the second, and since their first arrivall into this land, it hath not bene lightlie knowne that they had broken their faith and their allegiance, and not to rebell in anie warres against the crowne of England, and the kings of the same; sauing as now in respect to saue their purses, rather than meaning anie breach of dutie, had ouer shot themselves: which vpon a further consideration of the truth they repented, and vpon their submission were pardoned, in hope and vpon their promise that they would neuer thenceforth offend, nor be found faultie with the like. During the trauesse about the celle, manie things hapened in the land worthis to be reprehended (as great and sundrie were the aduertisements from out of France by such Englishmen as were there imploied) of an intention of James Fitzmoris to inuade Ireland, who had bene at Rome with the pope, and there was he princelie interteined, and returned from thence with a good masse of treasure, making his returne through Spaine, and by the king thereof was furnished with men, munitions, & treasures, and all things necessarie. Which things were by letters from him signified unto the chæf of all Hounster his secret confederats, and the being papists both in bodie & soule, & desirous of change of gouernement, and to be vnder a prince of their owne superstition, did daily languish and expect his comming. Wherefore hir maiestie and counsell, hauing the like intelligences, did also prepare monie, munitions, vittels, and men, and all other things necessarie for the withstanding of him.

Roze Og, Dmore, and Connoe Mac Cormacke, Dconnoe, and their coparteners, contrarie to their othes, submissions, and promises, hoping for aid out of Connaugh, began anet to gather their friends and confederats out of seuerall places, to the number of a hundred swordes, which with his owne made aboue seatienscore; and being animated by Shane Burke to continue a rebell, he burned diuerse mens haggards, poze mens houses, and sundrie villages, and committed manie outrages: and being not resisted, he took such encouragement of his successe, that leaving poze villages, he went to great towne, as to the Paas, distant from Dublin about ten miles. The verie same daie of the said towne, commonlie called the church holie daie, which daie after the maner of that countrie, and not much unlike the festiuall daies which the Ethniks and Pagans were wont to celebrate to their idoll gods of Bacchus and Menus, they spent in gluttonie, drunkenness, and surfetting. And after they had so filled their panches, and the daie was gone, they somewhat late in the night went to their beds, hauing forgotten to make fast their towne gates, or put anie watch to ward them. Which thing Rozie Dg when he knew, and hauing intelligence that euerie man was in his bed asleepe, then he in the dead night came to the towne with all his companie, who like vnto a sort of furies and diuels new come out of hell, carried vpon the ends of their poles flanks of fier, and did set as they went the low thatched houses on fier. And the wind being then somewhat great and vehement, one house took fier of another, and so in a trise and moment the whole towne was burned; and yet in the towne supposed to be five hundred persons in outward appearance, able to haue resisted them: but they being in their dead slees, suddentlie awaked, were so amazed, that they wist not what to do, for the fier was round about them and past quenching, and to pursue the enimie they were altogether vnfurnished, and durst not to do it, neither if they would they could tell which way to follow him. For he tarried verie little in the towne, sauing that he sat a little while vpon the crosse in the market place, and beheld how the fire round about him was in euerie house kindled, and whereat he made great ioy and triumph, that he had done and exploited so diuclish an act. And then after a short space he arose and departed with great triumph according to his accustomed vsage in all his euill actions, but yet contrarie to his vsage, he killed no one person in the towne. As he returned he cried and spoiled the countrie, and ranging to and fro, as his wauering head carried him, he came verie shortly vnto the towne at Leighlin bridge, and there burned part of the towne.

But George Carew brother vnto Peter Carew, then constable of the said towne and fort, hauing then but a small ward to defend the violence of the enimie, and yet thinking it should be too great a dishonour vnto him to be bearded with a traitor, and to let him depart vnfought withall: he issued out vpon him, hauing with him onelie seuen horsemen and five shot, and gaue the charge vpon the said rebels, being two hundred and fortie, with such a courage and ballantnesse (and they affonied because it was so sudden and in the night time) that he killed some of them: and then they with the losse of those men began to flee. But at last when they perceived his force to be but small, and too weak to resist their great number, they returned and chased him to the verie walles of the castell, where if he and his small companie had not like ballant and good souldiers acquitted themselves, the rebels had entred into the house; for they were within the gate and there fought, but driven out and the gate shut. At this bickering they lost sixtene men, and one of their chiefe capteines named Piers Poinagh, who died verie shortly after of his hurt. Capteine Carew lost but two men and one horse, but euerie one of the rest of his companie was hurt.

The enimie, nothing triumphing nor liking this intertainment, presently retired and departed, by which meanes the one halfe of the towne was saued. After their returne from hence, they spoiled sundrie townes and villages vpon the confines & borders of the English pale. And albeit they were verie eagerlie followed and pursued, and oftentimes with losse of his companie, yet he was so mainteined, and his watch and spall was so good, that partlie by the helpe of his acquaintance, and partlie by meanes of the water bogs and fastenelle in euerie place, he was in safegard and safetie. In this pursuit made vpon him, it happened that a parlie was appointed betwene capteine Harington and him: vnto whom Rozie Dg swoze and promised most faithfullie to yeld himselfe to some conformitie and order. The capteine nothing mistrusting him, gaue too much credit to his subtill promises, and did so open himselfe vnto him, that through his owne follie Rozie took advantage, and perforce took him and Alexander Colbie, who was with him in hand, both which he handfasted together, and carried them along with him as his water spaniels, thorough woods and bogs, threatening them still to kill them. This thing being knowne, great sorrow and greafe was conceived of the lord deputie, and of all good Englishmen, and dailie practises were deuised for their deliueries; and at length by treatie of friends an agreement was in a manner concluded. But before the same was fullie perfected, a draught was made by Robert Harepole constable of Catherlough, to intrap and to make a draught vpon Rozie: for he knowing where the said Rozie was wont to hunt, and by good espials learning where his coch and cabine was, he being accompanied with Barker lieutenant to capteine Furse and fittie of his band, earelie in the morning, about two houres before daie, he went and marched to the verie place where Rozie late, and beset the same. Rozie hearing an vntwonted noise, and suspecting the worst, he came suddentlie vpon Harington and Colbie, thinking to haue slaine them, and getting in the darke to the place where they late, gaue him diuerse wounds, but none deadlie; the greatest was the losse of the little finger on his left hand. Robert Harepole when he had broken open the doze of the cabin, he took as manie as were within prisoners: but Rozie himselfe and one other priuillie in the darke stole awate and crept among the bushes, so that he could not be found. The souldiers in the meane time, making spoile of all such goods as they found, killed all the men who were there, but saued capteine Harington and Colbie.

Rozie Dg albe it he was glad that he was so escaped, yet in a great grieffe for the losse of his prisoners, and minding to be reuenged, priuillie with all the companies which he could get, besides them which Shane Burke had sent vnto him out of Connagh, he went to Catherlough earelie in the morning, and burned a few haggards of corne and a few houses, and so retired. Robert Harepole hearing hereof, forthwith followeth them with ten or twelue horses which he had in a readinesse, and at a ford not far off he ouertooke them, and killed sixtene or seuen. Some of his best men, and Rozie himselfe escaped verie narrowlie; and so continued still in his former outrages, vntill he was intraped and taken by a deuisse of his owne to intrap others, which was in this manner. Vpon the nine and twentieth of Aprill 1578, he set forth of purpose an espiall, whom he had cunninglie framed, and made apt for the purpose to go to sir Barnard Fitzpatrick lord of Upper Osserie, and to tell him by the waie of great friendship and in secrecie, that Rozie Dg had bene of late in the countie of Kilkennie, and there had taken a great preie and spoile of pots, pans, and other household stuffe, which he might easilie take if he would adventure ture the matter; and if he did wiselie handle it, he might also take Kozie himselfe and all his companie, which as he said (but vntrulie) that they were but few in number. The lord of Upper Osserie, neither beleueing nor yet mistrusting this newes, and yet forcailling the worst, did put himselfe in readinesse to follow the occasion that was offered, and taking with him a good companie of horsemen and footmen, went towards the place where the bait was laied; and being come nere vnto it made staie, or else he had bene intrapped, and sent thirtie of his men into the woods to serch for Kozie. But the baron himselfe with certeine of his horsemen and footmen staied in the plaines, to attend the issue of the matter. The companie were no sooner entered into the woods, but Kozie the rebell shewed himselfe with a thirtie persons, the rest lieng in ambush; and he was of the opinion that his fame and estimation was so great, and of such value among the Irishie, that no man durst to aduenture vpon him if he once saw his presence. But he was deceiued. For at the first sight and view of him, the lord of Osseries Kerne gaue the charge vpon him, and at their encounter one of them lighted vpon him, and with his sword presentlie thrust him through the bodie: which was no sooner done, but two or thre hacked vpon him, & gaue him such deablie wounds that he fell downe and died, the same being the last daie of June before said; and so this bloudie cattife, deliting all in blood, perished and died in his owne blood.

But before Kozie was thus brought to destruction, the lord deputie made a iourne to the borders of Ossallie and Ler, to haue met with the fore said Kozie & his companions the Oconnors for the suppressing of their insolencie, who were growen into such a pride by taking of capteine Harington, and their strength so increased, that with most vndutifull termes they breathed out slanderous speeches against hir maiestie, as which were not to be indured. Wherefore he beset the whole countrie & confines as he thought best, to stop their passage and to annioie them, & so he went to Kilkennie, and there by sundrie examinations found people of all degrees in that towne to haue relieued the said Kozie with vittels and all other necessaries, for his feeding and defense, with whome he took order according to their deserts. At his being there he sent for the earle of Desmond to come vnto him, because he had refused to come to the lord president when he sent for him sundrie times, and for which cause the said lord president was there to complaine vpon him, as also that he had of his owne authoritie, without any warrant, gathered together a rabble of lewde and vntrulie followers, which harried by and downe the countrie, eating and spending vpon the same, contrary to all good orders, and which was not to be suffered.

Which earle forthwith, vpon the receipt of the said letters, came to Kilkennie to the lord deputie, and there being examined of those his vnseemelie parts, confessed some part: and for excuse he alledged and much mistrusted and doubted the president, least he would haue staied him, and haue used him hardlie, for which he was blamed and reprimanded by the lord deputie. But in the end, when they came together, they were reconciled and made good friends, and then he promised vpon his returne home to disperse abroad his companions, and to obeye the president as hir maiesties principall officer of that prouince, and to come vnto him at all commandements, and which things he performed. For not long after he offered and beliaied to the said lord president the practices of James Fitzmoris, who by the arrivall of certeine Frenchmen and Irishmen vnto Sligo, in a ship of saint Maloues, did what he could to stirre & make a rebellion in Downe and Connaugh, whereby a plot was laied for the slaie of those Frenchmen, and the apprehension of the Irishmen. These were good demonstrations to the utter shew of the obedience and loialtie of the said earle, but in truth more dissimulation, as afterwards it appeared.

Connaugh was in some part troubled, by means of Dwarke capteine of his surname; in whose countrie there were certeine corners of monie, and maintained by him. The cozoneill vnderstanding hereof, he sent vnto Dwarke for them, and also deniied to deliuer any of them: wherefore to correct that his pride, disobedience, and insolencie, he sent a priuat band of footmen, who distressed Dwarke, slue his men, took his castell, and put all the ward to the sword. Whereupon he came with all humilitie, and submitted himselfe, and craued pardon. All the residue of Connaugh was verie quiet, and increased hir maiesties revenues to the yearelie summe of eightene hundred pounds by the yeare, with good contentation. And now when it was thought that all things were quiet throughout all Ireland; behold sudden aduertisements were giuen both vnto hir maiestie and counsell in England, and to the lord deputie in Ireland, that Thomas Stukelcie was arrived out of Italie vnto Cadis in Spaine, with certeine men, ships, and munitions assigned vnto him by the pope. And being accompanied with certeine strangers attending vpon him, he was come to the seas, to land vpon some part of the realme of Ireland, in traitorous maner to inuade the same, and to prouoke the people to ioine with him in rebellion. All things, as well men, munitions, monie, vittels, and all other things necessarie were prouided and prepared for the preventing of them, as well by sea as by land: but in the end, aduertisement was giuen from out of Portugall, that his enterprise was diuerted another waie, and to another purpose, and so all things were quiet. Neuerthelesse, it appeared that he was in great fauour with the pope, and was appointed to some speciall seruice against hir maiestie, if opportunitie would haue serued, & all other things had fallen out as it was deuised. And for the incouraging of him, the pope besides great treasures liberallie bestowed vpon him, he gaue him sundrie titles of honour, and made him knight, baron of Kosse and Jozon, vicount of the Drough & Kenschlagh, and earle of Wexford and Catherlough, and marquisse of Leinster, and generall to the most holie father Gregorie the seventh Pontifici maximo.

In the middle of these boiles, the vicount Baltinglasse, one of the chiefe impugnors and malecontents against the cesse, wrote his letters to the earle of Desmond, then attendant at the court of England, and complaineth of great iniuries and spoiles to the value of two hundred pounds in monie, besides numbers of sheepe and kine, done vpon him and his tenants by the English souldiers, vnder sir Nicholas Baginoll knight marshall, when they were lodged one night in his house at Baltinglasse, in the time that they serued vpon the rebell Kozie & D. Which letter was by the said earle shewed to hir maiestie, and to the lords of hir most honourable priue counsell. Vpon which complaint, because it seemed somewhat pitious and lamentable, and hir maiestie partlie persuaded (as a matter verie likelie to be true) that such greivous extorsions suffered vnto that nation, than did any of the Irish exactions: letters were sent to the lord deputie, to take care with all diligence, that the poore oppressed might be satisfied, and the offenders also be punished, according to the quantities and qualities of their offenses.

The earle of Desmond is driven to flee.

The vicount Baltinglasse complaineth to the lord deputie against sir Nicholas Wagnoll.

The lord deputie, before the receipt of these letters, was complained unto by the said vicount, and sir Nicholas Wagnoll was called to answer such hurts as were objected against him. And upon the replication of the vicount, sir Lucas Dillon and sir Thomas Fitzwilliams knights were appointed to examine all such witnesses, as were brought forth for proofe of the surmises, which in the end fell out to none effect, for nothing could be proved to any purpose. But it appeared manifest of the contrarie, by the report and testimonie of sundrie gentlemen of verie good credit, and how that the said marshall at his first coming to that towne, had given great charge to everie capitaine, to foresee that no iniurie should be offered, no spoiles committed, nor any thing to be taken by any souldier or other person without present painment, professing and proclaiming execution according to marshall law, upon such as should do the contrarie.

Likewise at his departure from thence, he made the like proclamation, that if there were any which had any cause of complaint for any wrong or iniurie done, or that any thing were taken and not paid for, he should come and be heard, and be satisfied. And by this it doth appeare, that the surmises were made rather to aggravate his greafe conceived against the imposition of the cesse, than for any good matter in truth. Wherefore as he and his complices preyailed little in the one, no more had he successe or credit in the other. For the matter was fully certified unto the lords of the councell, and a request therewith made verie earnestlie, that the said vicount might be reprovued, and also terrified to profer or practise any such untrue and indirect dealings. By these and other the like practises of the said vicount, that because he did not brybe nor like of the cesse, he thought by waie of exclames to aggravate his owne case, that thereby the lord deputie might fall into the dislike of his maiestie, and be out of favour, but the contrarie in the end fell out to his owne reproche and discredit.

The whole land in peace

When the lord deputie had ended and finished all his businesse, and had set the whole realme in order and peace, being now delivred from inward and civil warre, and from the feare of Strakeleies invasion, he prepared (according to his maiesties former letters of the sixteenth of March last past) to take his passage for England, and to make his repaire to his highnesse. And so when all things were accordingly prepared, and the wind & weather serving, he delivred up the sword according to his maiesties commandement, the sixteenth of Maye 1578, unto sir William Dzurie, then lord president of Spounser. And then being conducted by the said now lord justice and councell, and all the nobilitie, citizens & people to the waters side, he imbarked himselfe, taking his leave in most honourable, loving, and courteous manner of everie man. And at his verie entering into the ship for his farewell unto that whole land and nation, he recited the words of the 114 psalme, In exitu Israel de Aegypto, & domus Iacob de populo barbaro: alluding thereby to the troublesome state of Spoues in the land of Aegypt, and of his departure from out of the same: who notwithstanding he had in great wisdom, care, and policie governed the stiffnecked people of Israell, had done many miracles and wondrous works to their comfort, had delivred them from many great perils and dangers, had preserved and also kept them in peace and safetie, had in the end through the mightie hand of God brought them out of the hands of Pharaon, and from out of the land of Aegypt, and had given them the sight of the land of promise: yet he found them alwaies a froward and peruerse generation, a stiffnecked and an ungratefull people: even no lesse as this noble man, and most worthy governor hath found of the people of this most cursed nation. Who notwithstanding he was a verie painfull traveller both by day and night, in foule and in faire weathers, in stormes and in tempests, in troubles and in dangers, in scarcitie and in penurie, in danger of the enimie and perill of his life: and yet continuallie studieng, devising, travelling, toiling, and labouring to do them good (as he did full many and often times) which so long as they felt the ease & comfort, so long were they contented and quiet: but otherwise most ungratefull and unthankfull. And offering unto him the like reward as Licurgus received of the most unthankfull Lacedemonians, who when he had recovered that savage nation to a civil life, and a politike government, and in the end reduced them to that order and maner, as they became to be feared of all their neighbors, they in recompense evill intreated him in verie bad speeches, and strake out one of Licurgus his eyes. But these men for thousands and infinit commodities, would not one lie have bereft his lordship of both his eyes, but also done him a further inconvenience (if successe had happened) according to their malice.

And now here by the waie, let it not be offensive to set downe somewhat of much concerning this worthy and noble man for the course of his life. He was borne and descended of a noble house and parentage, his father named sir William Sidneie, a knight of great reputation and credit in the countie of Kent, and in great favour with king Henrie the eight, in whose time, and with his great good liking, he and others lustie young gentlemen of the court travelled into Spaine and other nations, to visit and to see the maner of the emperours and other princes courts: his mother descended of the house of Charles Brandon duke of Suffolke, unto whom he was verie nere allied. This young gentleman, his father being deceased, and he of verie tender and young yeeres, was brought up in the court under the same maister as was king Edward the first, and profited verie well, both in the Latine and French tongues, for he had a verie good wit, and was verie forward in all good actions, and whereof was conceived some good things would come of him: his countenance was verie amiable, and his behavoure verie gentle and courteous, in whom king Henrie the eight (being his godfather) had a verie great liking, and made him be attendant and plaisefellow with prince Edward.

This prince fell in such a good familiaritie and good liking of him, that he used him not onelie as a companion; but many times as a bedfellow, and so delighted in his companie, that for the most part they would never be asunder, neither in health, nor in sicknesse, untill the dieng date of the prince: who then departed his life in this gentlemen's armes. Somewhat before his death, the king gave the order of knight hood to this gentleman, for a memorie and a recompense of his good will and love: upon which date also he did the like unto sir William Cecil, now lord Burghlie and lord high treasurer of all England: by meanes of which their contained advancement, there entered a verie fervent affection and good will betwene them, with a reciproche answering of benenolence each one to the other, untill their dieng dates. This noble gentleman for his forwardnesse in all good actions, was as it were the paragon of the court, by reason of the many good gifts which God had bestowed upon him everie person and well besene; he was comelie and of a good countenance, he was so courteous and of so good behauiour, he was so wise and so modest, so vertuous and so godlie, so discret and so sober, as he was another Scipio; being but young in years, and old in behauiour, and finallie so rare a man, as that age had not afforded manie better. This man for his excellent god gifts, he was made ambassadoz into France, being but about one and twentie yeares of age; and twice in one yeare after that in to Scotland: and by quene Marie joined in commission with others to attend king Philip his coming into England, for the marriage betwene their maiesties. And now in this hir maiesties reigne, he was sent ambassadoz into France, to treat a peace or pacification betwene the prince of Condie and the duke of Guise.

In the beginning and about the second or third yeare of hir maiesties reigne, he was made knight of the garter, and lord president of Wales; and after one of hir maiesties most honozable priuie counsell. But before this, immediatlie upon his returne from out of Spaine, he accompanied the lord Thomas lord Fitzwaters his brother in law into Ireland: where he was made treasurer at the wars, one of the principall offices in the land: and in course of time & yeares for his excellencie in knowledge and experiance in that land, he was made lord iustice four times, and was lord deputie thre times. In which offices, how he did most honozable acquite himselfe, his acts doe declare, and the summarie recitall shall partlie discouer and set downe. He was no sooner placed in gouernement, but first and forthwith he laid downe his plot, whereupon he would ground & laie the foundation of his gouernement, and according to it would he frame and direct all his actions: which plot and deuise consisteth in these points; religion towards God, obedience to the prince, the peace of the people, and the well gouernement in all things concerning the commonwealth, either in causes ciuill or martiall.

Concerning religion, he was no more carefull in his owne person, but the like also in his priuat familie, where he had dallie exercises of praiers, both earlie and late, morning & evening, neither would he haue ante to serue him, who was not affected to religion, and of an honest conuersation. Atheists and papists he detested, dyonhards and adulterers he abhorred, blasphemous and dissolute persons he could not abide. And at his first being in authoritie in Ireland, & finding the whole land generallie (a few priuat places excepted) to be either of no religion, or of papistieall religion; and being openlie by a preacher out of a pulpit aduertised, that in the remote places of that land, manie a soule was borne which neuer receiued baptisme, nor knewe anie churshening; great was his græfe, and much was he vniquieted, untill he had found the redresse thereof. Wherefore he aduertised hir maiestie, & most earnestlie sued & prayed for redresse & reformation, which in the end was granted, & a commission sent to him for the same: which forthwith he committed to the archbishops & bishops to execute, with whom he joined, furthered and holpe them accordinglie to the uttermost. But yet it toke not that god effect as he wished and willed it might. And as for ecclesiasticall liuings which were of his gift and disposition, he would neuer bestow, but upon such, as of whome he conceiued a good opinion, both for his religion and honestie.

The prince, who was scarce knowne in manie places in that land, he brought both to knowledge and obedience. The wild he tamed, the froward he reformed, the disobedient he punished, the traitors he persecuted, the rebels he chastised, the proud he made to stoop, and that arrogant and most insolent Shane O'Neill, who could abide no equall, nor acknowledge a superiour, by a brought was brought to his deserved confusion: & whose head for a trophie, & for the example of Gods iustice laied vpon him, was set vpon a pole vpon the gate of the castell of Dublin. The whole prouince of Ulster, with all the mightie personages of the same, he brought to the quenes peace & obedience. The earle of Clanricard he took and imprisoned, and his vntamed springals he drate to submission, and to sweare dutie and obedience. The vniconstant earle of Desmond and all his Girdines and followers, and the proud and ingrateful earle of Clancar, and all the Irishie of his adherents, he made them perforce to submit themselves, and to craue pardon. The Caenaghs, the Odoles, the Odirnes, the Ocomozes, the Omozos, and a rable of other like septs, together with Korie Og, Theon Mac Hely, and other their leaders and guides in Leinster he tamed, and perforce compelled to sweare loialtie and subiedion. Lastlie, the malecontents against hir maiesties prerogatiue for the cels in the end cried Peccati, and conformed themselves in all dutifullnesse. And when he had travelled long in these affaires, which he saw could not haue continuance, vnlesse they by some other means might be kept vnder gouernement: he by pithe persuations, found arguments, great reasons, and continuall sutes to hir maiestie and counsell, obtained to haue rulers and gouernors to be placed in the remote prouinces and found, learned, and by right iust lawiers out of England to be sent ouer, for the direction of the gouernement, according to the lawes of England: which in the end hir maiestie most gratioullie granted, and he most ioisfullie obtained.

In Hounster therefore first he placed a coronell to breake the ise; namelye sir Humfrete Gilbert, a valiant, a worthie, and a notable man, both for his martiall seruice, and his ciuill gouernement: after him followed the like and worthie gentleman sir John Perot knight: and lastlie the valiant and prudent sir William Dzurle, which both were lord presidents. This man was afterwards lord iustice, and the other at these presents is lord deputie of that land. In Connagh sir Edward Fitton knight, a berie wise and a modest gentleman, late treasurer at armes, was lord president: and after him was sir Nicholas Malbie knight a valiant and expert man in martiall matters, and berie wise and of god knowledge in publike and ciuill causes: who could verie eractlie handle the sword, and vse the pen, he (I saie) was made coronell of all Connagh. And how well the foresaid rulers and gouernors did rule by the sword, with the assistance of their capteins, and how byrightlie they ministred law and iustice by the aduise of the counsellors in their feuerall prouinces, the records and registers of their doings doe at large witnesse and set forth. The like order he toke also at Dublin, which being the metropole and chiefe citie of the whole land, and where are hir maiesties principall and high courts, to answer the law to all sutors throughout the whole realme: and he considering that a great defect was in the administration of iustice in those courts, by reason of kindred, affinitie, and priuat affections among the chiefe iudges and officers of that countrie birth: he by his like earnest sutes to hir maiestie, procured them to be remoued, and their romes to be supplied with such wise, graue and learned Englishmen, as were sent from out of England to be chiefe iustices, atturneie, and sollicitors. And further also, whereas there were manie god lawes & statutes established in the realme, which hitherto were laid by and shrouded in filth and cobwebs, and vterlie vnkowne to the most part of the whole land, and euerie man ignorant

noizant in the lawes of his owne native countrie, he caused a through view, and a rebiew to be made, and then a choise of all such statutes as were most necessarie to be put in vze and execution: which being done, he caused to be put in print, to the great benefit of that whole nation.

The records searched and set vp in places convenient.

The castell chamber built kept.

Edm. Mollineux.

The Irish grounds reduced into counties and shires.

The castell of Dublin repaired.

The towne of Carigfergus fortified.

A gaole at Dolengar builded.

The towne of Athenrie re-edified.

The bridge of Athlon new builded.

And likewise for the records, which were verie well kept, not fenced or defended from raine and foule weather, but laie all in a chaos and a confused heape, without anie regard; he caused to be viewed 10 and sorted, and then prepared more rooms, presses, and places for the keeping of them in safetie, and did appoint a speciall officer with a yearelie fee for the keeping of them: and for all such matters as were to be heard and determined in the castell chamber, before the lords, as it is in the starchamber in England; he would be for the most part present at euerie court, and alwaies would haue the assistants and persons of his maiesties learned counsellors. Nevertheless, he himselfe had a marvellous head to conceive, a deepe iudgement to vnderstand, and a most eloquent tongue to utter whatsoeuer was requisite to be spoken, either in that place, or in anie other assemble, which he would deliuer in such an eloquent phrase, and so pleasantlie it would flow from him, with such pithie reasons, sound arguments, and effectuall discourses, as that the lesse learned he was, the more strange it was that such great good things could come out of his mouth. And such was his amiable countenance, his comelie behauior, his commendable personage, that he would and did conquer their hearts, and gaine the loue of euerie man; and the people of all sorts would and did fall in loue with him for his vprightnesse, indifferencie, and iustice, in determining of euerie mans cause. And he knowing the nature and disposition of that people, who could not abide anie long suites in law, he was so affable and courteous, that euerie sutor should haue access vnto him, and forthwith he would heare his cause, and with such expedition would cause the same to be determined, that he purchased to himselfe the vniuersall loue of all the Irish, who thought themselves the more happie, if their causes might be once brought to his hearing, & the more willing to leaue their vbiain law, & to embrace the course of the English lawes. Whereupon he deuised, and consequentlie with great policie and wisdom executed the diuision and distribution of the wild, sauage, and Irish grounds into shire grounds and counties, appointing in euerie of them shiriffes, constables, and all such kind of officers as are vsed to be in all other counties: by which meanes his maiesties wit had passage amongst them, and they brought to the order of the English lawes & gouernement, which neuer before was heard or knowne among them.

When he had done all such things as are before recited, for and concerning the due course of gouernement by order of law: then also he bethought himselfe vpon such other things as were necessarie in sundrie respects to be done, as the castell and house of Dublin, which before his comming was ruinous, foule, filthy, and greatlie decayed. This he repaired, and reedified, and made a verie faire house for the lord deputie or the chiefe gouernor to reside & dwell in. The towne of Carigfergus, being open to the northerne rebelles, he began to inclose with a wall and to fortifie, which for shortnesse of time he could not finish. A gaole at Dolengar he builded, a verie necessarie thing in those parties, for restraining and safe keeping of malefactors. The towne of Athenrie in Connagh he caused to be reedified, & the faire bridge of Athlon vpon the deepe and great riuer of the Shenin he builded with masonrie and free stone, and raised by the walles & battlements verie faire.

By building of which bridge a passage (neuer before had) was made open & free betwene the English pale and Connagh, which more danted, appalled, and kept the rebelles in awe and obedience than any thing before had done. Sundrie like common workes he made and did, and more would, if his residing there had continued. All which his forsaide doings, no doubt, were verie chargeable to his maiestie. And for easing thereof he (as it became him) & in verie deed had also promised and deuised how and by what means these charges might be answered, and his highnesse be relieved of the great and intollerable charges which the saidie was at in that land, he did by good means enlarge and increase his reuenues and yearelie receipts to about eleuen thousand pounds by the yeare more than he found it, and much more would he haue done, if he had staied there but a short time longer than he did.

Thus much bylesie of his generall actions, and concerning his priuat dealings and conuersation. 20 He was godlie disposed, & a zelous promoter of the true religion, a notable orator, & out of whose mouth flowed such eloquent speeches, such pithie sentences, such perswasorie reasons, as it was verie strange, that he by a naturall course should performe that which manie by learning could not reach nor attaine vnto. He had some sight in good letters and in histories and armories, and would discourse verie well in all things; he was affable and courteous to all men, verie familiar with most men, and strange to none; verie temperat and modest, seldom or neuer in anie discomposed or extraordinarie choler, vpright in iustice, free from corruption, and liberal to euerie deserving person, a bounteous housekeeper, and of great hospitalitie, and had all officers in verie honorable order, according to his estate & honor; a thing much allowed and liked in that nation: verie familiar, and a louer of all such as were learned and were men of vnderstanding, whom he would honor and esteeme verie much; gratefull to all men, and a most loving master to all such as serued him, whom he loved full dearelie. And albeit he were a man of a great reach and iudgement, yet he would not do anie thing without aduise & counsell, for which purpose he made a speciall choise of two singular men, who were psonie to all or most part of his actions; sir Lucas Dillon knight, and Francis Agard esquier: the one a lawier, and yet not ignorant in anie thing pertaining either to the marshall affaires, or to the ciuill gouernement: the other a verie wise man, and of a deepe iudgement and experience in all matters of policies. And so true and trustie these were, that he named the one Mens fidelis Lucas; and the other Mens fidus Achates. And notwithstanding in sundrie and almost infinit respects, as partlie by the course of this historie it doth appeare, he hath deserued most hartie thanks, and a gratefull remembrance for ever amongst them: yet most vnnaturallie and vngreatfullie they haue requited and recompensed him. Not 50 much vnlke the viper, who when he hath done the act of generation with his female, which (as the writers of naturallies saie) it is done by the mouth, the immediatlie biteth off his head, and so destroyeth him; and likewise the yong, conceived with the death of their sire or father, and nourished in the wombe of their mother, and readie now to be borne & brought forth; they not abiding their due time, most vnnaturallie doe gnaw out his wombe and belie to his confusion; and so they are conceived with the destruction of their father, and borne with the confusion of their mother. This vngreatfull people (I saie) notwithstanding the innumerable benefits bestowed vpon them and that whole commonwealth, yea and the saidie purchasing of their wealth, preservation, and safetie, nance towards him : he forsake France, and made a iourne into Spaine vnto king Philip. The king who had receiued the gift of Ireland of the pope by meanes of the bishop of Cathell, being not wil- ling to deale therein, without his assistance & aduise; James Fitzmorris made his iourneie from thence to the pope, vnto whom he declared that he had bene with king Philip, as doth appeare by his letters of credit to his holinesse; and that he would deliuer and cause to be deliuered the kingdome of Ireland by in- to their hands, and reduce the same againe to the ho- lie church of Rome, if he might haue men, monie, and such furniture of munitions, & other necessaries as should be requisite in that seruice. The pope was verie glad of this sute, and liked it verie well, and did accept this offer, as also gaue him good countenance and interteinement. And in the end vpon sundrie conferences betwene the pope and king Philip, it was agreed betwene them, that Fitzmorris should be furnished with men, monie, and all things neces- sarie for this seruice. James Fitzmorris during his being in Rome, he fell acquainted with doctor San- ders an English Jesuit, & doctor Allen an Irish Je- suit, and both traitors to his maiestie and crowne; and these two men being glad of such a sute, & they in great fauor with the pope, solowed the sute verie earnestlie, and promised to follow it to the bittermost in their owne persons.

Now then all things were concluded betwene the pope and king Philip, doctor Sanders, doctor Al- len, and James Fitzmorris made their last repaire to the pope, who forthwith made Sanders his legat, & gaue him the holie ghost, with authoritie to blesse and curse at his will and pleasure; and to him and the others he gaue then also his blessing; and there- with his letters of commendation to king Philip, who according to the conclusion made betwene them both, he was furnished with all things meet and necessarie for them. Whereupon when time ser- ued they imbarked themselves, and their companie in three ships well appointed for the purpose, and ar- rived at Smereweke, alias saint Marie weke, in the beginning of Iulie 1579, nere the Dingle a cuth in Kerrie in Ireland: where he landed, and all his com- panie, being about the number of foure score Spa- nards, besides a few Englishmen and Irishmen, and there builded a fort in the west side of the bate for their safetie: and drew their ships close under the said fort.

The two doctors, when they had halloved the place after their popish maner, promising all safeties, and that no enimie should dare to come vpon them, and trouble them: neuertheless they were beguiled. For at that instant, there was in Kentale a Devonshire gentleman and a man of warre, named Thomas Courtneie, and he hearing of the landing of this James Fitzmorris, and of the popes traitorous le- gats, was contented, and by the persuation of Hen- rie Dauels, being then in those parts; and hauing a good wind, did come about and doubled the point, came into the bate of Saint Marie weke or Smer- weke; and finding the three ships of James Fitzmor- ris at anchor, was so bold in the waie of god speed to take them. And after that he had staied there a while in that seruice, he tooke them all along with him: whereby James Fitzmorris and his companie lost a peece of the popes blessing, for they were also gither destituted of anie ship, to ease and releue themselves by the seas, what sooner should hap- pen. As soon as they were thus landed, newes was sent and carried abroad forthwith to James & John brethren to the earle of Desmond, and so consequen- tie to the whole countrie. These two brethren, who had long looked for the arrivall of this their cousine, and archtraitor, assembled all their tenants, selev- ers, and friends; and out of hand made their present repaire vnto him: whose comings and companies he accepted verie thankfullie, sauing that he had not a thorough and a full liking of his cousine Sir John of Desmond. Which when Sir John perceiued, he censured how he would salue that soe, as most wic- kedlie afterwards he did.

The earle of Desmond at this time was in reedi- fieng of a castell, which he had in the confines of Brenne Agoneffis countrie, who as soon as he heard of the arrivall of his cousine James Fitzmorris, he forthwith did discharge and dismitte his whole com- panie of workemen and labourers, pretending in outward shew that he neuer meant, that he was to withstand and resist his cousine and all his compa- nite, and forthwith maketh his repaire into Kerrie, and there assembleth all his followers and force, as though he would do great things and worke mira- cles. And forthwith likewise he sent his letters to Mac Artie Moore earle of Clancar, & willett him in all hast to assemble all the force he could make, and to make his speedie repaire to him, for vanquishing (if they could) of the enimies now landed at S. Ma- rie weke. The earle of Desmond in the meane time had receiued a peece of the popes blessing, and his heat was abated. But the erle of Clancar returned his answer, that he would come vnto him with all speed, and lie in campe with him where he would, as nere to the Dingle as he might: and accordingly he came to the place appointed. Which Desmond se- med to like well though it were against the spleene, neuertheless when he saw the forwardnes of Clancar, albeit he would not, nor yet well could in open termes fall out with him, yet he deuiseeth matters whereupon he might haue some occasion to dislike with him, & to make him wearie of his companie. Which when Clancar perceiued, and saw the unwill- ingnesse of Desmond to doe anie seruice against the rebels, but rather inclined towards them, he tooke the best opportunitie he could, and departed awate from him, and dismissed his companie.

The lord iustice, who was at Dublin, as soon as he was aduertised of James Fitzmorris landing, he maketh all the preparation he can, & marcheth with all the queenes force towards Pounder, dispatch- ing also a messenger to his maiestie of these toward broiles and rebellion. But before he could prepare all things, as to such a great action did appertene, he sent Henrie Dauels an English gentleman before him, that he being verie well acquainted with the earle of Desmond and his brethren, should practise with them to prepare themselves to be in a readi- nesse to assist his lordship, for the resisting against those enimies. Who being accompanied with one Arthur Carter pronoist marshall of Pounder, made his speedie repaire to the earle of Desmond & his bre- thren being in Kerrie, and aduertised vnto them the lord iustices pleasure, as also as much as in him late did persuaue them to the like, who as then had all his force and souldiers about him. From thence he departed to the fort, whereof when he had taken the view, & saw the force as yet not so great but might be easilie as yet overthrowne; he returned backe to the earle, and gaue him aduise to draw all his force and companie towards the fort, persuaading him to assaile it while it was but weake, of small force, and easie to be taken, and that in so doing it should be greatlie to his honor. But the earle being not of so good a mind, or bent to do so good a peece of seruice, answered; that he would not adventure to take so great an enterprize in hand with so small a compa- nite as he then had. When Dauels went to Sir James and to Sir John of Desmonds the earles brethren, and and perswaded them to aduise their brother the earle, either to do that seruice which would be to his great honour and commendation, or else that they would take it in hand; which if they would also refuse it, that then the earle would spare to him a companie of his Gallowglasses, and about thre score of his shot, and he would ioint with capteine Courtneie who laie then within the baie with his mariners, & he would giue the assault by land, and the other should do the like by sea.

But the earle, being moued hereof, would not yeeld to this motion, but answered that his shot was more meet to shoot at foule than fit to aduenture such a peece of seruice, and his Gallowglasses were good men to incounter with Gallowglasses, and not to answer old souldiers. Whereupon when he saw the bent and disposition of the earle, that he minded not to annoie, but rather to ioint, aid, and helpe the traitors: he together with the prouost marshall toke their leaue of the earle, and minded to returne backe vnto the lord iustice, to giue his lordship to vnderstand how all things stood, & what successe he had had in his message. And by the waie they laie that night at Traleigh, which is about fīue miles from castell Spaine, and laie that night in one Kices house, who kept a bittelling house and a wine tauerne, the house being both strong and defensible, but so little that their companies and seruants were dispersed, and laie abroad in other places where they might haue lodging. But sir John of Desmond, whose hart was imbued with a bloudie intent, followed him, but somewhat late, and came to the towne of Traleigh, and immediatlie set spies vpon Dauels, as also had corrupted the man of the house which kept the gate, that he should leaue the doores open. Henrie Dauels mistrusting no hurt, and least doubting of that tragedie which was so neere at hand, especiallie to be done by him, whom of all the men bozne in that land he least doubted, & best trusted, gat him to his bed; & Arthur Carter the prouost marshall with him. Now about the dead of the night, when they were in their deepe sleepes, sir John according to his wicked deuise came to the house, the castell doze being left open for the purpose, with all his companie, euerie one being armed and their swords drawne, and went forthwith vpon into the chamber where Dauels & his companie were in their beds fast asleepe, but with the noise they were suddenlie awaked. When Dauels saw sir John of Desmond armed and his sword drawne, he was somewhat affronted at that sight, and rising vp in his bed said vnto him (as he was euer wont to saie verie familiarlie) What sonne! what is the matter? But he answered him; No more sonne, no more father, but make thy selfe readie, for die thou shalt. And forthwith he & his companie strake at him & his companion, both naked in their shirts, and most cruellie murdered them both. Then they searched the whole house & spared none, but put all to the sword, sauing a boie named Smolkin, who laie in the chamber, and had bene a continuall messenger betwene Dauels and this John Desmond. This boie seeing his maister to be thus murdered ran vpon John of Desmond, and held him by the armes as well as he could, crieng; What wilt thou kill my maister? But he answered; Go thy waies Smolkin, thou shalt haue no harme. But the boie seeing blowes still to be giuen, cast himselfe downe vpon his maister, crieng; If thou wilt kill him, then kill me also. And so saued him as well, and so long as he could. But it auailed not, for saue and most cruellie he was there murdered.

This Henrie Dauels was a gentleman, bozne in Deuon, and descended of a verie ancient and a wealthy full house, and being but a yonger brother, and hauing but a verie small portion left vnto him, when he came to some yeares and knowledge, he gaue himselfe to serue in the warres. And king Henrie the eight, hauing then warres against the French king, he entred into France to seeke his aduenture; and there he had verie good intertainment, and proued to be a verie good souldiour. After whose warres he serued in Scotland, and was in garrison at Warwike: and from thence he was reioined into Ireland, where he serued vnder sir Nicholas Herne knight constable of Leighlin, and senehall of Merford; and so well he behaued himselfe there, that he was commended for his good seruice towards the prince, well beloued of his countriemen, and in maruelous fauour of the Irish people; for no seruice was too hard for him in the kings causes: and so well he was acquainted with the countrie, as no man better knew and had the skill to serue than he could there. As for his countriemen, he was so deere and louing towards them, as he was more like a father than a friend, and more like a friend than an vnacquainted countrieman: for he was an host and a harborer to euerie one of them, of what estate and condition so euer he were of. For were he rich or poore, a gentleman or a begger, he was frendlie to euerie one; and no man did or could lacke that intertainment, that he was by anie manner of waie able to giue and afford: which a number of Englishmen tried and found to their great comfort, and to his euermore fame.

And as for the Irishmen, the longer he liued the better beloued among them: for as he would not intarie them, no more would he suffer them to be oppressed or injured: a great housekeeper amongst them, which they maruelouslie esteemed. When he was in office among them, he was vpriht and iudged righteously; if out of office, louing & frendlie to euerie man, and by that means so well (as no man better) beloued and trusted. For what he had once said and promised, that would he surelie keepe and performe, and thereof it came into a bie-word in the countrie where he dwelled, that if anie of them had spoken the word, which was assuredlie looked to be performed, they would saie; Dauels hath said it: as who saith, it shall be performed. For the nature of the Irishman is, that albeit he keepeth faith for the most part with no bodie, yet will he haue no man to breake with him. But Henrie Dauels, he was so carefull of his word, that if he once promised, he would not breake it for anie mans pleasure; and by that means he was so well beloued, that his verie horseboies had free passage euen through the enemies, if he were knowne to be Dauels man. And that which is more, as the writer hereof speaketh vpon occasion to trauell in that countrie thoroughout Leinster or Mounster, if he had but a horseboie of his, he should not onelie passe freele thorough the countries without impeachment, but should haue also verie good and frendlie intertainment. Among the noblemen he was greatlie esteemed, and was in great fauour with the earles of Desmond and Desmond: who although they were for the most part at farres and contentions, yet Henrie Dauels was in such fauour, as he could and did passe to and fro in the greatest matters of importance betwene them: wherein he bare so indifferent a hand, as both parties embraced him for his vprihtnesse and indifference. The earle of Desmond himselfe loued him so well, as no Englishman better; and all his brethren found such a friend of him, and such intertainment with him and especiallie sir Edmund Butler, that at all needs and in all distresses they were sure to haue him to their friend; and manie times it stood them them in good freed.

And as for the earle of Desmond, though he were a verie uncerteine and a mutable man, yet Henrie Dauels could preuaile with him; and were his furie neuer so hot, and he neuer so hattie, yet could he appease and quiet him. And as for sir John of Desmond the earles brother, such was his profession and outward affection towards him, of a most firme frendship; that it was thought to be impossible, that the loue and goodwill betwene them could by any meanes be dissolved. For in what distresse so euer sir John of Desmond was (as he was in manie) Henrie Dauels did alwaies helpe him, and at sundrie times redeemed him out of prison, yea out of the castle of Dublin, when he was committed for capital crimes, and became suertie for him in great sums of monie, and became pledge bodie for bodie for him; Dauels putte was at his commandement, his house at his deuotion, and what he had at his disposition. And so farre this goodwill grew betwene them, that John of Desmond, as one knowledging himselfe most bounden to him, did call him father; even as the other called him sonne. And now see, when treason and treacherie was entred into him, how contrarie to all faith, frendship, and humanitie, the sonne most unnaturallie bereft the father of his life, and most cruellie murdered him. Who worth to so wicked a villaine, that so bereft the prince of so faithfull a subiect, the gouernours of so trustie a seruant, the commonwealth of so good a member, of a man most dutifull to his superiours, bright in iustice, trustie in seruice, expert in the warres, faithfull vnto his frend, louing to his countrie, fauoured of all men, hurtfull to no man, of great hospitalitie to all good men, good to all men, a father vnto the distressed, and a succourer of the oppressed; finally such a rare man of his degree and calling, as few like haue bene found in that land; and yet against all pittie and mercie, most cruellie murdered by a traitor to God and his prince, even to the greife of the traitors of his owne blood. But here it falleth out that is of old said; Saue a murderer or a theefe from the gallowes, and he shall be the first that shall cut thy throte.

When this bloudie murderer had executed this crueltie vpon his good frend, he forthwith made his repaire to James Fitzmoris, and to his doctors and companie in great bzauerie, recompting vnto them that a noble act and a valiant seruice he had done in murdering of an honest, faithfull, & friendlie gentleman, saying; I haue now killed an English churle (for so maliciouslie the Irishmen terme all Englishmen) & said to his cousine James; Now thou maist be assured of me and trust me, for now that I haue begun to dip my hand in blood, I will now stand to the matter with thee to my vttermost. James Fitzmoris when he had heard him at full, although both he and his doctors, and the whole companie of the Spaniards did reioise and were glad of his death, yet James did blame and abhorre the maner of his death, blaming and reproofing him verie much, that he should murder him in his bed, being naked and scarce awaked out of his sleepe, which he said was too cruell, because he might otherwise haue had advantage vpon him either by the high waies or otherwise to his commendation. Holubett, doctor Sanders terming his bloudie murder to be a sweet sacrifice before God did both allow it, and gaue him plenarie remission of all his sinnes. The earle himselfe likewise, when he heard hereof, he was maruelouslie grieved and offended with his brother, and gaue him such sharpe speeches and reproofes, as it was thought they would not so soon haue bene frends againe; but wicked doings amongst the wicked establish and confirme them in their wickednesse. At this present time, there was with the earle (as verie often he had bene) one Appelleie an English captive, who could do verie much with him, and vpon the hearing of the death of his good friend Henrie Dauels, he began to doubt and mistrust of himselfe and of his owne assurance. Wherefore he goeth to the earle, and dissembling his griefe, persuadeth him to draw his companie together, and to remoue from thence to his house of Ashkettin, which is about fourtene miles from Limerike, and there to abide the coming of the lord iustice, and to ioint with him in this seruice against the enimie. The earle, who minded nothing lesse than so to serue, dissembled the matter, and followed this counsell, and remoued from thence to Ashkettin, where he late close and did nothing, but still seemed in speeches and outward shewes to milke with James Fitzmoris and all his companie; and yet daile his best followers and soldiers flocked and repaired to James Fitzmoris, manie of them for zeale to the popish religion, wherein they were as devout as the popes legates and the Spaniards: but manie of them knowing the earles intent, did it for feare and auoiding of his displeasure. The Spaniards, who had continued there in the fort and elsewhere, and not finding the repaire of the souldiers, nor yet any other thing answerable to that seruice as it was promised them, began to milke it; and distrustful of any good successe, did repent and were sorie, wishing themselves at home againe: but such was their case, that they could not shift for themselves to escape neither by sea nor by land; and therefore necessitie so compelling, they resolved themselves to abide the hurt.

James Fitzmoris, perceiuing their discontented minds, had conference with them, & persuaaded them to be of a good comfort, for they should verie shortly haue a greater supplie and companie which he daile looked for, and all things should be had according to their owne minds: aduertising them that in the meane time he was to take a iournie to a place of three or foure daies iournie from thence, called the holie rood or croffe in Tipperarie, and there to performe a vow which he had before made when he was in Spaine, praiering their patience. But in verie truth his intent was to trauell into Connagh and into Ulster, and in both his waies, his nearest waie was through Tipperarie, and there to flooke and draw vnto him all and so manie of the rebels as he could waie to ioint with him, whereof he made no doubt, but assured himselfe to find as manie readie to go as he willing to haue. And so taking his iournie with three or foure horsemen, and a dozen hernes, he passed through the countie of Limerike, & came into the countie of sir William Burke his verie nere cousine and kinsman, and who before in the last rebellion did ioint with him, to the great danger of his life and losse of all his goods.

And when he came so farre in his iournie, being now about three score miles from S. Marie weke, his carriage horses (which they terme garons) were so faint, and could not trauell any further: wherefore he commanded some of his men to go before, & looke what garons they first found in the fields, they should take them and bring them vnto him. And as it fell out they espyed a plow of garons plowing in the field, which they forthwith toke perforce from the poore husband men two of them, and caried them away. Wherevpon according to the custome of the countie, the hobub or the hue and crie was raised. Some of the people followed the tract, & some went to their lords house, which was sir William Burke being nere at hand to aduertise the matter, who having three or foure of his sonnes and verie tall gentlemen them in at home with him, they take their horses and a few harnes and two shot with them, and followed the tract, and overtook them at a fastness fast by the woods side, where they found James Fitzmorris, whom before they knew not to be come into, those parties, to make head to answer them. But when he saw that it was his cousin Theobald Burke and his brother and his companie, who had bene his companions in the late rebellion when sir John Perot was lord president of Mounster, he spake over unto them, and said; Cousine Theobald, who was the eldest son to his father, two carriage horses shall be no breach betwene vs two; and I hope that you which do know the cause that I have now in hand, you will take my part therein, and do as I and others will do: and so continuing some speeches, did what he could to draw him and all his companie to be partakers in this rebellion. But he answered that he and his father had already dealt too much that waite with him, and that he will neuer do the like againe: for his father, he, and all his brethren, had sware to be true, obedient, and faithfull to the quenes maiestie, and which oth they would neuer breake: cursing the date and time that euer they joined with him in so bad a cause against hir maiestie, and therefore required to haue his garrons againe, or else he would come by them aswell as he could.

James Fitzmorris standing vpon his reputation; thought it too much dishonorable vnto him to depart with that which he had in hand; and therefore vterlie denied the deliuerie, and therevpon each partie set spurre to the horses and encountered the one the other. The skirmish was verie hot and cruell, and Theobald Burke & one of his yonger brethren were slaine, & some of their men. James Fitzmorris likewise and his companie had the like successe, for he himselfe was first hurt and wounded, and then with a shot stricken thorough the head, and so was slaine, with hundrie of his companions: wherein he found that the popes blessings and warrant, his Agnus Dei; and his graines had not those vertues to save him, as an Irish saie of a bullet had to kill him. Thus was hir highnesse most happy, and that whole land most happiest, that they were deliuered from so wicked and bloudie a traitour, and that the great & benemous hydra was thus shortened of one of his heads. For other wise it was to be doubted that if he had liued, he would haue bin the cause of much bloodshed, and all the rebels in that land would haue joined with him. For he was of verie good credit & estimation throught the whole land, he was of a verie good gouernement, and of a great reach; but a deepe dissembler, passing subtil, and able to compasse anie matter which he tooke in hand, familiar to all men, and verie courteous, valiant, and verie expert in martiall affaires, but so addicted to poperie and that baggage religion, that he became a most horrible traitour to hir maiestie, and a mortall enimie to euerie good man: and so far he was imbued herein, that a man might saie that he was borne to the same end, euen to be a traitor and a rebel to God, to his prince, and to the whole commonwealth.

After that he was thus dead, and the same made knowne to the lord iustice, he gaue order that he should be hanged in the open market of Kilmallocke, & be beheaded & quartered, & the quarters to be set vpon the towne gates of Kilmallocke, for a perpetuall memorie to his reproch for his treasons and perjuries, contrarie to his soleimne oth taken in that error. His maiestie, when she was aduertised of this peece of good service of sir William Burke and the losse of his eldest sonne, she wrote hir letters of the good acceptation of his service, comforted him for the losse of his son, and in recompense did create him baron of the castell of Connell by hir letters patents dated the fourth of Maie, the twentieth yeare of hir reigne, & gaue him the yearelie pension of a hundred marks, to be paid at hir maiesties exchequer yearelie during his life, wherof he tooke so sudden toy that he sowned, and sented to be dead.

When newes of the death of James Fitzmorris was brought to the fort at S. Marie wake, great sorrow was amongst them all, they being all amazed and wist not what to do, especially the Spaniards who depart could not, and to submit themselves they would not, and yet they were of the mind to giue ouer and to intreat for a licence to depart. Which purpose they would haue followed, if that sir John of Desmond had not taken the matter in hand: for he hauing imbued himselfe so vnnaturallie in blood, and doubting the same would neuer be pardoned, did follow the matter. The lord iustice (as is afore said) immediatlie vpon the newes of the arrivall of these Spaniards, and of the death of Henrie Dauels, made his preparation of all the forces which hir maiestie had in that land, which was but foure hundred footmen and two hundred horsemen, a verie small companie for so great service towards: yet considering that the victorie consisteth not in the arme of man, nor in horse or mule, but onelie in the good gift of God; he marcheth forth in his iourne, hauing in his companie of Englishmen sir Nicholas Wagnoll knight marshall, sir Nicholas Malbie coronell of Connagh, Jaques Wingfield master of the ordinance, and Edward Fittion, Thomas O'Kerson, and others. And of the Irish lords he was accompanied with the earle of Kildare, sir Lucas Dillon chiefe baron, the vicount Mountgarret, the baron of Upper Osserie, and the baron of Dunboine, who had of themselves two hundred horsemen, besides footmen and harnes: and so they marched forward by iourneis untill they came to Kilmallocke, where not farre from the towne they all incamped: & then he sent from thence a messenger to the earle of Desmond, and so likewise to all the principall gentlemen of the best accompt in those parties, to come vnto him.

The earle in outward apperance seemed verie willing to come, but untill he had receiued some promise of fauour from the lord iustice, he still lingered and trifled the time and came not. But in the end his lordship being verie well accompanied with horsemen and footmen, he went to the campe, and presented himselfe before the lord iustice, and made a shew of all dutifullnesse, obedience, & fidelitie, where as indeed no such thing was ment. For though his bodie were there, his mind was elsewhere; for whiles he was in the campe, sundrie trecheries were practised by him; yet they were not so secretlie done but they came to light, & were discovered to the lord iustice. Wherevpon he was committed to the custodie of the knight marshall. Whiles he was in his ward, and fearing least some greater matters would be revealed against him, he praied access to the lord iustice; and then he humbled himselfe verie much, and promised and sware vpon his honour & allegiance, that he would faithfullie and to the vttermost of his power serue hir highnesse against the rebels. Whose humblenesse and promise the lord iustice by the aduise of the counsell did accept, and so enlarged him: which was in the end the vtter confusion of the earle himselfe and all his familie, and in the meane time great troubles, causes of much bloodshed, and vndwinding of all Mounster.

While the lord iustice laie thus in campe about Kilmallocke, newes was brought vnto him, that sir

John of Desmond incamped at Slew-lougher.

John of Desmond was incamped with a great companie of the rebels vpon the borders of Slew-lougher. Whereupon his lordship remoued and marched thitherwards, the earle then promising that he would in person incounter and fight hand to hand with his brother. Now when they were come to the place of seruice, the earle being best acquainted with the countrey, gaue aduise to the lord iustice, that he should diuide the armie into two parts, and the lord iustice should take one waie, and he the earle would take another waie: which aduise was followed. But because that place of the present seruice is adjoining to a great wood, and wherein were manie fastnesse, the lord iustice did diuide the rest of his companie into two other parts, and so euerie of these three companie took waie into the wood & serched it through out, but there they found no bodie. For sir John had some secret knowledge of the lord iustices comming, and so was gone before.

The daie being spent to small purpose, & the night drawne towards, he incamped that night in the same places where the rebels had lien before, & there he remained somewhat longer than he thought: because he would spend and wastt the forrage of that countrey, which was one of the chiefe places of reliefe that the enimies had. And from thence he went backe againe towards Kilmallocke, where he incamped himselfe at a place called Gibbons towne, which lieth in the plaines betwene Limerike and Kilmallocke towards Cmeleie and Harlo; & there he continued about nine weekes in continuall toiling and traouelling to and fro, in all such seruices as was daile offered to be done vpon the enimie, from which he had no rest neither day nor night. Whereupon for the better seruice he diuided his bands, and took out of the Irish companie one hundred, and deliuered them to the guiding of capteine John Herbert, a man of verie good seruice, and one other hundred to capteine Wisse.

These two capteins had made spiall vpon certeine rebels, which they would themselves in the great wood called the blacke wood, vpon whom they made a sallie, and did verie good seruice vpon them. But as they were to returne to the campe, which laie beside Cotenbre castell, the said John of Desmond, who laie in ambush for them, met and incountered them, where was a sharpe fight betwixt them, and the two capteins with the most part of their companie slaine: & John of Desmond himselfe was there hurt in the nose. The losse of those two capteins and their men was a great weakening to the lord iustice his armie; his crinites being strong and manie: and his companie weake and few, sauing at that instant the souldiers sent out of Deuon and Cornuall arrived at Waterford to the number of six hundred men, vnder the leading of capteine George Bouchier, capteine Peter Carew, capteine George Carew his brother, and capteine Dowdale, whose comming at so present a distresse was both sofall and also glad some.

And nere about this time, it was aduertised vnto the lord iustice, that John of Desmond was at Connell, which was about sixtene miles from the campe; and his lordship being well furnished & prepared, and he minding to do some peece of seruice vpon him, made verie secretlie a iourneie thither: but Desmond wanting not his god espials, had an inkling and a knowledge thereof, and so thifted himselfe awaie, whereupon the lord iustice returned to his campe. The queens maiestie and counsell, being alwaies mindfull of hir Ireland, and by reason of the newes that the enimies were daile stronger and stronger, the sent over sir John Perot late president of Poundster, with six ships well furnished and appointed, whereof he was admerall; and William Gorge master portor of the towler and a pensioner, viceadmerall: and all these arrived vnto the citie of Cozke. Whereof the lord iustice being aduertised, was verie glad, and did appoint one hundred vnto sir William Stanleie, who before was capteine of certeine hoysmen, and one other hundred he assigned vnto capteine Hind. And seeing now some good seruice towards, and to incourage certeine gentlemen to be the more willing to follow the same, called before him George Bouchier, William Stanleie, Peter Carew, and Edward Poze, and vsing vnto them verie good speeches, to incourage and persuade them to do hir maiestie god seruice in these hir affaires, and in hope they would perfoyme the same, he dubbed them knights: who accordingle did acquit themselves, and some of them with the losse of their liues ended their daies in this seruice.

And he further also for his owne part, the more he bethought himselfe of the great seruice and charge laid vpon him, the more careful he was to do what the same required: where, in his owne person he so toiled and trauelled, and so ouercame himselfe with studying, watching, labouring and traouelling, that he ouerthrew his owne health, and was no longer able to indure the same: but being overcome by sicknesse, and diuient to yeeld therevnto, was determined to haue dissolved his campe, and so to haue returned to Waterford, and there to staie for a time. But the capteins seeing the necessitie of the present seruice, persuaded him not to dissolve the armie, but to take some order herein for his highnesse seruice, and he to sequester himselfe for a time for his health. Vpon whose aduises he prepared himselfe to trauell towards Waterford, and for the continuance of the seruice did commit the gouernement to sir Nicholas Dalbie, who was then gouernour by the name of coronell of Connagh; and then by easie iourneies he came to Waterford, and there he found himselfe enerie daie more weaker than other, and in the end did distrust his owne recoverie.

And yet mindfull of his maiesties seruice, he to incourage other therein, sent & called before him William Pelham esquier, William Gorge esquier viceadmerall of the six ships, Thomas Perot sonne and heire to sir John Perot, and Patrike Welsh maior of the citie of Waterford, and gaue vnto them the order of knighthood, vsing the like persuasions as heretofore he had done vnto others in the like case. And albeit he were of a good heart and courage, yet that was no sufficient physicke to recouer his helth of bodie, but that still decayed. And douting verie much of his reconerie, he sent to Dublin to the lord chancellor, and to the ladie Thame his wife, for their speedie comming vnto him, who accordingle satisfied his request. But he inioied their companie a verie short time: for he died within two daies after their comming, being the last of September 1579, and after his death his bodie was caried vnto Dublin, where it was buried.

But here by the waie (which should before haue bene said) as he came towards Waterford through Tipperarie, the countesse of Desmond met with him, and brought with hir hir onelie sonne and heire to the earle; and being a sutor in the behalfe of hir husband, presented him to the lord iustice to be a pledge for the truth and fidelitie of the earle hir husband. For after the time that he was set at libertie in the campe nere Kilmallocke, he neuer repaired any more to the lord iustice, but stood vpon his owne keeping; notwithstanding by his letters he professed all loialtie and obedience, which he neuer meant. For in verie truth he was (notwithstanding his dissimbling) a verie ranke traitor, as in open fact and action did verie Hostie appeare, to his owne deserued confusion.

But to returne to sir Nicholas Malbie, who immediately vpon the departure of sir William Daurie vnto Waterford, according to the office & charge laid vpon him, he set in hand forthwith to followe and performe the same. For he was able to do it being of great experience in martiall affaires, hauing bene seruitor that waite vnder sundrie kings, & in strange nations; as also was verie wise, lerned, and of great knowledge in matters of policie, hauing bene a student in good letters, and a great trauelier in sundrie nations, and therein did obserue the maner of the seuerall governments in euerie such place as where he travelled. He had vnder him in the whole an hundred and fiftie horsemen, and nine hundred footmen, to command; and diuiding them according to the seruice then in hand, he sent sir George Bourchier, capitaine then in hand, he sent sir George Bourchier, capitaine Dowdall, and capitaine Sentleger, vnto Kilmallocke with three hundred footmen, and with fiftie horsemen, there to lie in garrison, and a speciall place met for the same, & which the enimie most speciallie coveted to possesse. But the more his care was that waite, the like was their diligence, vigilancie, & care of the other waite to keepe the same. Then with the residue of the companie he marched himselfe to the citie of Limericke, where he staid and remained for a time to refresh his souldiours.

During his abode and being there, it was thought good by him and his capitaine, to send vnto the earle of Desmond for his repaire vnto him, and to haue conference with him, to vnderstand his bent and aduise for his maiesties seruice against the enimies. The earle hauing receiued the gouernours letters, gaue verie good wordes, & promised much, but performed nothing. Wherefore he was againe and againe sent for from time to time, but he came not, but laie still at his house of Asketten, which is about fourtene miles from Limericke. For albeit as yet he was not in ante actual rebellion, yet it was not vnknowne but that he was secretlie combined with his two brethren, which as open traitors were in open rebellion and in armes against his maiestie. Which the earle, suspecting the same might be laid vnto his charge, would not aduenture himselfe to come in person to the gouernor; but still sed him with faire wordes and frivolous answers. Wherefore the gouernor thought good to spend no more time in vaine to looke for him, but left Limericke, and went into the fields, where he incamped himselfe, and so set forthwards to doe some seruice vpon the enimie, hauing then in his companie sir hundred footmen vnder the ensignes of sir William Stanleie, capitaine George Carew, capitaine Fisher, capitaine Furse, capitaine Piers, & capitaine Wind; and he himselfe and capitaine Apellie reserved one hundred horsemen betwene them. Now being aduertised that a great companie of the rebels were incamped in Connello vnder their capitaine John of Desmond, he marched towards them. And being come nere to an abbete or monastrie called Donaster Peunagh, seven miles from Limericke, there appeared a great companie in a plaine field both of horsemen and footmen, in estimation two thousand or thereabouts, marching in battell arate, and had cast out their wings of shot, and placed euerie thing verie well and orderlie.

When the gouernor perceiued and beheld this, being verie glad that some peece of seruice was towards, he likewise confereth with his capitaine, and by their aduises setteth his companie in like good order, and brought them into a quadzant proportion, setting out his flankers in severall places according to the seruices, & appointed verie good leaders for the same; but his carriages he placed in the reereward, with shot sufficient for their safeguard. Now when all things were thus ordered, he marched forthwards to the enimies. John of Desmond, when he saw that he must fight or flie, and that bzags would not beare out the matter, by the counsell of doctor Allen, who had the holie ghost at commandement, to giue them the victorie, caused the popes banner to be displayed; and then marching forthwards in verie good order, he took a plaine ditch in the open field; and minding to abide the fight, disposeth his horsemen, footmen, Calonglasses, and his shot for his best strength and advantage.

The gouernor setteth on wards, & giueth the onset vpon them with his shot, who valiantlie resisted the first & second volles, & answered the fight verie well, euen to the couching of the pikes, that the matter stood verie doubtfull. But the Englishmen so fiercely & desperatlie set vpon them afresh with the third volle, that they were discomfited and had the ouerthrow giuen them, and fled. John of Desmond, as a worthy Perres, who (as the historiographers write of him) was Primus in fuga, postremus in bello, sat vpon his horse all this while and gaue the looking: who sooner turned first, he was the first that was gone: for he put spur to the horse & fled awaie as fast as he could, shewing a faire paire of heeles, which was better to him than two paire of hands. In this fight were manie slaine, of which doctor Allen was one, and three score others of good account. And in the chafe, there were slaine and hurt, which died Hostie after, about two hundred men. This doctor Allen was an Irish man borne, and the chiefest cause of this fight. For he trusting to the Spaniards, whom he knew to be verie skillfull, and also dreaming the victorie by his incantments to be at his commandement, encouraged John of Desmond forthwards: and in the campe in the waite of god spied would needs saie masse, and as the prophets of Baal in the time of king Achab, he offered to his God Pazim, and cried out for his aid, but none would come; for his God was asleepe and could not heare. Notwithstanding, he stood so much vpon the credit of his offerings and sacrifices, that he assured them of a victorie, and that he himselfe would be the first that should that day giue the first blow; but whether he so did or not, there was he slaine: where he had the iust reward of a traitor, who most wickedlie and disloyallie forsoke the dutie and allegiance, which by the word of God he did owe vnto his highnesse, and deuoted himselfe a professed Jesuit to the Romish antichrist, and an open traitor vnto his lawfull prince. The earle of Desmond himselfe was not present in this fight, but he and the dissembling baron of Lerne stood in the view & sight of it, vpon a little hill in a wood about a quarter of a mile from thence: but the whole companies were there, and had part of the breakesake.

This baron of Lerne was eldest sonne, named Patrick, was seruant to his maiestie and squire, and serued in the court; but had leaue of his maiestie to come into Ireland to see his father: but he was no sooner come, and entred into his fathers house and home, but he forsoke his faith and oth to his highnesse, and became a wicked rebel, and most traitorouslie bare armes against his lord, and so continued a ranke traitor to the verie end. Wherein appeareth the nature of himselfe, and of the breed of that cursed generation, among whom there is neither faith, nor truth. And therefore they maie be verie well resembled to an ape, which (as the common proverbe is) an ape is but an ape, albeit he be clothed in purple and beluet: euen so this wicked imps. For notwithstanding he was trained vp in the court of England, squire seruant vnto his maiestie, in good fauour and countenance in the court, and appareled led according to his degree, and dailie nurtured and brought up in all civillitie: he was no sooner come home, but a waite with his English attires, and on with his bzoogs, his shirt, and other Irish rags, being become as verie a traistor as the veriest knave of them all, & so for the most part they are all, as dailie experience teacheth, dissemble they neuer so much to the contrarie. For like as Jupiters cat, let hir be transformed to neuer so faire a ladie, and let hir be neuer so well attired and accompanied with the best ladies, let hir be neuer so well esteemed and honored: yet if the mouse come once in hir sight, she will be a cat and shew hir kind: but to the hystorie.

When the battell was ended, & the retreat sounded, the gouernor incamiped himselfe fast by the river side of the monasterie aforesaid, and there late that night. About midnight, when all things were quiet, & euerie man was at his rest: euen then the often named earle of Desmond sendeth a messenger with letters of congratulation vnto the gouernor, bearing him in hand that he was verie glad and toisfull of his god successe and victorie: and like an hypocrite pretending verie good will to hir maiestie, gaue him aduise that for the auoiding of hir great charges, he should dislodge himselfe from that place; which as he thought was not best for an armie to lie in. The gouernor answered his letters with the like, and requested him to come vnto him, that they might haue conference together, and soine in this hir maiesties seruice, and wherein he would be glad to follow his aduise in anie thing that might further hir highnesse seruice: but to withdraue himselfe and his companie from thence, vnlesse he could giue him a good reason, he would not yeld to his motion, nor take his warrant for anie warrantie. And therefore he remained thenselforth in the same place thre or foure daies, expecting still the earles comming: but he so little meant anie such thing, that henselforth he became a rebell in open action, and in armes against the gouernor, finding nothing in the earle but dissembling, and to vse delaies and faire speeches to gaine time to serue his turne, removed from thence to a towne of the earles named Keshell, and there incamiped himselfe. They were no sooner settled, but the scoutmaster, hauing bene abroad, declareth to the gouernor that he had discovered a great companie of horsemen and footmen which were within a mile of the campe, & therewith was the alarm made, & sundrie horsemen & foot according to the direction of the gouernor issued out, & met with the enemies, and skirmished with them, of whom they killed manie, and toke some prisoners.

The earle of Desmond in open rebellion.

A garison placed at Keshell.

These men, being examined, declared that the earle was now in the fields and in armes, and so had bene euer since the last ouerthrow of his brother John of Desmond; and likewise declareth the whole bent of the earle and his brother. This pcece of seruice being done, and the night drawing nere, the watch was charged, and euerie man toke his rest. But the earle and his brother minding to do some mischief, they watched, and in the dead of the night then following, taking aduantage of the time, when men were wearie and in their sleepes, came with all their companies, and meant to haue set vpon the whole campe. But they came too short and missed of their purpose: for the campe was too well warded for them to take anie aduantage. The gouernor considering the intent of the enemies was to do what they could to remove him from that place, which could not be kept but to the great damage of the enemies sundrie waies, and that the same was a verie necessarie place for a garison and a ward, whereby to stop the continuall intercourse of the enemies, which by the means of a bridge ouer that water, they had a continuall recourse to & fro that waite: he before his departure from thence did plant & place a ward in the castell adioining to the bridge, which did from that time annoy the enemies verie much: and then from thence he marched towards the earles house of Asketten, and by the waite he met with sundrie of the earles companie, and skirmished and fought with them to the losse of manie of them.

This house of Asketten is a verie strong castell, standing vpon a rocke in the verie midst of the river, and the chiefest house of the earles, wherein he had a strong ward: but he himselfe at this present time and his brother John were assembled vpon a little hill on the further side of the river, standing there vpon their whole force. The gouernor hoping of some good seruice towards, drew all his companie into the abbets house of Asketten, not far from the castell house; and there conferring with the captains what were best to be done, it was agreed and thought good, that a letter or two more should be written to the earle, and to persuade him to submission. The gouernor, who was a verie good secretarie, and could pen a letter verie excellentlie well, did draw a letter, vising manie god wordes, termes, and reasons to persuade him to conformance and obedience to hir maiestie: & that he should not be the occasion of the utter fall & end of so noble a house, which descended from Koesius the great prince of South Wales by his mother Iessa, daughter vnto the said Koesius, as Giraldus one of the same familie writeth. And herewith by the waite of a parenthesis, it doth not appeare by anie sufficient authoritie, vnlesse a sonet and a deuise of a noble man be a sufficient authoritie, that the Geraldines came out of Britanie; but perhaps out of Normandie: and the first of them placed in England had some interteinement and liuing at Windesore, and thereof was called Giraldus de Windesore: and he gaue not the armes of Richard Strangbowe earle of Chepstow, as some haue written: but as he was a gentleman of himselfe, gaue the armes incident to his owne house, which is argent a salter gules.

For certeine it is, he was and is a verie ancient gentleman, whose ancestors were planted and placed in that land by king Henrie the second, and haue euer since continued in this land in much honor, wishing, aduising, and persuading, that if there were anie feare of God, obedience to the prince, or regard of himselfe, and of his name and familie; that he would reclaime himselfe vnto dutie and obedience: and that the honor of his ancestors might not be buried in his treacheries and follies. These letters being well penned were sent vnto him. But notwithstanding the most pithie, true, and effectual reasons and arguments were sufficient to haue persuaded anie honest or reasonable man: yet was his Pharaos heart so hardened and indurated in disobedience, rebellion, and treacherie, that nothing could make him to yeld and relent: but leaving his former and wonted dissimulations, returneth the messenger with a flat deniall that he will not yeld anie further obedience to hir highnesse. And forthwith to confirme the same, he fortifieth his strongest and best houses and castels: as namelie Asketten with his chosen followers and men of best trust; the castels of Carigofille and Strangicallie with Spaniards and some Irishmen. The gouernor, vpon the receipt of the earles answer, and minding to frame his seruice accordingly; news was brought him that sir William Dzurie lord iustice was dead, who deceased at Waterford vpon the third of October 1579, which was a dolefull hearing to all good Englishmen, and a great hinderance vnto hir highnesse seruice.

This ſir William Duriſe was verie ballant, wiſe, and a gentleman of great experience, deſcended of a verie ancient and a worſhipfull houſe, being a younger brother, but the birthright excepted, nothing inferior to his elder brother ante kind of waite in the gifts of wiſedome, ballantneſſe, knowledge, and experience of matters politike or martiall. In his youth he was a page, and ſerued in the court; and as in yeares, ſo in knowledge of all courtlie ſeruites he did grow and increaſe, and became to be as gallant a courtier as none lightlie excelled him. He was verie deuout, and a follower vnto the then lord Ruſſell lord priuite ſeale, and after earle of Bedford, who gaue him good countenance and intertainment: ſo vnder him he ſerued in France at Spottrell and Bullongnais, and after the warres ended, he went to Calis, and oftentimes being there he iſſued out, and did manie good ſeruites about Cambzate and in Artois. And in the end about Burelles he was taken priſoner. Not long after he was redeemed and ransomed, and then he would needs ſerue at the ſeas, and hauing gotten a ſhip well appointed for the purpoſe, he aduentureth that ſeruite. The beginning of it was ſo hard, that in nine daies he was in a continuall ſtoyme, and in great deſpaire for euer to recover: neuertheleſſe, whom the ſwozd could not make afraid, the ſeas could not diſmaie; but was euer one and the ſame man, of a good mind and great cozage: and the ſtoyme being paſt, he followed the ſeruite which he had taken in hand, and became to be an excellent maſtimall man, and verie expert in all ſeruites at the ſeas. When the time of this his ſeruite was expired, he returned into England; attending vpon the earle of Bedford, he accompanied him in the ſeruite againſt the rebels of Deuon, at the commotion or rebellion in the third yeare of the reigne of king Edward the firſt one thouſand ſine hundred fortye and nine, and did there verie good ſeruite. After which in courſe of time, he went to ſerue at Berwick, where his valor and behauior was ſuch, that he was made prouoſt marſhall vnder the earle of Suſſer being lord lieutenant, and for his ſundrie notable good ſeruites he rewarded him with the degree of knightſhod.

Not long after that, there was a peece of neceſſarie ſeruite to be done in Scotland by the ſaid earle vpon the queenes commandement; but he was verie ſicke, and at that time he could not performe the ſame: wherefore he deputed in his place this worſhipfull knight, whome he then made generall of the armie: and with ſuch forces as were thought meete he entred into the ſeruites appointed vnto him, being accompanied with the earle of Lennox, ſir Thomas Spanners, ſir George Carew, and ſir Robert Conſtable, with ſundrie other capteins, to the number of twelue hundred ſoldiers. And his commiſſion being to ſerue at Edenborough, which then by the reaſon of the diuiſion among the noblemen, about the murdering of the earle of Spurre, he took, ſpoiled, and burned ſundrie forts and caſtles: and in the end be ſieged and took the towne and caſtell of Edenborough, and deliuered the ſame, according as he was commanded, to the uſe of the king: and ſo he returned againe to his old charge, with great praife and commendation, as in the chronicles of England and Scotland is at large recorded.

In verie ſhort time after, his maieſtie hauing good experience of the valor of this knight euerie waie, alwell for his ballantnes in martiall affaires, as for his wiſedome in ciuill gouernement, he called him and ordeined him from his office and charge at Berwick, and remoueth him into Ireland, there to be imployed in the office of a lord preſident, and ſigneth vnto him the gouernement of the whole province of ſpounſter, where he ſhall haue ſufficient matter and occaſion to uſe both the ſwozd & the law, iudgement and mercie. And hauing receiued his highnes commandement in this behalfe, he maketh his voiage & repaire into Ireland: & being now ſetled in his roome and office by the right honorable ſir Henrie Sidneie lord deputie, he acquitteth himſelfe verie well euerie waie, being as ſeuere a iudge and earneſt perſecutor of the wicked and rebellious, as a zealous defender of the dutifull and obedient, to the great good liking of his maieſtie, the terror of the wicked, the comfort of the good, and the benefit of the commonwealth. After ſome time of his triall in this office, and ſir Henrie Sidneie lord deputie being reuoked into England, he who had ſerued well in part, is called now to ſerue in all: and from a particular preſident is called to be a generall gouernor: and is in place of the departed deputie made lord iuſtice. He was no ſoner entred into the office, but forthwith the rebellion and warres of the Deſmonds began in ſpounſter vnder James Fitzmorris, and the Italians latelie come from the pope, and vnder the earle of Deſmond and his brethren, who had long breathed and looked for this time. For the paciſſing, or rather ſubduing of this wicked rebellion, he took ſuch continuall trauels and troubles, & ſo bzured his bodie, that being not able to hold out any longer, he fell ſicke & died (as is beforeſaid) in the citie of Waterford, and from thence his corps was remoued to Dublin, and there buried; his bodie reſting in peace, his ſoule in euerlaſting bliſſe, and his fame in this world for euer immortall.

Sir Nicholas Malbie, who was cheefe gouernor of ſpounſter, now that his commiſſion by the death of ſir William Duriſe was expired and ended, gaue ouer to followe ante actuall warres or ciuill adminiſtration in ſpounſter; but remoued himſelfe and the whole campe vnto Lougher, and there diſperſed them abrode in towne and villages to lie in gariſon, and vpon their owne garbs, vntill it were knowne who ſhould haue the ſwozd, and be the principall officer. Amongeſt the capteins thus diſperſed into ſeueral places, ſir William Stanleie, and capteine George Carew were assigned to lie at Adare. The traitors & rebels, hearing of the death of the worſhipfull knight, of whoſe prouweſſe and ballantneſſe by the ſwozd, & of whoſe wiſedome & brightnes in gouernement, they had good triall; yet not abiding to be alienated from their old leauened and wicked vſage, they were not a little glad that he was dead, euen as the other were moſt ſorrowfull for the loſſe & lacke of him. Wherefore now they pull by their ſpirits, & confer together how they may in this inter-reigne win the ſpurs, and be bitterlie deliuered from the Engliſh gouernement. Wherefore it is agreed among them, that vpon euery ſeueral gariſon of the moſt principall capteins, they would ſet ſeuerall companies to watch & keepe them in their holds, that they ſhould not iſſue out, but to their perill. Some therefore are appointed at Killmalocke, ſome at Carigofſe, ſome at Aſketten, and ſome at one place, and ſome at another. And at Adare, where theſe two gentlemen ſir William Stanleie & George Carew late, ſir James of Deſmond brother to the earle with foure hundred Irish and ſittie horſes was appointed to ſerue and watch; which he did ſo carefullie & narrowly, that none durſt to peepe nor looke out but in danger of ſome perill. But when bitells waied ſhort within doores, the ſouldiers, who could not would be pined, gaue the aduenture to fetch that which was without doores: and as want of bitells did increaſe, ſo did their illdings out vpon the enemies grow and increaſe. And ſo often were their ſallies and incountings with the enemies, that in the end they finding & feeling the con-rage of the Englishmen, they had alwaies the worst side; and at euerie bickering euer lost some of the company. Whereupon they raised their siege, gaue place to the garrisons, and returned to the earle of Desmond. For albeit as yet they wanted a general gouernor to rule aboue all, yet the captens were not to seeke, nor yet failed to do the seruice which vnto them did apperteyne, either for seruice or safetie. And among all the rest sir William Stanleie and capteine George Carew (as is before said) lieng in garrison at Adare, and vpon an occasion minding to do a peece of seruice, verie earlie, and before the breake of the daie, they toke a bote or a cote trough, which could not hold aboue eight or ten persons at a time, and passed ouer their soldiors vnto the other side of the riuier, which lieth betwene Adare and the Berrie, minding to haue burned & wasted all the lands and countrie belonging & apperteyning to the knight of the balliete, who then was in actuall rebellion against hir maiestie, with the earle of Desmond and his brethren, where they then laie at a castell named Ballilloghan, the chiefest & strongest place which the enimie had in that place and countrie, and this was furnished with a strong ward of the Spaniards. After that these two capteins had burned and spoiled the countrie, and put to the sword whomsoever they thought good: in their returne before they could recover the riuier, sir James of Desmond, the knight of the balliete, and the foresaid Spaniards with all their forces, to the number of foure hundred footmen and thirtie horsemen, gaue the charge vpon these two enignes verie fiercelie, they hauing not in their companie aboue sir score persons to the vttermost. These two capteins answered the charge, and most valiantly skirmished with them at the push of the pike without intermission aboue eight hours, and killed of them aboue fiftie shot and hernes; and sir James himselfe with others greuouslie hurt and wounded, without the losse of anie one of their owne men, sauing sundrie were shrewdly hurt and wounded. At length these two capteins recovered their bote, and caused all the souldiors to be transported; they themselves being the verie last that passed ouer, and the enimies doubting of the safetie, stood afterwards vpon a better force.

The lords of the counsell at Dublin in the meane time, considering the distressed state of the whole land for want of a principall officer, did assemble themselves, and toke aduise for the choise of some one wise man, meet and fit for the gouernement. And in the end they resolved vpon sir William Delham, whom they chose to be lord iustice. And vpon fundate being the eleuenth of October 1579, he receiued the sword and toke his oth in Christs church of Dublin: there being present the lord chancelor, the archbishop of Dublin, the earles of Desmond and Kildare, and the whole counsell: besides a great number of barons, knights, and gentlemen. The sermon being ended, he returned to the castell, before whome sir Nicholas Bagnoll knight, marshall of Ireland, by his office did beare the sword before him, & the whole companie there did attend him: being come to the castell, he was receiued with the shot of all the great artillerie. As soone as he was entered into the chamber of presence, and the sword there deliuered, he called the lord chancelor before him: and in consideration of his good seruices in causes of counsell, and of his maiesties good acceptation of the same, he rewarded & honoured him with the degree of knighthood, by the name of sir William Gerard.

Likewise, he called Edward Fitton the sonne and heire of sir Edward Fitton, late treasurer of Ireland, and dubbed him knight. After dinner the counsell sat, consulting vpon causes of the estate:

and for quieting of the realme, letters were sent vnto all the noblemen and gentlemen of arie countenance and calling, perswading them to the continuance of their loialties and dutifull obedience. And for the gouernement of the prouince of Mounster, in absence of the lord iustice, a patent was sealed and deliuered to the earle of Desmond: who hauing the keeping and custodie of the young lord Gerald some and heire to the erle of Desmond, was by a warrant willed to deliuer him to capteine Hacketworth, and he to bring or conueie him to the castell of Dublin. Likewise, a warrant vnder the brode seale was sent to sir Warham Denteleger, to be knight or pfect marshall of all Mounster. These and other things done concerning the keeping of the English pale in quiet: the lord iustice, who had a speciall cie to the troublesome state of Mounster, prepareth to make presentlie a tourne into Mounster. But first it was concluded and agreed, that the lord chancelor should passe ouer into England, with letters of aduertisement to hir maiestie and counsell of the present state of Ireland, and of his lordships tourne toward, against the rebels: who had also in commission to vtter by speech what was to be aduertised & answered vpon hir maiesties demands and counsels. When all things were prepared for his tourne, he appointed the erle of Kildare to defend the borders northwards and his lordship marched southward toward Mounster, taking with him the three bands lately come from Berwik, vnder the leading of capteine Malher, capteine Case, and capteine Plkeman: with so manie others as he thought meet and necessarie for that seruice. And when he came in his waie to Kilkennie, being the nineteenth of October, there he remained two daies and kept sessions, whereat he sat in person, and determined manie matters, and did cause Edmund Mac Pella a notable traitor, & sundrie other malefactors, to be executed to death: and also he made a peace and reconciliation betwene the earle of Desmond and sir Barnabie Fitzpatrick, baron of vpper Ossorie: betwixt whome was a most tall hatred. And bonds were taken betwene them for restoring ech one to the other the prizes, which either of their men had taken. During his abode and being in Kilkennie, the earle gaue his lordship verie honourable and good intertainment.

From this towne he departed the two and twentieth of October, and by fournes he came to Cashell, where the earle of Desmond with a band of two hundred and thirtie men came and met him. And here the lord iustice sent his letters of the foure and twentieth of October to the earle of Desmond, for his repaire vnto him, for the appeasing of the quarrell and controuersie betwene him & sir Nicholas Malbie, referring vnto him to come either to Cashell or to Limerike. And from this towne he rode to Limerike, and about a mile before he came to the citie, sir Nicholas Malbie and sundrie other capteins & gentlemen met his lordship; and for his welcome gaue him a braue volie of shot: and so brought him to the citie, where the maior in all dutifull manner receiued him, and presented him with a thousand well weaponed and appointed men of the same citie. The next daie he departed thence, and went to a towne named Fanings, where sir Nicholas Malbie presented vnto his lordship a letter, which he receiued from Mlike Burke: the same being the letter of doctor Sanders sent vnto the said Mlike, and with most pestilent reasons perswading him to rebellion. And to this towne came the countesse of Desmond from hir husband, with letters of hir husband to the lord iustice, in excusing his not comming vnto him.

I First, that he should deliuer vnto the said lord iustice, doctor Sanders, and certeinne strangers of diuerse nations, now remaining in the said earles countries, and maintained by such traitors and in such castles, as be at his deuotion and commandement.

That he shall deliuer vp into his maiesties hands one of his castles of Carigofosse or Asketten, for the pledge of his good behauiour: which vpon sundrie and diuerse reasons is suspicious, and he for his dissolatie greatlie suspected.

That he doe forthwith come and simplie submit himselfe vnto his maiestie, and to referre his cause to the iudgement of his maiestie and counsell in England, or vnto him the lord iustice and counsell in Ireland.

That he doe forthwith repaire to the lord iustice, and ioine with his lordship with all his forces, to prosecute his brethren and other traitors, and to assist and aid the earle of Desmond, lord generall in this seruice.

Which conditions if he will hold, then he shall be reputed as a nobleman, and be receiued into fauour notwithstanding his errors past: but if he refuse, that then let him know, that immediatlie by open proclamation he shall be published a traitor.

The earle of Desmond, according to the order, went to the said Desmond, and deliuered vnto him both the letters and the said articles, and required his resolution and answer. Which when he had ouer read and considered, he returned his answer by a letter dated at Cogh the thirtieth of October 1579, vsing therein nothing but triflings and delays, requiring restitution for old wrongs and injuries, and iustifying himselfe to be a good subiect, though he doe not peld to the foresaid articles. During the time of this parley, the lord iustice was removed to Crome, where he expected the returne of the earle of Desmond and to that place sir William Stanleie & capteine George Carew came vnto his lordship with their two hundred footmen.

The earle of Desmond being returned, & hauing little preuailed with Desmond, notwithstanding his sundrie persuasions, there were other letters sent vnto him to induce him to the consideration of himselfe and his estate: but when no reason, no persuasion, nor counsell could preuaile; then it was thought good by the lord iustice & counsell to proceed to their former determination, and to proclame him a traitor. The lord iustice removed from Crome to Rathkill, and he was no longer incamped, but alarm by the traitors was raised: which was answered forthwith by the lord iustice and the earle of Desmond: & in that skirmish thre or foure of the traitors were slaine, of which the earle of Desmonds butler was one, the earle himselfe being then incamped within a mile of his brothers: and notwithstanding his iustification to be a good subiect, he daile accompanied and conferred with them. The lord iustice seeing that neither counsell nor delaye of time could auaille with the earle of Desmond, then by the generall consent of the nobilitie, the counsell, gentlemen, and the whole armie, a proclamation was openlie published against the said earle and all his confederats, in the highest degree of treason at Rathkill the second of Nouember 1579. The effect of which treasons and proclamation was as here vnder followeth.

The earle of Desmonds treasons articulated.

That the erle of Desmond hath praactised most vnnaturallic the subuersion of the whole state.

2 That he practised to bring in strangers, and praactised with foren princes to bring and allure in strangers to invade this land.

3 That he fostered and maintained doctor Sanders, James Fitzmorris, and others beyond the seas to worke these feats.

4 That albeit to the utter shew of the world, he seemed at the first to dislike with them at their landing: yet were they secretlie interteined by the said earles permission, throughout all his countie of palantine in Kerrie.

5 That when his brethren most traitorously had murdered Henrie Dauels and others at Traleigh, he did let his said brethren slip, without reproofing or blaming of them, and had also commended speciallie the daughter of Edmund Duffe an Englishman, who at the said murdering laie in the next bed vnto Dauels.

6 That when the strangers at Smertweeke had no waie to escape by sea, at the coming of sir William Durye, he gaue place vnto them for their escape by land, and gaue his tenants and followers libertie, to aid, helpe, and mainteine them.

7 That contrarie to the commandement giuen vnto him, by the lord iustice, he returned into Kerrie, and caused the strangers to leaue the fort, and to repaire to the towne of the Dingle and to other places which were at his deuotion, & had there interteinements.

8 That he distributed the ordinances and artillery of the forts vnto the rebels, as doth appeere by a note found in the port mantien of doctor Allen lately slaine in the encounter executed by sir Nicholas Malbie.

9 That he hath set at libertie such strangers as he kept colourable as prisoners, and hath appointed them to gard his houses and castles.

10 That he hanged most abhominable Richard Cusface, Simon Bytan, and others the quenes subjects, for whome he undertooke to the late lord iustice to be safelie brought vnto him.

11 That he sent sundrie of his principall men, seruitors, and followers, and his household seruants, as also his chiefe capteins, which vnder the popes banner displayed most traitorously in the fields, did assaulte sir Nicholas Malbie knight his maiesties lieutenant of all Mounster, at Mounster Cuagh, and which banner Nicholas Williams the earles butler did that daie carie.

12 That he hath vtterlie refused manie persuasions, friendlie counsels, sundrie messages, and all the good means used and wrought to reduce and to bring him to obedience.

13 That he hath not onelie refused to deliuer by doctor Sanders and the Spaniards, which doe daile accompanie him; but hath broken downe his castles, burned his townes, and desolated his countries aforehand, to the intent his maiesties forces and subiects shall not be succoured nor refreshed.

14 That he daile looketh for a further aid and a new supplie of foreners, & daile solliciteth the chiefe men of the Irish countries to ioine with him in this his most erecreable and rebellious enterprize.

15 That he openlie protested & sent a message to the lord iustice that he would disturbe the whole state of Ireland. Wherefore they did pronounce, proclame, and publish him to be a most notorious, detestable, and execrable traitor, and all his adherents, against his maiesties crowne and dignitie, unlesse within twentie daies after this proclamation he did come in, and submit himselfe. Unto which proclamation there subscribed the earle of Desmond, the baron of Dunboine, the bishop of Waterford, the vicount Mountgarret, sir Nicholas Spalbie, sir Edmund Butler, Edward Waterhouse, Theobald Butler, Edward Butler, and Piers Butler.

The proclamation against Desmond is sent to all the cities in Ireland.

This proclamation was forthwith sent and dispersed to Dublin, Waterford, Corke, Limericke, and other principall towne to be in like order proclaimed. Immediately and within an houre after this proclamation, the countesse of Desmond came to the campe; but the campe was before dislodged from the towne, and all his countrie forthwith consumed with fire, and nothing was spared which fire & sword could consume. From this place the lord iustice removed to People Brian, whereupon the third of November he took a generall muster of the whole armie: and then he deliuered to the earle of Desmond two hundred and fiftie horsemen, and also eight ensignes of footmen, of the which companie George Bourchier went to Kilmallocke, and sir William Stanleie and capteine George Carew to Abare. And then he removed and took his iourne into Limericke, being accompanied with the earle of Desmond, who the next daie left the lord iustice and returned to his charge. After which departure of the lord iustice, the proclaimed traitor of Desmond and his brothers, not able any longer to shew his treacheries, went with all his forces to the towne of Poughall, where against his comming the gates of the towne were shut, but yet it was thought but colourable: for verie shortly after, without deniall or resistance, the earle and all his troope of rebels entered the towne and took it, and there remained about five daies, rifling and carieng a waie the goods and household stuffe to the castell of Strangicallie and Liffinen, the which then were kept by the Spaniards.

A barke well appointed at Waterford is sent to Poughall.

The ordinarces recovered from the rebels.

White, capteine of the barke is slain.

The earle of Desmond maketh a rode into Connill, & killeth a number of the rebels.

The earle of Desmond, as soon as he was aduertised hereof, he caused a barke well appointed to be dispatched from Waterford, & to come to Poughall: the capteine of which barke was named White, a man of that countrie birth, verie valiant and of a stout stomach. As soon as he was come to the walls of the towne, and had anchored his ship, he recovered from the rebels certaine ordinarces of the said towne; and being put to understand that the seneschall of Imokellie was comming towards the towne, he set all his men on land; and setting his men in good order, he entered into the towne at the watergate, and marched in good order through the towne, till he came where the rebels were together, and then more rashly than consideratie, gaue the charge and onfet upon them: but the number of them being great, and his but a handfull to them, he was in verie short time inclosed and overlaid, and there slaine, and with much adoe did a few of his companie recover their ship againe. The lord generall and gouernour in the meane time, not slackning his businesse, did assemble and muster all his companie, & being accompanied with sir George Bourchier, sir William Stanleie, capteine Dowdall, capteine Furle, and others, made a iourne into Connill, which was then the cheefest place of trust that the earle had, both for safetie and strength, and for bittels and forage, and there his greatest force and strength of his souldiours were seized in the towne and villages. And they then little thinking and lesse looking for any such guests, were vnawares and vpon a sudden intrapped and taken napping, and the most part of them taken and slaine, and the villages for the most part burned and spoiled. The earle of Desmond at this present time was there, but not knowing in his castell called the New castell, and escaped verie narrowly. This peece of seruice being done, the lord gouernour marched towards Spac Willies countrie, and being to go through a certeine passe, he met with the seneschall, vpon whom he gaue the charge, who answered the same verie valiantly, and the skirmish was verie hot, in which the seneschalls brothers and sundrie of his men were slaine; and the like also befell vpon the lord gouernours men, though not so manie, amongst whom capteine Zouche's trumpet was one; which so grieved the lord generall, that he commanded all the houses, townes, and villages in that countrie and about Liffinen, which in ante waie did belong to the earle of Desmond, or of any of his friends and followers, to be burned and spoiled.

The earle of Desmond is taken.

From this he took his iourne towards Corke, and in his waie at Munfening he took a peece of one thousand five hundred kine or cowes, which were all byuen and sent into Corke, at which citie as soon as his lordship was come, and had rested a small time, then by the aduise of the captains he diuided and bestowed his companie into sundrie garrisons and places conuenient, as which might best answer the seruices. And his lordship being accompanied with capteine Dowdall and capteine Furle, he went to Castell, and by the waie he took the maiour of Poughall, whom forthwith he examined, and for his treasons and treacheries, in that he would yeelde by the towne into Desmond, and had before refused a band of Englishmen, which was appointed to lie in garrison in that towne, for the defense thereof, and had promised that he would keepe and defend the same against all men; he carried him along with him into Poughall, and there before his owne doore hanged him. The lord gouernour when he came into the towne, found it all desolate, rifled and spoiled, and no one man, woman or child therein, saving one sister, whom he spared, because he had fetched the corpes of Henrie Dauels from Traleigh, and had carted it to Waterford, where it was buried in the chancel of the cathedrall church. And his lordship much pittie the desolate estate of the towne, did take order for the rebuilding of the walls and gates, and placed therein a garrison of three hundred footmen vnder capteine Morgan and capteine Piers, who did verie good seruice in the countrie, and by good means drew home the people and old inhabitants, and impleopled the towne againe. And the lord gouernour departed thence, and followed his seruice, as time, place, and oportunitie did serue; and taking aduise with the captains for some speciall seruice, and remembering that the Spaniards had hitherto lien in rest and quietnesse, in garrison at Strangicallie, and hitherto nothing done or said unto them; it was agreed betwene his lordship and the captains, to do some seruice vpon them, and to trie their valour: whereupon they marched thither and laid siege thereto.

The Spaniards, who kept all waies good watch, and had also verie good espials abroad, they were forthwith aduertised that a companie of souldiers were drawing and marching towards the said castell, and when they themselves saw it to be true, and had discovered them, they began to distrust themselves, and to doubt of their abilitie how to withstand them. Wherefore abandoning & forsaking the castell, they passed over the water, thinking to recover the woods and

and so to escape that present danger. But sir William Stanleie, capteine Zouch, capteine Dowdall, capteine Piers, capteine Roberts, and all their companies did so egerlie follow and pursue them, that in the end they overtake them, and slue all oꝝ the most part of them, and so take the castell, wherein the lord governour placed a ward. Likewise when he laie at Adare, and understanding that the erle of Desmond was abrode, the garrison minding to do some service upon him, they issued out. Whereof he hauing some intelligence, notwithstanding his companie was but small in comparison of the others: yet he laie in an ambush to meet them in their returne; and upon an aduantage he gaue the onset upon them, and gaue a verie hot charge, in which the souldiers of the garrison were so hardlie assailed, that they brake the most part of their pikes, and were enforced with their swords and with the stumps of their staves to stand to their defenses; which they did so valiantlie, that the earle in the end with the losse of his men was driuen to giue ouer and to flee.

The like seruice did sir Henrie Mallop, who then laie at Limerike, sir George Bourchier, capteine Dowdall, capteine Holingworth, and all the residue of the capteins in their seuerall charges and garrisons, who though of themselves they were verie forward; yet the lord governour neuer slept his time, but was alwaies in readinesse, being the first with the foremost, and the last with the hindermost. In the moneth of August 1580, he remoued and dislodged himselfe from Adare, and marched to Botenaut a house of the lord Barries, where a peece of seruice was appointed them to be done: but suddenlie such a sickness came among the souldiers which toke them in the head, that at one instant there were aboute thre hundred of them sicke, and for thre daies they laie as dead stockes, looking still when they should die, but yet such was the good will of God, that few died; for they all recovered. This sickness was not long after came into England, & was called the gentle correction. Now the companie being thus recovered, his lordship minding to follow a peece of seruice, diuided his companie into two parts, the one he toke himselfe, and toke the waie by the Island; & the other he appointed to go directlie vnto Traligh, and there they met and diuided their companies into thre parts, & so marched to Dingle a cuss. And as they went they drave the whole countrie before them vnto the Wentrice, & by that means they preyed and toke all the castell in the countrie to the number of eight thousand kine, besides horses, garçons, sheepe, and gotes, and all such people as they met they did with out mercie put to the sword. By these means the whole countrie hauing no cattell nor kine left, they were driuen to such extremities, that for want of vittels they were either to die and perish for famine, or to die vnder the sword. Neuertheless, manie of them vnderstanding that sir William Winter vice-admirall of England was newlie arrived with the quenes ships at the Wentrice, and that he had receiued a commission to vse marshall law, they made their repaire vnto him, and obtained protections vnder him. Which the souldiers did verie much mislike, the same to be somewhat preiudiciall to his maiesties seruice: because they perswaded themselves, that if they had followed the course which they began, they should either haue taken or slaine them all.

Sir William, vice-admirall of England, vpon the newes reported to his maiestie that a new supplie was prepared to come into Ireland from out of Spaine, was commanded to keepe the seas and to attend their comming, and as occasion serued to do his best seruice vpon them. Who when he had so done certaine moneths, his vittels wared scant; and seeing no such matter, and also that the winter was drawing on wards, thinking nothing lesse than that the Spaniards would so late in the yeare arrive thither, he hoised his sailes and returned into England. But he was mistaken & deceived: for not long after they came and landed at Smerwicke, as hereafter shall be at full declared. And now leauing the souldiers in their garrisons, let vs returne to the lord iustice, who when he departed from Limerike the first of Nouember 1579, being accompanied with the Berwicke bands, he went into Thomond, where the earle and his sonne with two bad horsemen met his lordship; and from thence he travelled by iournies vnto Gallewaie, where he was verie honorable receiued. And to the end to encourage them to persist and continue in dutifull obedience, he confirmed vnto the corporation certaine branches and articles, whereof some before this were granted vnto them in the time of sir Henrie lord deputie, and some now newlie set downe and granted, which in effect were these as followeth.

The lord iustice with the Berwicke bands cometh into Thomond.

The lord iustice is verie honorable receiued into Gallewaie.

The charter of Gallewaie with new liberties confirmed.

First, that no writ of Sub poena shall be awarded out of the chancerie against anie inhabitant in Gallewaie, until the partie which sueth out the writ, haue put in good and sufficient suerties before the lord chancellor, or the maior of Gallewaie to prosecute the same with effect.

That no new office nor officer be erected in the towne of Gallewaie by anie deputie or gouernour, otherwise than as they in times past haue vsed to do.

That the maior by the aduise of foure aldermen, and other foure discreet men of the towne vpon good considerations may grant safe conduct and protection to English rebels and Irish enemies.

That the merchants of the towne which shall buie anie wares or merchandize of strange merchants, shall put in good and sufficient bands before the maior that he will well and trulie make payment vnto the said merchant stranger for his debt and dutie.

That if anie inhabitant in the towne do vse anie vndecent & irreuerent speech to the maior, that he shall be punished according to the qualitie of the fault and offense.

That the maior, bailiffes, and inhabitants shall enjoy, vse, and exercise all their ancient liberties, vsages, and customes.

That in all actions tried before the maior, the partie condemned shall paie reasonable costs, and the said maior shall not take anie fee for anie sentence, called Wleigethe.

That no dead bodie shall be interred or buried within the towne and walles of Gallewaie.

That when anie strange merchants come to their port and haue, that the same be serched and viewed for weapons and munitions, and that none about the number of ten persons of the said ship shall come into the said towne.

That no stranger be suffered to take the view of the strength of the towne, nor to walke on the wals.

That the maior from time to time do take the muster and view of all the able men, and of their furniture and armour.

That all vnserviceable people in time of seruice be sent out of the towne.

That sufficient vittels from time to time be prepared to serue the towne for ten moneths at the least before hand.

That a storehouse be provided alwaies in the towne for a staple of vittels to be kept there at all times.

From thence his lordship by sundrie tournies came to Athlon and so to Dublin; where about thre miles before he came to the cite, William Pors newlie arrived out of England, and accompanied with certeine gentlemen, met him with a hundred and fiftie horsemen, well furnished and well horsed with English geldings, euerie man wearing a red cote with a yellow lace, who attende his lordship into the cite, and from thence he was assigned and sent unto the pewie, where he died verie thortlie after vpon the five and twentieth of December 1579. His hart was consumed, his spleene corrupted, and his bzaire mixt with filthie matter. His bands were diuided and deliuered to either capteins. And immediatlie vpon his entrance into the cite, he sent for Jaques Wingfield master of the ordinance, and by order he was commanded as prisoner to keepe his chamber for his contempt, because he did not attend the lord iustice into pounslar as he was commanded; but vpon his submission after foure daies he was released. And vpon the death of Francis Agard esquier, sir Henrie Harrington, who had married one of his daughters and heires, was by vertue of certeine letters from out of England, appointed to be seneshall of the Obrines, as his father in law before was. The earle of Desmond and his two brethren sent a proud and an arrogant letter vnder their hands, dated the nine and twentieth of November 1579, to the lord iustice, aduertising, that they were all entered into the defense of the catholike faith, with great authoritie both from the popes holinesse and king Philip, who haue undertaken to defend and mainteine them, and therefore perswaded the lord iustice to ioine with them.

The lord iustice, hauing set the pale in some order, & hauing committed the same to the gouernment of the erle of Kildare, he made a new tourneie into pounslar, and departed out of Dublin the eightenth of Ianuarie 1579, with such companies and forces as he thought good for that seruice, and toke his tourneies along by the sea coasts; and being come to Waterford, there he kept sessions, & sat in person at the same. And from thence taking Linneterne in his waie he came to Waterford, the five and twentieth of Ianuarie 1579, by water from Ballshacke in certeine botes verie well appointed by the maiors of the cite. And before he came thither, sir William Stanleie, sir Peter Carew, and capteine George Carew, and capteine Piers, issued out of the cite with their foure bands, and nere to the thore in the view of his lordship, they presented him with a iollie skirnish, and so retired themselves, to make ward against his landing. The bulworks, gates, and curtains of the cite were beautified with ensignes and shot in warlike maner, and then all the shot of the ships in the haven, and a great ranke of chambers vpon the keie, together with the shot of the souldiers, were discharged, and gaue his lordship a lustie and a great thundering peale.

At his landing the maiors and aldermen araid in their scarlet gowones met him, and presented vnto his lordship the sword and the keies of the gates, which forthwith he redeliuered vnto them againe, and the sword the maiors bare and caried before his lordship. He went first to the church, and by the waie vpon two seuerall stages made for the purpose, there were two orations made vnto him in Latine; and at his returne from the church, he had the third in English at the doore of his lodging. And to this cite the earle of Desmond came vnto him, and they being together, letters were sent from sir William Porgan of aduertisement, that the traitors were come downe about Dungarnon and Boghall. Wherevpon one hundred horsemen vnder capteine Zouch, and Sentleger, and foure hundred footmen vnder sir William Stanleie, sir Peter Carew, capteine George Carew, & capteine Piers were dispatched to serue against them.

The lord iustice from Waterford, vpon notice of the trouble daile increasing, sent a commission of the eleuenth of Februarie, to sir Warham Sentleger to be prouost marshall, authorising him to proceed according to the course of marshall law against all offenders, as the nature of his or their offenses did merit and deserue; so that the partie offender be not able to dispend fortie shillings by the yeare in land, or annuities, or be not worth ten pounds in goods; also that vpon good causes he maie parlee and talke with anie rebell, and grant him a protection for ten daies: that he shall banish all idlers & surdie beggers: that he shall apprehend aiders of outlawes and theues, and execute all idle persons taken by night: that he shall giue in the name and names of such as shall refuse to aid and assist him: that in doing of his seruice, he shall take horse-meat and mans-meat where he list, in anie mans house for one night: that euerie gentleman and noble man do deliuer him a booke of all the names of their seruants and followers: that he shall put in execution all statutes against merchants and other penall lawes, and the same to see to be read and published in euerie church by the parson and curat of the same: and that he do euerie moneth certifie the lord iustice how manie persons, and of their offenses and qualities, that he shall execute and put to death: with sundrie other articles, which generallie are comprised in euerie commission for the marshall law.

The lord iustice, after that he had rested about thre weekes at Waterford, he remoured and went to Clonmell, where the earle of Desmond met him, being the sixteenth of Februarie 1579, and from thence he went by tourneies vnto Limerike, where the chancelor of Limerike vpon suspicion of treason was committed to prison, and his lodging being searched, manie masse booke and other popish trash, together with an instrument of the earle of Desmonds libertie palantine of Kerrie was found. He was after indicted, arraigned, and found guiltie, but in the end pardoned. And the bishop likewise was vpon some suspicion committed prisoner vnto his owne house.

And out of Limerike he marched the tenth of March to Rathkell, where within one houre the erle of Desmond came vnto him, and there consulted for the manner of the persecution of the enimie. Which when they had agreed vpon, they passed the next morning over the bidge of Adare, and by the waie they burned and spoiled the countrie, and went to Rathkell. Now when they had amended the bidge which the rebels had destroyed, and made passable, they passed over the same into Connello, where the lord iustice and the earle of Desmond diuided their companies, and as they marched they burned and destroyed the countrie, and they both that night incamped within one mile at Kilkoman. And there it was aduertised, that Nicholas Parker lieutenant vnto capteine Fenton, coming from Limerike with five horsemen, and thre shot, which were of the garison at Adare, he was set vpon at Rathkell by a hundred traitors, which did discharge fiftene or eightene shot at him, and sundrie darts, before he espied them: but he and James Fenton the capteins both ther, and Gildon, so bestirred themselves, that they gaue the enimie the repulse, and slue their leader, with five or six others, and so came safe to the campe, but with the hurt of one of their horses.

The souldiers likewise in the campe were so hot vpon the spurre, & so eger vpon the vile rebels, that that day they spared neither man, woman, nor child, but all was committed to the sword. The same daie, a souldier of the marshalls incountered with two lussie kernes, the one of them he slue, and the other he compelled to carrie his fellows head with him to the campe: which when he had done, his head also was cut off and laid by his fellows. The next daie following, being the twelfe of March, the lord iustice and the earle diuided their armie into two severall companies by two ensignes and three together, the lord iustice taking the one side, and the other taking the other side of Slewlougher, and so they searched the woods, burned the towne, and killed that daie about foure hundred men, and returned the same night with all the cattell which they found that daie.

And the said lords, being not satisfied with this daies service, they did likewise the next daie diuide themselves, spoiled and consumed the whole countrie untill it was night. And being then incamped nere together, the baron of Lerneu came to the earle of Desmond, whome the earle in the next morning brought before the lord deputie, where he in most humble maner yielded, and submitted himselfe to his lordships deuotion, promising and presenting his service with all dutifullnesse. And then, when after great trauels they had maruellouslie wasted and spoiled the countrie, they appointed to march to Carigofille, and to late siege to the same: for in it late the greatest force of the Desmonds, and which was garded and kept by the Spaniards. This castell standeth in the riuer, and at euerie full sea both it and the bannes about it are inuolued with the said floods and flowing waters. As soon as they were incamped, the lord iustice approached the castell so nere as he could, to take the view thereof, that accordinglie he might consider the most fittest places for the laying of the shot for the batterie: and then he commanded capteine George Carew to take out certeine shot, and to go with him in this service. Now the Spaniards hauing espied them, spent manie shot vpon them, and where the lord iustice verie hardlie escaped with his life, and from being slaine with a musket shot. When his lordship vpon this view had determined what he would do, he caused the canon shot to be planted in the place most fit for the batterie, for otherwise the fort was not to be assaulted.

In the same were sixtene Spaniards and fiftie others vnder one Iulio an Italian, who at the request of the countesse of Desmond undertooke the keeping of it, and who reported himselfe to be a verie notable engineer: standing vpon his reputation, he plied the campe with continuall shot, putting out an ensigne and railing with manie bad speeches against his maiestie: declaring also that they kept it for the king of Spaine and so still would, untill further aid were sent from him: and which in verie deed was daile looked for. Before the canons and other battering peeces could be vnladen, they spent the time, occupieng the one the other with such deuises as they thought good for the seruices. And the Spaniards, hauing the aduantage, did by their often shot hurt and kill some Englishmen, namely a souldier of sir George Bourchiers, one of sir Henrie Mallops, & one of capteine Zouches: and sir William Stanleie comming with his companie to the trenches to take the ward of capteine George Carew, which kept the watch that night past, was hurt with a musket shot out of the castell in the necke. As soon as the ordinance was vnladen and planted, they began forthwith to batter the fort with three canons, a culuering, and a demie culuering; and in short time they so beat it, that the house fell and filled the ditches: by meanes whereof the same became to be assaultable.

Capteine Macworth, who had the ward of that daie, entred into the utter barme by a doore that the souldiers had broken, and was master of it presently. The Spaniards therupon retired to a turret that was vpon the wall of the barbican, & some sought other places to hide and to saue themselves, but that part of the castell was beaten downe: and then capteine Macworth recovered the possession of the whole, and did put fittie to the sword, of which nineteene were found to be Spaniards; and six others he took, whereof one was a woman, which were executed in the campe. None were saued that daie but onelie the capteine Iulio, whome the lord iustice kept for certeine considerations two or three daies: but in the end he was hanged as the rest were before him. The next daie, being the first of Aprill one thousand five hundred and fourescore, the ordinances were remoued and caried to the ship, which with all such souldiers as were sicke and hurt were sent to Limerike, to be relieved and cured. This castell, one of the principallest and chiefest forts thus recovered, there resteth onelie the house and castell of Asketten: and the lord iustice, and the earle of Desmond thought nothing more necessarie, than euen forthwith to march to Asketten, and to incampe there and to besiege it, euen as they had done to this fort of Carigofille. Where when they came, the two lords diuided themselves, the one taking the one side, and the other taking the other side of the water: and vpon the third of Aprill they incamped at the said castell, the lord iustice lieng in the abbey, and the earle of Desmond vpon the further side of the riuer.

The lord iustice viewed the place, and found no waie possible to place anie watch or ward nere to the castell, by reason of the great disadvantage of the rockes which late altogether vpon the castell. While the campe laie there, sir William Stanleie, capteine George Carew, and capteine Walker went to giue siege vnto the castell of Ballisloghan, a strong house of the Desmonds, and which was guarded untill this time against his maiestie. The ward had no sooner the sight and view of these three ensignes, but that they fired the house and fled: but they were so narrowlie pursued, that the leader of them and some of his companie were overtaken and slaine. Whilest the siege laie at Asketten, sir Henrie Mallop treasurer at warres came from Limerike to the campe the fourth of Aprill 1580: and the verie same night following, being a verie darke and close night, the warders of the castell fearing the example of the execution done at Carigofille, and doubting the sequelle of the lord iustice preparation made for the batterie to be laid against it, did abandon and forsake the castell verie secretlie about midnight, leauing a traine of powder to set it on fire, which consumed & burned a great part of the same: but the principall towers remained vntouched. The warders by fauor of the darke night escaped into the woods.

This castell thus recovered, the earle of Desmond had neuer a castell in all pounster which was guarded against his maiestie: but all were now at his deuotion. The lord iustice being possessed of Asketten, he appointed a strong garrison to reside there, and placed sir Peter Carew, and sir Henrie Mallops companie in the castell; and capteine George Carew, and capteine Hollingworth to be in the abbey, and so vpon the first of Aprill he dislodged with both the rest of the armie, and went vnto Limerike: commanding the captains to cut down the woods on both sides of the riuer, that the botes might passe freely to and fro. At his coming to Limerike, all things now seeming to be at peace, the earle of Desmond returned home to Kilkennie, & certeine of the countie cell which had followed in this sournie rode to Dublin: and sir Nicholas Malbie departed into Connagh. And notwithstanding that the most part of the armie was now dispersed into garrisons: yet the seruices of euerie of them neuer abated. For alwaies as the time of seruice required, the Irishmen were issued out vpon, and most commonlie had the worst side. And the lord iustice himselfe taking an occasion to visit the ward at Adare, he passed by water, and capteine Case went by land, and after a time spent in searching the woods, they returned with a pzeie of one thousand and two hundred kine, and good verie store of sheepe, besides the slaughter of manie traitors.

At his being and during his abode in Limerike, vpon the fifteenth of Maie, he receiued hir maiesties commission vnder the broad seale of England to be lord iustice (where before he held the same by the election and order of the counsell) and therewith also one other commission, for creating of sir William Burke baron of castell Connall, with a yearelie pension of one hundred markes during his life. And from this time, the lord iustice spent this summer in Mounster, travelling to and fro through out the whole prouince: he himselfe and euerie other capteine in his severall garrison doing such seruice vpon the rebels as occasion by was offered. The lord iustice vpon the fifteenth of June, after that he had marched a few miles in Mac Aulles countrie, spoiling, defacing, and burning the same, he passed through the boggye mountaine of Slewlongher into Kerrie, and there he discovered a great pzeie of the countrie; and pursuing the same, by the vaward of his horsemen, and he himselfe in person toke about two thousand kine, besides store of sheepe and garcons, with part of the traitors masking apparell.

A mutinie among the soldiers for lacke of vittells;

Sir Cormac Mac Ceige with a peece of seruice vpon sir James of Desmond.

Sir James of Desmond in taking of a pzeie taken prisoner and executed.

The earle of Desmond, the countesse his wife, and doctor Sanders little thinking of this matter, escaped verie hardlie; and their pzeie for haile was faine to leaue his golwne behind. The like seruice he did the next daie, being the five and twentieth of June at Castelmange. But at this time, a great mutinie began amongst the soldiers vnder sir George Bouchier, capteine Macworth, and capteine Dowdall, by reason of their wants: but his lordship with such lenitie and courtesie handled the matter, that they departed from him well satisfied. Likewise sir Cormac Mac Ceige shriffe of the countie of Corke did notable seruice vpon sir James of Desmond; which sir James vpon the fourth of August made a roade into Muskroe, and toke a great pzeie from the foresaid sir Cormac. Wherevpon his brother Donnell assembleth his brothers tenants and countrie and followed the pzeie, and recovered the same: sir James, who thought it to be too great a dishonor and reproch to depart with anie thing which he had in hand, withstanding the matter.

Wherevpon they fell at hand-fight. In which conflict and fight the said Donnell behaued himselfe so valiantlie, and his companie so lustilie stucke to the matter, that the pzeie was recovered, and sir James himselfe mortallie wounded and taken prisoner, and all his force, being aboue a hundred and fiftie persons, were slaine and ouerthrowne. He that toke him was a smith, and seruant to sir Cormac, who forthwith handfasted him: and for auoiding of certeine inconveniencies, he kept him close, and secretlie hid him in a certeine bush in the fastnesse there, and bound him so fast and sure, that he could not escape nor run awaie. And when all the companie was gone, then he toke him and carried him to sir Cormac his maister, who kept him in safe custodie, vntill, by letters of commandement from the lord iustice and counsell, he did deliuer him vnto sir Mar-ham Sentleger then prouost marshall, and to capteine Raleigh; who (according to a commission in like order to them addrested) was examined, indicted, arreigned, and then vpon iudgement drawen, hanged and quartered: and his bodie being quartered, it was together with the head set on the towne gates of the citie of Corke, and made the pzeie of the foules. And thus the pestilent hydra hath lost another of his heads.

This seruice of this knight was maruellouslie well accepted, and first from the lord iustice and counsell, and then from hir maiestie he receiued verie frendlie and faithfull letters. This man was a ponger house vnto Mac Artie Keough, and they both a ponger house vnto Mac Artie Moe now earle of Clancar, and whose ancestors (as is said) were kings before the conquest of Mounster. They are all men of great power, and greatlie esteemed in those parties. But this sir Cormac, in dutie and obedience to hir maiestie and hir lawes, and for his affection to all Englishmen, surpasseth all his owne sept & familie, as also all the Irishie in thatland. For al beit a more Irish gentleman can hardly digest anie Englishman or English government, and whatsoener his outward appearance be, his inward affection is corrupt and naught, being not vnlike to Jupiters cat, whome though he had transformed into a beautifull ladie, and made hir a noble princeesse; yet when she saw the mouse, she could not forbear to snatch at him: and as the ape, though he be neuer so richlie attired in purple, yet he will still be an ape: this knight, after he did once yeld himselfe to hir maiesties obedience, and had professed his loialtie, he neuer desired to ioine himselfe vnto the companie of the Englishmen, and became in time a faithfull and frendlie man vnto them, liued according to hir maiesties lawes, and did so good seruice at all times when it was requist and required, as none of that nation did euer the like. And if at anie time he were had in suspicion, he would by some kind of seruice purge & acquitte himselfe, euen as he did in this present seruice in taking of sir James of Desmond, to his great praise & commendation, and to his acquittall against the reprochfull reports of his aduersaries. And sir William Fitzwilliams in the time of his deputiship, hauing had a verie good triall of his fidelitie, truth, and good seruice, did giue vnto him the order of knighthood, and made him shriffe of the countie of Corke: euen as the lord iustice now did commend this his seruice vnto hir maiestie by his letters of the twelue of August, a thousand five hundred and eightie, and praising that the same might be so acceptable receiued, as that the enobling of him might be both an ornament to his house, an incouraging vnto others to do the like, and a testimonie against others of his sort, who haue neglected a number of occasions (at greater aduantages) to haue done the like seruices.

The death of James of Desmond, and the quartering of his bodie did maruellouslie dismaye the earle himselfe, sir John his other brother, and doctor Sanders, and all their confederats. And by reason of the continuall persecuting of the rebels, who could haue no breath nor rest to relieue themselves, but were alwaies by one garrison or other hurt and pursued, and by reason the haruest was taken from them, their cattels in great numbers pzeied from them, and the whole countrie spoiled and pzeied; the poore people, who lined onelie vpon their labors, and fed by their milch cowes, were so distressed, that they would follow after the goods which were thus taken from them, and offer themselves, their wiues, and children, rather to be slaine by the armie, than to suffer the famine therewith they were now pinched. And this great calamitie made also a diuision betwene the earle of Desmond and his brother sir John, either of them excusing that there of they were both guiltie. The earle himselfe (without rest) fleeth from place to place, and findeth small comfort, and seeing no other remedie, sent his ladie and wife vnto the lord iustice, who in great abundance of teares bewailed the miserable estate of his husband, his selfe, and their followers, making (with most lamentable requests) sute, that his husband might be taken to submission.

Sir John of Desmond, being in the like distresse, he together with doctor Sanders gaue the aduenture, to passe for their refuge to the bicont of Baltinglasse, then being in the countie of Kildare. The garrison which laie at Kilmallocke, making an issue out by night to doe some seruice, by chance met the said John and Sanders in the darke night: and not knowing them did set vpon them, and of foure of them they take two, the one being a siter named James Haie and standardbearer to the late James Fitzmoris, who vpon his examination confessed that the earle of Desmond was author of all these warres, and the other was Sanders man, who was slaine; and the siter was released, but sir John and the doctor by the benefite of the darknesse verie hardlie escaped, & cut off from their iourneie. The lord iustice being at Newcastell, and being aduertised that the earle of Desmond and Sanders were in Kerrie, he forthwith sent for the garrisons of Adare and Alketten to come to him, and for the garrison of Kilmallocke to meet him at the place, daie, and time appointed, for a speciall peece of seruice then to be done. Whose commandement being done and obeyed, they take their waie into Kerrie, and there they had taken the earle, and his countesse, and doctor Sanders, had not a false brother betrayed the matter, and yet for haile they left their breakfast behind them halfe dressed. Neuertheless, they take two priests, the one of sixtene and the other of eigheteene kine; and the next daie they take another peece of two hundred kine, due diuerse traitors, and take two friers, whose gownes were too long for them to follow the earle and the popes muntio, they being poore bare footed friers, and he a lustie hopman: and then his lordship returned to Alketten, where he left master Parker constable of the place; and from thence he went to Limerike, where he receiued news by master Zouch, and after by letters from the lord Greie lord deputie, of his arrivall to Dublin. And then his lordship minding to make his speedy repaire to Dublin, did set the countie in some good order, and by the aduise of the counsell at Limerike, he appointed sir George Bourcher colonell of all Downster, and instructions were deliuered vnto him, both for certeine speciall seruices to be done, & also for the generall gouernement of the whole prouince; & had left vnto him the charge (vnder his gouernement) of the whole forces in Downster; which of footmen were two thousand eight hundred & twentie; and of horsemen three hundred fourescore and fiftene: the whole, three thousand two hundred and fiftene men. Likewise he had sent the like instructions to sir Warham Sentleger, and the earle of Clancar. And these & other like things done, he took his iourneie through Conangh for the like establishing of the countie, & came to Dublin the first daie of September, one thousand five hundred fourescore and one; and the next daie he deliuered by the sword to the lord Greie, as to the lord deputie of Ireland, in saint Patrikes church in presence of the conncell, noble men, and gentlemen, which were for the same purpose there assembled.

And within six daies after the lord Greie his arrivall, it was giuen his lordship to vnderstand, that the bicont of Baltinglasse, and Theon mache Hugh, the chiefe of his sex of the Obzins, were lieng in the Obzins countie, and were now of great force and strength, by meanes of the companie of capteine Fitzgiralde, kinsman to the earle of Kildare, who had a band of footmen committed vnto him in the beginning of this rebellon, for the defense of the countie of Kildare, which bordereth fast by the Obzins. And he nothing regarding now, either the dutie of a subject, or his owne credit, most traitorously reuoltereth from his lawfull prince, and conioincth himselfe with traitors and rebels. And with these he practiseth and perswadeth to resist and make head against his maiesties forces; because they could not (as he said) withstand or preuaile against them: who without anie reward promised, were easilie perswaded, because they would be perswaded, and were most willing to exercise anie maner of outrage. All these thus combined, drew one string, & incamped themselves in the fastnes of the Glinnes, about 20 miles from Dublin, where they kept all their goods & cattell. This fastnesse was by nature so strong as possible might be: for in it is a vallie or a combe lieng in the middle of the wood, of a great length, betwene two hills, & no other waie is there to passe through. Under foot it is boggie and soft, and full of great stones and asperie rocks, verie hard and enill to passe through; the sides are full of great & mightie trees vpon the sides of the hills, & full of bushes and vnderwoods.

The lord deputie, being not yet acquainted with the custome of the countie, nor with the Irish seruices, and thinking himselfe in honor to be touched, and the whole armie to be discredited, if a companie of traitors should lie so nere vnto him, and not be touched nor fought withall, resolved himselfe to haue a peece of seruice to be done vpon them. Wherefore he with all his whole armie marcheth vnto the said Glinnes, & giveth order to sir William Stanley, sir Peter Carew, sir Henrie Bagnoll, capteine Atwelle, and to John Parker, lieutenant to capteine Furze with all their footmen, and to Francis Cobble capteine of the kerrie, and George Wore an old veteran of Berwolke, colonell of all the footmen, to take this seruice vpon them. But Cobble, who had bene a long seruitor, and knew what to that kind of seruice did belong, did foresee the danger which would follow hereof, and so declared it to his companie: notwithstanding to auoid the reproches which might be laied to his charge, followed the said seruice, and vpon the next daie, being the five & twentieth of August, they entered the Glinnes.

The lord deputie being accompanied with the earle of Kildare, Jaques Mingeisfield, capteine George Carew, capteine Denie, and others on horsebacke staied vpon the mounteine side hard by the wood. The archtraitor Fitzgiralde, hauing some secret intelligence of the seruice towards, he beset with and placeth all his men with their pikes amongst the trees, and there couered themselves, vntill the Englishmen were entered and passed into the fastnesse, about halfe a mile or more, and could not easilie returne: and he hauing them at aduantage vpon euerie side of the hill, with great furie assailed them with his shot, and in verie short time did kill the most part of the vaward, both capteins and souldiours. The residue which followed, being in despair to recouer what was lost, and distrusting themselves, fled at all hands, and ran backe as fast as they could in so bad a waie. And yet such was the nimblenesse of the traitors, and their skill of seruice in such places, that they were like to haue bene killed; if the lord deputie, and the horsemen had not rescued them: upon whose coming they retired into their fastnesse.

In this conflict, George Poze, capteine Audleie, Francis Colbie, and sir Peter Carew cozonnell, were then murdered and slaughtered; which sir Peter was verie well armed, and with running in his armor, which he could not put off, he was halfe smothered, and inforced to lie downe: whome when the rebels had taken, they disarmed him, & the most part of them would haue saved him, and made request for him, they thinking that more profit would grow among them by his life than benefit by his death. Notwithstanding, one villaine most butcherlie, as soon as he was disarmed, with his sword slaughtered and killed him; who in time after was also killed. Before the entrie into this seruice, Jaques Wingfield being acquainted with this kind of bold and rash hardinesse, and foreseeing the euill successe which was feared would insue, perswadeth with his two nephues, sir Peter and capteine George Carew, to staie and to forbear to aduenture into the woods. But sir Peter could not listen thereunto, nor be perswaded; but would needs go in. His brother would haue done the like, but his vnkle perforce kept him, saying; If I lose one, yet I will keepe the other: and so by that meanes he was by Gods goodnesse saved and preferred.

This blacke date was a dolefull and a grieuous date to the lord deputie and all his companie: notwithstanding, hoping of a hard beginning would follow a better ending toke the matter as patiently as he could, and made his returne vnto Dublin, abiding the coming of the lord iustice; who as soon as he was returned, then the lord Greie was appointed, and had the sword deliuered vnto him. The earle of Desmond in this meane time, being verie desirous to do some seruice vpon the Spaniards, being nothing afraid of their force and multitude, marcheth towards the fort, and incamped at Traleigh, where the scout the same night espied a light in the enemies campe, and by reason of the darke night, the companie of them seemed to be the greater: which caused the gouernor to be more watchfull and circumspect. Wherefore in the morning, like a wise and a politike capteine, setteth all his companies in battell arae, & to marcheth forwards in his strength & verie good order ouer the strand of Traleigh towards the fort, euerie man being at a full resolution to do his best seruice that day against the enimie. When these strangers had knowledge of the approaching of the lord gouernor, and his companie, albeit their fort was verie strong, both by nature and by art; yet they distrustted themselves, and forsake the fort, and by the guiding of the Irishrie, they remoued themselves from thence to Glanmire, whome the gouernor pursued, & overtooke some of them, vpon whome he gaue the onset, and skirmished with them: diuerse of them he slue, and manie he toke, whome he caried along with him: the residue of them fled into the fastnesse of Glanmire, which is a verie strong place and couert, by reason of the great woods and of the mounteines adioining. Whereupon the date being spent, and no seruice for that time to be done anie further, the lord gouernor incamped there that night, fast to their enemies nose, to trie him what he would, or durst do.

As soon as he was incamped, he calleth the prisoners (who were taken) before him, and they confessed that they were in number, not about seven hundred men: but had brought with them pikes, caluiers, munitions, and all kinds of artillerie, sufficient for five thousand men: because they knew that the Irishmen were of bodie sufficient, but that they lacked furniture and training; & in these two things they minded to furnish them: and further also they said, that they had sent backe two of their ships into Spaine, to aduertise that they were safe: he arrived, and how that they were interteined: requesting that the supplie appointed before their coming from home, might with all speed be sent awaie, and for which they did daile loke: because it was throughly concluded betwene the pope and king Philip, to make a through conquest of all Ireland; and so consequentlie as time should serue, to do the like with England. And moreover, that they had brought with them a great masse and store of monie and treasure, which according to their commission they had deliuered to the earle of Desmond, sir John his brother, & to doctor Sanders the popes nuntio; and more is promised to be sent.

After these things thus done, it was giuen to the said gouernor to vnderstand, that the same night there were three hundred souldiours of the enemies companie returned & gone backe to the fort. Whereupon he returned also, and followed them the next morning, and came to Dingle, where he incamped as nere to the fort as he could; and there choosing to himselfe capteine Dowdall, capteine Peters, and certeine shot, he drew so nere to the fort as he had the whole discouerie and sight of the fort and companie therein, which seemed to be easie to be gotten, if he had anie shot and munitions for the same. But as neither the scholer without his booke, nor the artificer without his toles, can do anie thing in his profession: no more can the souldiour fight without his meate weapons, nor serue without his necessaries; and therefore for want of things necessarie for this batterie, the lord gouernor was obliged to returne, and to leaue the fort.

The Spaniards perceiving this, or mistrusting some other matter, made a sallie of threescore men; and the gouernor seeing their advantage, thought to follow the aduise of his captains, and not to haue dealed at all with them. But one Andrew Martin more hastie than aduised, and more rash than wise, procured a skirmish with them, in which he was slaine; and the lord gouernor compelled of force to answer the skirmish. But it was not long, but that he sounded the retract; and being not able to annoie the enimie, nor perswade at the fort, he returned backe againe, and by tourneies he came to Keshill: where he met the lord deputie, vnto whom he yielded vp all his companie, and his commission, and then made prouision of his men, and for victuals, to follow the said lord deputie. The lord deputie had now in his companie about eight hundred men, horsemen and footmen, vnder the leadings of capteine Zouch, capteine Walter Raleigh, capteine Denie, who had also capteine George Carews companie vnder his ensigne, capteine Pactonoth, capteine Achin, and others: and then he marched towards the fort where the Spaniards and Romans were settled.

Capteine Raleigh, notwithstanding that the lord deputie had raised his campe at Keshill, and was gone towards the fort, yet he taried and staied behind, minding to practise some exploit. For it was not vnknowne vnto him, that it was a manner among the Irish kerns, that whensoever anie English campe was dislodged and remoued, they would after their departures come to those camps to take what they there found to be left. Thus therefore lieng, and keeping himselfe verie close, taried and abode the coming of the said kerns; who suspecting no such trap to be laid for them, came after their manners and old vsages to the said place, and there toke their pleasure; who when they were in their fort, the captaine and his men came vpon them, and toke them all. Among them there was one, who carried and was laden with withs, which they used in stead of halters: and being demanded what he would doe with them, and whie he carried them; gaue answer, that they were to hang vpon English churles: so they call Englishmen. As it so (quoth the captaine) well, they shall now serue for an Irish kerne: and so commanded him to be hanged vpon with one of his owne withs; the residue he handled according to their desert.

The lord deputie incamped himselfe as nere the fort as he could. And at this present was sir William Winter also retorne returned from out of England: but he arrived at Kinsale, and his viceadmirall captaine Bingham came into the baye of Saint Charles weeke or smere weeke, and not long after, sir William Winter himselfe followed. And by these means the said lord deputie was so well furnished of all things necessarie, that he at land, and sir William Winter at sea besieged the fort. But before any assault giuen, he first summoned the fort; requiring of them who they were, what they had there to doe, by whom they were sent, and whie they fortified in his maiesties land, & required therewith to yeld vpon the fort. But they answered that they were sent some from the holie father, which had giuen that realme to king Philip; and some from king Philip, who was to receiue and recouer that land to the holie church of Rome, which by his maiesties means was become schismaticall, and out of the church, with other reprochfull speeches: and that therfore they were in that respect to keepe what they had, and to recouer what they yet had not. Whereupon the lord deputie sent to sir William Winter, to haue conference with him, how, in what fort, and by what waies they were to worke for the dispossessing of these strangers from their fort, and how their artillerie and munitions might be best placed and laid for the batterie; and betwene whom it was then determined how all things should be done.

Whiles they were thus in speeches, and consulting of the matter, the Spaniards thinking to take some aduantage, made a sallie vpon the Englishmen: which was forthwith answered by captaine Denie (who as then had but a dozen shot) and by Michaell Butler lieutenant to captaine Raleigh: & these so valiantlie behaued themselves, and so worke stillie followed the fight, that they made the Spaniards with more hast than with good speed to retorne againe to their fort. The same night following, sir William Winter, according to the conclusion betwene the lord deputie and him, he did cause to be unladen certeine culuerings, and like peeces of ordinance out of his maiesties ships, which then lay in the rode of smere weeke, and then there being a great banke betwene the shozes side and the fort, through which the ordinance were to be caried, they did in the same night cut through that banke, caried their ordinance through it, and mounted them in the place appointed, before the breake of the daie, and before it was open daie the batterie was ready to be giuen. A peece of seruice (the place and time considered) thought worthe great commendations. The lord deputie likewise had done the like vpon the land side, & so being on both sides in readinesse to follow the seruice, his lordship summoned them by the shot of a peece of ordinance, offering vnto them mercurie if they would yeld. But they knowing nothing what was done that night, answered as before, that they would keepe what they had, and would increase what they could get. Whereupon they began to batter the fort on both sides, both by land and by water.

This first daie of batterie was captaine Raleighs ward daie. But the Spaniards made the first bags, that they cared not for this; and to set a good face vpon it, some of them sallied out, and offered the skirmish, but verie faintlie and fearefullie: and so both vpon the first daie, the second daie, and the third daie, little was done; but onelie the continuance of the batterie. The fourth daie was captaine Roches ward daie, vnder whom was a lustie yong gentleman named John Cheeke, who drew so nere the fort, that he looked ouer the purport into it, which being seene and perceiued, one of the Spaniards leuelled a peece at him, & with his shot strake him in the head, wherewith he died. About the end of these foure daies, the trenches for the full batterie were drawne and brought so nere vnto the fort, that now they left to dallye any longer with the fort, but verie hotlie and sharpelie they battered at it on both sides. The Spaniards, who had staied themselves vpon the hope of some further supplie, to come out of their countrie, and thinking of some better aid of the erle of Desmond, & of his brethren, than yet they had receiued; and seeing also the batterie to be such as they could not be able to withstand and hold out, they desired a parley with the lord deputie, who vtterlie denied it: saying, that his seruice was against traitors and rebels, with whom no speeches nor parleys are allowed. And forsomuch as they (though strangers by birth) otherwise did confederat with them in such a traitorous action, they were in the like predicament with them. Then they requested that they might haue libertie to depart with bag & baggage, which also would not be granted. Then they requested that certeine particular men among themselves might haue their free passage, and certeine other conditions: but my lord refused both this, and all other conditions, requiring an absolute yelding, or nothing at all. When they saw that they could not preuaile any waie, then at the length they hanged out a white flag, and with one voice they all cried out Misericordia, misericordia, and offered to yeld both themselves and the fort, without any condition at all. Which thing when it was aduertised to his lordship, he sent captaine Jaques Wellingfield master of the ordinance to the fort, and to make triall whether this their offer were true and unfeigned: who when he came to the fort, he was receiued sir, and forthwith the captaine of the fort came vnto him, and in all humble maner yelded himselfe to be brought, and to be presented vnto the lord deputie: and at the commandement of the said Jaques Wellingfield he disarmed himselfe, and caused all his companie to doe the like, and to bring all the armour in the fort into one place; and there they laid their pikes across the vpon the same. Which being done, the said captaine Wellingfield came out of the fort, and brought the captaine with him, promising him safe conduct to the lord deputie. But by the waie, his lordship sent some to receiue him at his hands, and willed the said Jaques Wellingfield to retorne againe to the fort.

In this fort sir James Fitzgird knight, and lord of the Decies, was a prisoner by the order of the erle of Desmond, and one Plunket an Irishman, and one Englishman, which came and accompanied the traitors out of Spaine. The knight was set at libertie, but the other two were executed. When the captaine had yelded himselfe, and the fort appointed to be surrendered, captaine Raleigh together with captaine Macworth, who had the ward of that daie, entered into the castell, & made a great slaughter, manie of the most part of them being put to the sword. And when all things were cleere, the lord deputie came to the fort, and hauing done what pleased.

sed him, his lordshyp returned, and manie of the capteins he saued. The fort forthwith was rased, the armoz and munitions were disperfed abroad, and all things done as it pleased the lord deputie, he sent the cozonnell and campmaister ouer into England by capteine Denie, and dismissed the armie, and sent euerie capteine to his garrison. And his lordshyp went from thence to Dingham, which is a long scattering waste towne, and in it foure or five castels, which the earle of Desmond had caused to be defaced in the beginning of this rebellion.

Capteine Zouch made the gouernour of Desmond.

And here the earle of Desmond met with the lord deputie with a new supplie of his owne men, being readie to haue followed the seruice if need had so required. In this towne the lord deputie made capteine Zouch gouernour of Kerrie and Desmond, and appointed vnto him three hundred men, and accompanied him with capteine Cash, who had one hundred men, and capteine Achin, who had fiftie horsemen, and commanded these to lie in garrison in that towne, or where they thought good. And these had to them giuen all the victuals which were found in the fort. And from hence his lordshyp went to Limerike, and came thither the seauen and twentieth of November, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred & eightie. At which time there arrived out of England six new bands of soldiers, under the leading of capteine Berkleie, capteine Cruise, capteine Herd, and capteine Tanner, all which his lordshyp bestowed in severall garrisons, and in such places as were most meet for seruice; capteine Berkleie one, lie of the capteins remained in Mounster, and was placed in the house of Asketten, the chiefe castell of the earle of Desmond with two hundred men. The others went into Connagh, where the wicked sonnes of the earle of Clanricard were now vpon their keeping. For notwithstanding that the Spaniards were ouerthrowne, and thereby a sufficient warning was giuen to the rebels, to bethinke themselves, that if they did persist in their rebellions, the like would also insue vpon them: yet see how that the benemous Hydra had no sooner lost one of his heads, but in stead of one, sundrie and manie others are sprouting vp. For at the vertie instant, the barbarie brood of the earle Clanricard, the viscount of Balinglasse, associated with the Obyins, Omozes, and Keuenaghs in Leinster, & with sundrie others of that wicked nation, conspire, and are vp in open rebellion; and so now at this one instant, Mounster, Connagh, and a great pece of Leinster are in arms and actuall rebellion: onelie Ulster (which was wont to be the worst) is now the best and most quietest.

Mhalla whereof he was baron, and there (as it was said) he was taken by the Deonhours, and kept against his will for his safetie, vntill they did heare further what should be become of the earle.

This thing being aduertised to the lord deputie, he contentred that this was but a surmised and colozable kind of dealing, to bleare his lordships eyes; wherefore by order and good aduise he first willed the earle to send for his sonne, who did so. But his messenger returned with an answer, that the young lord was willing to come, but the Deonhours, who were in doubt what should be become of the earle, would in no wise suffer his sonne to depart, unless they might haue good assurance for his safe returne againe vnto them. The lord deputie not liking these kind of fond excuses and disordered dealings, sent the earle of Desmond then being in Dublin, to deale with the Deonhours, who being accompanied with sir Edmund and Piers his brethren, Nicholas White maister of the rolles, capteine George Carew, capteine Macworth, and sundrie other capteins and gentlemen, made their repaire to the borders and marches of Mhalla; wher after much talke to no purpose, they all returned without the young lord.ouer theles afterwards the Deonhours when they had better considered of the matter, and had had some conference with Hussen and others the earles men, and mistrusting that some further troubles would insue, euen as the earle of Desmond had partly threatened them; and doubting also least the staing of the sonne might be prejudiciall to the father, then in all hast did send the young lord to the earle of Desmond, who caried him to Dublin, and deliuered him to the lord deputie: and his lordshyp forthwith sent him to the ward, where he remained with his father, vntill they both and the baron of Deluin were sent into England, where the earle and the baron were sent to the Tower, and the young lord committed to the custodie of the earle of Bedford. The earle died after in London, and his bodie was caried into Ireland, and there buried amongst his ancestors.

Capteine Walter Raleigh, lieng in garrison at Corke, and nothing liking the outrages, bozages, and villanies daily practised by Barrie, Conden, and others vpon the good subiects and his maiesties garrisons, whereof sundrie complaints had bene made, and small redresse had, he rode himselfe to Dublin vnto the lord deputie, and made his complaints thereof, alledging that the outrages of the Barries and his consorts were such, that unless they were proclaimed traitors, and with all diligence followed and pursued, the euent thereof would be verie euill, to the aggrauance of good subiects, & to the discouragement of the wicked: whose insolencie and pride was growne to such a height, that the sword with extremitie was the onelie meane now to redresse the same.

The lord deputie and counsell, when they had heard and well considered this, they sent him backe againe with a commission vnto himselfe, to seize and enter vpon the castell and house of Barrie court, and all other the lands of the said Barrie: and likewise to pursue and follow him in the best maner as he thought good: and for his better seruice to be done herein, he had certeine horsemen in wages also giuen vnto him, and added vnto his ensigne of footmen: wher vpon he returned. But before he was come backe to Corke, the case was altered; for the matter was so ordered and handled by such as there and then were in authoritie, and so manie delafes were vsed to hinder the good seruice proposed, that his commission auailed him verie little or nothing, for the castell of Barrie was committed mitted and delivered to the custodie of the mother of the said David Barrie, and by his set over unto him his sonne: and who forthwith burned and defaced the said castell being his principall house, as also wasted the whole countrie, and became more worse and outrageous than he was before. This capteine making his returne from Dublin, & the same well knowne into the seneschall of Imokellie, through whose countrie he was to passe, laie in ambush for him to haue intrapped him betwene Droughall and Corke, lying at a ford, which the said capteine must passe over with his horsemen, and certeine kerne. The capteine little mistrusting anye such matter, had in his companie onelie two horsemen and foure shot on horsebacke, which was too small a force in so doubtfull and dangerous times: neuertheless he had a berie good guide, which was the seruant of John Fitzedmunds of Cloue, a good subiect, and this guide knew euerie corner and harting hole in those places.

The capteine being come to wards the ford, the seneschall had espied him alone, his companie being scattered behind, and verie fiercelie pursued him, and crossed him as he was to ride over the water, but yet he recovered the ford and was passed over. The Irishman who was his guide, when he saw the capteine thus alone, and so narrowlie distressed, he thiked for himselfe and fled vnto a broken castell fast by, thers to saue himselfe. The capteine being thus ouer the water, Henrie Poile, riding alone about a bowes shot before the rest of his companie, when he was in the middle of the ford, his horse foundered and cast him downe; and being afraid that the seneschalls men would haue folowed him and haue killed him, cried out to the capteine to come and to saue his life; who not respecting the danger he himselfe was in, came vnto him, and recovered both him and his horse. And then Poile coueting with all hast to leape vp, did it with such hast and behemencie, that he quite ouer leapt the horse, and fell into a mire fast by, and so his horse ran awaie, and was taken by the enimie. The capteine neuertheless staid still, and did abide for the coming of the residue of his companie, of the foure shot which as yet were not come forth, and for his man Jenkins, who had about two hundred pounds in monie about him, and sat vpon his horse in the meane while, hauing his staffe in one hand, and his pistoll charged in the other hand. The seneschall, who had so fiercelie folowed him vpon spur, when he saw him to stand and tarry as it were for his coming, notwithstanding he was counted a man (as he was indeed) of great seruice, and hauing also a new supplie of twelue horsemen and sundrie shot come vnto him; yet neither he nor anye one of them, being twentie to one, durst to giue the onset vpon him, but onelie railed and bled hard speeches vnto him, vntill his men behind had recovered and were come vnto him, and then without anye further harme departed.

It happened that not long after, there was a parlie appointed betwene the lord gouernour and the rebels; at which the seneschall was present, and stood much vpon his reputation. Capteine Kaleigh being present began to charge him of his cowardnesse before the earle of Desmond, that he being twentie of his side, to him alone, durst not to encounter with him. Wherevnto he gaue no answer. But one of his men standing by, said; that his maister was that daie a coward; but he would neuer be so forgetfull a game, if the like seruice were to be done, and in manie great terms exalted his maister the seneschall for his valiantnesse and seruice. The earle of Desmond hearing those great speeches, toke the matter in hand, and offered vnto the seneschall, that if he and sir John of Desmond there present, and three or foure others, the best they could chose, would appoint to meet him; capteine Kaleigh, and such foure others as they would bring with them, they would come to the same place, and passe over the great river vnto them, and would there stow for two, foure for foure, or six for six, fight and trie the matter betwene them; but no answer was then giuen: ther vpon the white knight was afterwards sent vnto him with this challenge, but the rebels refused it. Not long after this, there were speeches made, that the earle of Desmond was to depart from this long and wearie seruice into England, & capteine Zouch should in his place be the generall. Betwene the remouing of the one, and the placing of the other, sir William Morgan, capteine Kaleigh, and capteine Piers had a commission to be gouernours of that part of Munster, where they spent all that summer, and laie for the most part at Kilmore, and in the countrie and woods thereabouts, in continuall seruices vpon the enimies from time to time, as occasion and oportunitie serued.

And when the summer was spent, capteine Kaleigh returned with all his band vnto Corke, being in number eight horsemen and foure score footmen. And as he passed through the countrie, it was aduertised to him, that David Barrie an archtraitor was at Cloue with a great troupe of sundrie hundreds of men. Wherevpon he thought good to passe that waie through the towne of Cloue, minding to trie the valor of David Barrie, if by anye meanes he might meet with him. And euen at the verie towne end he found Barrie and all his companie, and with a lustie courage gaue the onset vpon him. But Barrie refused it, and fled. And then this capteine passing from thence, in his iourneie he espied in a plaine nere adjoining to a woods side, a companie of footmen by themselves, vpon whom with six horsemen he gaue the charge: but these being cut off from the wood wherevnto they were fleeing, and hauing not succor now to helpe & relieue themselves, they turned backe, & comiuning themselves together to withstand this force and onset made vpon them, in which they behaued themselves verie valiantlie, and of the horses they killed five, of which capteine Kaleigh his horse was one, and he himselfe in great danger, and like to haue bene slaine, if his trustie seruant Nicholas Wright a Dorsetshire man borne had not bin. For he perceiving that his maisters horse was galled and stricken with a dart, and plunged so much, that to his seeming he was past seruice; the said Nicholas willed and called to an Irishman there, whose name was Patrick Fagaw, that he should looke to his capteine, and either to rescue him, or to giue charge vpon the enimie. Wherevpon the said Fagaw rescued his capteine, & the said Nicholas Wright forthwith gaue the onset vpon six of the enimies and slue one of them. And therewith came one James Fitzrichard an Irish gentleman with his kerne to the rescue of the capteine, but his kerne was slaine, and himselfe in danger. For Wright not looking on them folowed the enimie verie egerlie, and recompensed the losse of one with the slaughter of others. Which capteine Kaleigh perceiving cried out to his man, saying; Wright, if thou be a man, charge about hand & saue the gentleman. Who at his maisters commandment pressed into the middle of the enimies, and slue one of them, and so saued the gentleman; and, in which skirmish his horse leg was cut vnder him. Diuerse footmen were slaine of the enimies, and two were taken prisoners, whome they carried with them to Corke.

Captaine Ka-

in all his men.

At his lying in Cozke there were sundrie pe-ces of seruices done by him, all which do verie well deserve to be for euer registred. And amongst all others this one point of his seruice deserueth both commendation and perpetuall remembrance. The lord Koch was growen into a suspicion that he was not fount of his loyalty. Whereupon captaine Kaleigh by commandement was to fetch him and his ladie to Cozke vnto the generall. This thing was not so pailie determined, but that the seneschall and David Barrie had knowledge thereof, and minding verelie to take the captaine at some aduantage, they had assembled a great compaignie of themselves to the number of seven or eight hundred men to haue met with him either coming or going. The captaine perceiuing and forsethinking how dangerous his enterpryse was against so noble a man in that countrie as the lord Koch was, who was verie well beloued, commanded vpon a sudden all his men one and other, both horsemen and footmen, which in the whole were not aboue foure score and ten persons, to be in a readinesse vpon the paine of death betwene ten and eleven of the clocke of the same night. At which time euerie man being in a readinesse, he took his horse and marched toward the lord Koches house called Wallie in Harth, which is about twentie miles out of Cozke, and came thirty somewhat earlie in the morning. At his com-ming he went forthwith to the castell gate.

The townsmen when they saw their lords house and castell thus suddenlie beset, they doubting the worst, did arme about five hundred of themselves.
Whereupon captaine Kaleigh placed and bestowed his men in battell raie in the towne it selfe, & marched againe to the castell gate, with certeine of his officers and gentlemen of his band, as by name Phichaell Butler, James Fulford, Nicholas Writte, Arthur Barlow, Henrie Swane, & Winking Hulth; and they knocked againe at the gate. And after a while there came thre or foure of the said lord Koches gentlemen, & demanded the cause of their coming, vnto whome the captaine answered, that he was come to speake with my lord: which was offered he should, so that he would bying in with him but two or thre of his gentlemen, which the captaine was contented with, yet in the end (but with much adw) he came in with all these few persons before named. When the captaine was once come within the castell, and had entred into some speches with the lord Koch, he so handled the matter by deuises and meanes, that by little and little, and by some and some, he had gotten in within the fron doze or gate of the courtlodge all his men. And then hauing the aduantage, he commanded his men to stand and gard the said gate, that no man should passe in or out: and likewise charged euerie man to come into the hall with his peece well prepared, with two bullets. The lord Koch when he saw this, he was suddenlie amazed & stricken at the hart with feare: but dissembling the same, he set a good face vpon the matter, and calling for meat, requested the captaine and his foresaid gentlemen to sit downe, & to keepe him compaignie at dinner.

After dinner, the captaine falling into speches with the said lord Koch, declared plainlie vnto him the cause of his coming, and shewed that he and his wife were accused to be traitors, and that he had a commission (which he shewed vnto them) to take and carie them along with him to Cozke: which he was to performe, and so would. The lord Koch alledged manie excuses for himselfe and for his wife, saying in the end that he neither could nor would go: the captaine answered, that if they would not go with a good will, they should perforce go against their will. The lord Koch seeing that there was no remedie die, he yielded: and then the captaine minding to lose no time, willed him to command and carie all those of the towne, and all such as were about the house, to attend and be in readinesse to aid him, and to let him forth in his horse: which he did, and verie willingly shewed himselfe to abide and obeye the captaines commandement, saying that he would answer the matter well enough, and discharge whatsoeuer should be laid to his charge, for he knew himselfe to be cleare. And so he made himselfe and his wife redie to take the horse in hand, as the captaine did appoint and command: and towards night they did set forward to Cozke. But the night fell out to be verie tempestuous and foule, and therewith so darke, that no man could see hand or foot, nor yet discerne one another; and the waters also were so foote, so full of barks, hillocks, pits, and rocks, that the souldiours thereby were maruellouslie troubled and incombyed, some stumbled among the stones, some plunged into holes, and some by their often falls were not onelie hurt, but also lost their armour, and were maruellouslie spoiled: and besides that, they were among and in the middle of the enemies, who laie in sundrie ambushes, thinking verelie to haue intercepted them, and to haue set vpon them: but the darke night which was cumbersome to themselves, was a shadow to shrowd them from their enemies.

And in the end, though with much trouble, they came to Cozke in safetie, saving one soldier named John Phelim, who by his often falling and stumbling among the stones and rocks, did so hurt one of his feet, that he could neuer recover the same, but did in the end consume and rot awaie.

The captaine being come to the towne somewhat earlie in the morning, he was received in, and presented his prisoners to the generall, with no little admiration that he had escaped so dangerous a for-neie, being verelie supposed of all men that he could neuer haue escaped. The lord Koch being brought to be examined, did so well answer for himselfe, that in the end he was acquitted, and taken for a true and a good subject, and which in time was well tried and knowne. For not he himselfe onlie, but all his sons and followers, did attend and performe all such seruices as were laid vpon them; and in which, thre of his sonnes were killed by the enemy in his mai-lies seruice.

Captaine Zouch (as is afore said) laie at the Ding-ham, among whose compaignie there fell a dangerous and an extreme sickness: few or none escaped it, it was aduertised him, that the earle of Desmond and David Barrie was assembled at Aghado with thre thousand men; and he being verie desirous to do some seruice vpon them, drew all his full force of horsemen and footmen vnto Castelmange. And then by the aduise of his capitaine Achim and Cath, he suddenlie made an onset vpon his enemies, before they wist of any such thing, and slew a great compaignie of them, and drave the earle to such a pith, that he in his shirt was dyuen to shift for himselfe, in the middle of his gallotuglasses, and by that means he escaped. The earle nothing liking this course successe, sought a better place of safetie, and removed himselfe to Harlowe wood, and passed by the waie to Kil-mallocke. Which when the garrison there did understand, they pursued and followed him, namelie captaine Bourchier, captaine Dowdall, captaine Daks-did enter into the wood, where he met with the earle of Desmond now the second time, and gaue the onset vpon him, killed a great number of his men, toke from them their carriages, and vpon a waite a great price of kine, and brought them to Kilmallocke to the garrison. There about this time the seneschall came to Lismore, and praied that countrie, and vpon a waite their cattell. Which when the garrison heard, and were aduertised thereof, they turned, and followed the preie to recover it; but they were so encountered and skirmished withall, that they lost the preie, and some and some of their men were slaine. Diuerse skirmishes were baile done vpon the enfirre, and manye fornicies made vpon them to their great damages and hurts.

In the moneth of August next following, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred eightie and one, the lord deputie made a fornicie into Spounsher, where when he had taken an account of all their workings and seruices, he established capteine Zouch to be gouernour of all Spounsher, and generall at armes; and then his lordship returned through Conagh into Dublin. This now new gouernour, being accompanied with capteine Kaleigh and capteine Dowdall, travelled from place to place to see all things in good order: but the certeine place of their resting was at Corke, where for the most part they late in garrison: making in the meane time sundrye fornicies, as occasion of seruice did require. And they being in Corke, newes was brought vnto the gouernour that there was a great quarrell fallen out betwixt Dauid Barrie and the seneschall, and that they were mostall enemies, and at a deable fad; and they late both in Dunfirmin side, not far from the blake water. The earle of Desmond and John his brother late in Patrike Condons countrie, being on the further side of the said water, who were verie soie for this quarrell, and would haue come on to them, but the waters were so great, they could not; yet they sent their messengers to and fro among them for some pacification, but it was to no effect. Capteine Dowdall vpon these newes sent an Irish man which he had, and who was a notable spirit, named Richard mac James, and willed him to seeke out where the seneschall was, to the end that he might make a draught vpon him. This Richard drawing himselfe to the companies of the rebels, and lieng among them in their cabins where they late in the woods, he fell in companie, and then entered into a great familiaritie of one which was a messenger from the Desmonds vnto the seneschall, and he thinking nothing but that this Richard was one of the said companie, began to discourse vnto him the businesse which he had there to do: and told him that the next date following, sir John of Desmond did appoint to come thither, and to make a peace and an agreement betwixt Barrie and the seneschall. When as Richard mac James had heard at full all his speeches, then he intreated him that he would go to Corke with him, which in the end the fellow was contented so to do. And in the next morning they went together to Corke, and at their coming thither, did declare vnto capteine Dowdall the whole matter, and he forthwith aduertised the same to the gouernour: who albe it he did not altogether beleue what was told, yet he agreed that it was best that some seruice should be done vpon them, and concluded that himselfe and capteine Dowdall should do the same, vnder the colour that they were to make a iourneie vnto Limerike, and so they caused it to be said: for in no wise would they be knowne of that which they had determined. And hauing prepared all things necessarie for this seruice, the same night they left the charge of the garison vnto capteine Kaleigh lieutenant: and themselves taking their leaue, as though they were bound for Limerike, they marched out at the gates, and by break of the date they came to castell Lions, the weather being verie mistie and thicke, and in the castell they found but one poxe man, who told them that Dauid of Barrie was gone but a little before them vnto Humacquillam. The gouernour and the capteine being verie eger, and desirous to do some seruice, they followed the tract of the horse a good prettie waie; but the capteine mistrusting that no good seruice would be done that waite, perswaded the gouernour that he should rather enter and search the woods, which were fast by, where as he thought some good seruice would be done, whose aduise the gouernour followed: and they had ridden but a little waite, but they saw two horsemen come riding toward them, but as soon as they had seene the said gouernour and capteine, they returned backe againe.

Then the capteine told him that there was a bog in the wood, and his aduise and counsell was, that some of his shot should be sent to stand betwixt the bog and the wood; which being done, they followed those two men so short, that they were driuen to forsake their horses, and to run on foot towards the bog. But the lose that being in a readinesse, did put them backe againe vpon the horsemen, who gaue the onset vpon them; and the one of them, which was sir John of Desmond they soe hurted with a horsemans staffe, that he spake verie few words after. And the other, whose name was James Fitzjohn of Strongecullie, they toke: and both they caried with them to Corke. Sir Johns head was sent to Dublin, but his bodie was hanged up by the heeles vpon a gibbet, and set vpon the north gate of Corke. And James Fitzjohn was drowne, hanged, & quartered. And thus haue you the third head of the venemous Hydra cut off, who had his iust reward and merit, if not too good for so villanous & bloudie a traitor: who respecting neither the honor of God, the obedience to his prince, the credit of his owne house, the faith to his friend, nor the state of the commonwealth, was wholly imbued in blond and villanie; and in blond he died, and had his reward by Gods iust iudgement.

Not long after this, it was agreed that a draught should be made vpon Dauid Barrie, for the preie which he and Cozen mac Swene had made in Carbric, and passed with the same by Bentrice, where laie a garrison vnder the leading of capteine Appelleie: but he being deceased, the same was committed to captein Jfenton, whose lieutenant named Richard Cant, minding to crosse the preie, fell in to the fight with Barrie and his companie: but he was slaine and all his companie, there being but one man the drumlager left alieue, who by swiftnesse of his fate escaped. The foresaid Appelleie was a verie proper man, a gentleman borne, and of a good house, and brought up in learning; he could write verie well, and also deliuer his speeches verie orderlie and eloquentlie. When he grew to some ripe yeares, he fell acquainted with some lose companions, who perswaded him to accompanie them to the seas, promising him the sun and the mone, and all the wealth in the world. And he being some inticed and perswaded, was contented, and went to the seas, and became as bad as the haddest; whereof great troubles ensued, and he at length was driuen to leaue the seas, and to wander a long time on the seacoasts in the prouince of Spounsher: where by occasion he fell to come to acquaintance of the earle of Desmond, with whom he found such fauor, that no Englishman could do more with him than he could. Afterwards, when the narrow searching for him was quailed and forgotten, he fell to be acquainted with the good Henrie Dauels, whom he found rather a father than a friend unto him: and then his behaviour was such, that he grew to be in good favour with all Englishmen, and in the end put in trust to do sundrie seruices in Mounster, and was become and made a capteine, in which office he discharged himselfe verie honestly and faithfully. The gouernour continuing still in one and the same mind, to do some seruice vpon Barrie, who then late in Dunsferrin, he together with capteine Dowdall marched to Barries campe, and earlie in the morning (they being vnlooked for) entred into the campe and there made a great slaughter vpon Barries men, but Barrie himselfe was gone and fled. After this time, the said Barrie considered his distressed case, and how continuallie he was pursued and followed by the gouernour and the English garisons, whose force he saw that he could by no means auoid, but that at one time or other they would take him at some advantage. He maketh humble petition to the gouernour that he might be vnder his protection, and to liue thankesfully in some dutifull and reasounable order; which he in the end did obtaine.

The lord deputie, thinking that by the death of John of Desmond, and the silence of the earle his brother, who what was become of him no man could tell, but supposed that he was fled beyond the seas, or that he was dead, and that all things were well and in quiet in all Mounster; he thought good to ease his maiesties charge, and so cashed sundrie bands and discharged sundrie garisons, leauing for the seruice of Mounster in the whole but 400 footmen & 50 horsemen, of which, 200 were vnder the leading of the gouernour, one hundred vnder capteine Dowdall, and one hundred vnder Sir George Bourcher; and the first horsemen were vnder capteine Achin, who late in garison at Adare in Barrie. When all things (as late) seemed to be at rest and in peace, and all things well, behold a new stirre (and vnlooked for) is now raised; for Fitzmoris baron of Lerna, who had hitherto dissembled the matter, and pretended to haue bene a dutifull subject, when he saw the weaknesse of the Englishmen, & how that the garisons were discharged, & therefore the few men left were scarce able well to saue and keepe themselves, much lesse to hurt others: he breaketh out into open rebellion, and ioyneth with him his wicked, traitorous, and perjured sonne. This baron of Lerna his first ancestors were seruants to the barons of Carlew, and of O'Don, and lords of Lerna, and had the chiefe rule and government vnder him of all his countrie in Mounster, which was verie great and large: his eldest sonne he kept in the court of England. And this Fitzmoris, who by the authoritie vnder his master was growen into great credit in the countrie, and standing in hope to haue their friendship and assistance in all his businesse, watched his time, and killed the lord Carlew his master, at a table which yet remaineth in the house, and entred into all his baronie of Lerna & his other possessions in Mounster, euen as the like was done by the Haucnaghs in O'Don in Leinster. And the heire of Carlew in England, who had great and large possessions in Devon and in sundrie shires elsewhere in England, made the lesse and little account of his lands in Ireland, and so by little and little they lost all their lands in Ireland.

This new baron of Lerna, the first thing that he toke in hand, was to cleanse and to rid his owne countrie from all Englishmen and their garisons; and in the end, taking capteine Achin at an advantage, slue him, and recovered the ward of Adare. After that, he went to the ward kept in the castell of Lescanile, in which were but eight Englishmen, and the castell being verie hard to be gained, he used this stratagem. He laid verie close & tealie a companie of his men in an old house fast by the castell, & then he practised with an old woman, which was wonte verie morning to bring a great basket of coles or turfes into the ward, that as soone as she was betwene the two gates of the castell, she should let fall hir basket and cry out: which she did. For when she was come to the castell, and had after hir accustomed maner called to the ward, one of them came and loosed the vpper iron doore, and then he did open the inner doore for hir to come in. When she was come betwene the two doores, she let fall hir great basket of coles and cried out. The companie forthwith lieng in the said old house came, and the ward being not able to drave vnto them the vpper iron doore, nor to shut fast the inner doore, the enimie entred, toke the castell, killed all the ward, and cast them ouer the wals. The good incesse of this stratagem caused him to practise & to put in vze other like deuises for the regaining of the castell (as I remember) of Adnagh. For he supposing that hungry soldiers would be contented to accept anie courtesie, he procured a pong harlot, who was some what insolent, to go to the castell, pretending some inuention to haue bene done to hir, and to humble herselfe to the capitaine's deuotion, being supposed, that he by these meanes would fall into the liking and fantasie of hir, and so would reteine hir. And by these meanes, she by hir cunning handling of the matter, according vnto the plot before contriued betwene Fitzmoris and hir, she should at one time or other find the occasion or opportunitie to betraye the castell. The capitaine receiued hir into the castell, and not forgetting the late former practise at Lescanile, caused him to be the more warie and circumspect, and to looke vnto himselfe. Whereupon he so handled the matter with this harlot, that he in the end found out all the deuise, and forthwith he carried hir vp vnto the top of the castell and cast hir ouer the wals, where with the fall she was crushed and died. Fitzmoris being disappointed of his purpose, departed from thence, and ranged ouer all the countries of Tipperarie, O'Don, and Waterford, where were no garisons to resist him, and there played his parts.

The gouernour, who late at Corke, being advertised of these outrages, called his companie together, which (as is before said, was not aboute foure hundred persons) and other reported (but vntrue) to be about foure thousand: yet minding not to suffer an inuention, marched with such companie as he had into Clanmorris, which is the said Fitzmoris countrie, and distant from Corke about thre daies iourne. The baron by his espials being advertised of their comming, forsooke his castell at Adare, and defaced his castell at Lerna, and drave his goods, and all his forces into the wood of Lescanile. When the gouernour was come to Adare, he found the towne burnt, and the few Englishmen (which were in the abbey) greatly distressed. From thence he went to Lescanile, which is ten miles further, where he discoursed the baron and all his companie, which then late in a plaine bottome in the said wood, hauing then in his companie of gallowglasse, kerne, shot, and horsemen, about seven hundred men.

The gouernour taking aduise what was best to be done, because that place was full of fastnesse, and no passage for anie horsemen, but all rested vpon the seruice of the footmen; they diuided their companie. And capteine Dowdall being verie desirous to aduenture the seruice vpon him, he had six score footmen appointed and deliuered vnto him, and the rest due he reserued to the wood, and plaine where Fitzmoris companie, and the full to his, he diuided parts, thinking to haue his will vpon and forthwith had such a hand vpon them. Which when man turned his back, the teins of Slough being hind; which the captain there, and brought thence they marched. Oliver Stephan there newes was putte had sent vnto which one hundred the other captain vnto Limericke, moris, and of the said capitaine was incamped for the gallowglasse shot, and thirte then but the lieut made a fallie vpon and drave into the and recovered a hundred horses of sheepe and goods he found store of ments. due he reserved to himselfe. The capteine entred into the wood, and followed untill he came into the plains where Fitzmoris was; who having a great companie, and the capteine but (as it were) a handfull to his, he divided his whole companie into foure parts, thinking to have inclosed the capteine, and to have his will upon them. The capteine perceived it, and forthwith brake upon one of the companies, and had such a hand upon them, that he slew a number of them. Which when Fitzmoris saw, like a valiant man turned his backe and fled awaie into the mountains of Sloughlougher, and left all his goods behind; which the capteine took, and also all the cattell there, and brought the same to the governour. From thence they marched to the castell of Glan, of which Oliver Stephanson had the ward and keeping; and there newes was brought unto him, that the lord deputie had sent unto him two bands of footmen, of which one hundred were Sir Henrie Mallops, and the other capteine Ports. Whereupon he travelled unto Limerike, and left the whole charge of Glanmoris, and of Kierie unto capteine Dowdall. And the said capteine being put to wext that the baron was incamped at Glanish with two hundred and fortye galloglasses, two hundred kerne, fourescore shot, and thirtie horsemen, and he himselfe having then but the lieutenant Wingfield in his companie, made a sallie upon them, and killed with the sword, and draue into the river above seven score of them, and recovered a pzeic of eight hundred kine, five hundred horses and mares, besides a great number of sheepe and goates: and in the taking of the baron, he found store of monie and plate, and malling garments. And from hense he marched with his cattell, and incamped besides Arough, nere unto the earle of Clancar his house, and from thence to Castellmange, and so to Adare, and furnished as he went euerie ward and garison with store of vittells, and with the goods he rewarded his souldiours. From this time, the baron Fitzmoris having lost all his provision & store, was neuer able to recover himselfe, neither to credit nor to wealth, nor yet to hold by his head, but was forsaken of all his frends and followers: and being ashamed of himselfe, and of his bad and disloyall trecheries, walked and wandered abroad as a forlorne man, not knowing what to do, whither to go, or where to seeke for succor and helpe.

At length being wearie of himselfe, and of his distressed miseries, bethinketh upon the earle of Desmond, whome notwithstanding that without cause he had verie much insured, having most outrageously preied his countries, burned his villages, and killed his people: yet he maketh his recourse unto his lordship, acknowledgeth his fault, confesseth his follies; and being most lozic for the same, desireth his lordship to pardon and remit him, and most humbly requested him to have vnder him a protection. This honorable man, notwithstanding the great injuries done unto him, and he of a great courage and stomach, and of a noble mind, and loth to put up so great injuries, yet (as it is attributed to the lion, Parcere prostratis) when he had shewed the great graces of the said Fitzmoris, he forgat all his owne wrongs, and granted him his request. Capteine Dowdall, leaving the governours souldiours and companie at Adare, vnder the leading of capteine Smith, he marcheth towards Cozke, where he rested and laie in garison. Now when all these broils were ended, and verelie supposed that all things had bene at rest, and the whole province of Mounster at peace; behold the earle of Desmond, who was thought to be either dead or fled, beginneth to appeare, and to shew himselfe; and having assembled a great companie, came to Adare, where the garison issued out upon him: betwene whom the fight was hot, and manie slaine on both sides. Among whom, Smith, sergeant of the band, and Morgan the lieutenant were both slaine: but yet the English souldiours recovered the abbey. About this time one Thomas Birne lieutenant to the notable archtraitor Fitzgiralde, being wearie of the wicked actions which hitherto he had followed among the rebels, sent his messenger to capteine George Carew, requesting him to deale with the lord deputie for his pardon, and for so manie of his companie as would foine with and accompanie him in a pzeic of service to be done: which he promised to recompense with the pzeic of his capteins head, which he would in a bag present to his lordship, as also would kill so manie of his companie as would not consent with him thereto.

When this deuisse was readie to be practised, the cleark of the band, who was one of the confederats, verie trecherously did discover the same unto Fitzgiralde, who immediatly took and hanged his lieutenant, the sergeant of his band (who was an Englishman) and so manie of the souldiours as were of that confederacie. Not long after, Fitzgiralde being thinking upon the extreme miseries, which in this rebellion he had endured, and the small hope which he had to pzeuaile in these his bad and traitorous actions, but chieflie being afraid of his owne life, least at one time or other he should be slaine by his souldiours: he sent a messenger to the then lord iustices, requiring his pardon, and which he would redeme with the head of his best friend and fellow in armes Theon mac Hugh, the verie gall of all the wars and rebellion in Leinster.

This was not so couertly done, but that Theon mac Hugh had knowledge of the practise, and he forthwith intreated Fitzgiralde in the like manner as he before had done with the lieutenant, and so hanged him by. The lord deputie after long sute for his renocation, receiued his maiesties letters for the same, and then he sent for capteine Zouch governour of Mounster to come to Dublin: and in the end of August 1582, after that he had served full two yeres he deliuered by the sword unto the archbishop of Dublin then lord chancellor, and to Sir Henrie Mallop then treasurer at armes, and took shipping; having with him capteine Zouch, who was after slaine by one of his most familiar acquaintance, and sundrie other gentlemen. The said lord Greie was a man of great nobilitie, and of as honourable and ancient descent, one that feareth God in true religion, and dutifull to his maiestie in all obedience. And albeit he had deserved well of that Irish nation, and had sowed the good seeds of notable services, as well for his martiall services, as for his civil government; yet he reped (as his predecessors before him) but darenell and cockle. For they had among them not one lie conspired his death, for which some paid deuelie; but made also sundrie complaints against him, to which he answered to his commendation and acquittal, and to their reproch for their ingratitude.

These two lords iustices being fallen into a broken time, the warres being not ended, the people not quieted, and the gouvernement not staied nor settled; yet they both joining their wisdoms, services, and good wils, were so blessed therein, that by them that land was reduced to some perfection and quietnesse. For not long after they had taken the sword in hand doctor Sanders the popes nuncio and legat, who came from that holie see of Rome, the sea of all wickednesse, with James Fitzmoris in Julie in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred sevenie and nine, to beare arms in this land against his maiestie, after that he had wandered by and downe these peaves together with the earle and his brethren st John, in woods and bogges, and had lived with them a most miserable and wretched life, and had bene partaker of their most cruell bloodsheds, outrages, murthers, and robberies, a life god and to god for a traitor and a rebell. He fell sicke of an Irish ague and of the bloudie fit, and late in the wood of Glen-neliffe, which is a wood full of alleys, withies, bylers, thornes, and throught which is no passage; where part lie of his sicknesse, but cheeflie for famine and want he died. When in this filthy place, that most miserable wretch and traitor was lodged and died, bequeathing his treasons, treacheries, and disolalties against his soueraign mistesse and ladie hir maiestie vnto the pope, reseruing the punishment to the Lord himselfe, who is a swift and iust iudge vpon all traitors and disobedient persons, and his bodie (as some saie) was deuoured by of twolues; but (as some do thinke) that so much as was left was buried at Clancarrie, not farre off from the place where he died.

The two lords iustices being entred into this bo-ken gouernement, did what they could to keepe the same in peace; and vnderstanding the willfull disposition of Desmond, they did vse all the means and waies they could to pacifie him; but so farre was he imbued and poisoned with the venom of treason and rebellion, that no reason, no dutie, nor anie other respect could perswade him to be a loiall and dutifull subject. Wherefore he continued still in his old accustomed spoiling and waisting the countries, and trusting to no house nor castell, did shew himselfe in woods and bogges, and in the winter following he kept his Christmasse in the wood of Kilquieg nere to Kilmallocke. And about the fourth of Januarie then following, one John Welsh a valiant and a good souldior, was resolved to make a draught vpon the said earle, and he made acquainted therewith capitaine Dowdall, capitaine Bangor, and George Thozington prouost marshall of Mounster, all which late then in garrison in Kilmallocke, and according to the order betwene them then agreed vpon, they marched in the night time to the place and wood where the earle laie.

But being come thither, they were to passe ouer a great riuer, before they could come to enter into the wood of Kilquieg, & by reason of the great raines then falling, it was impossible for man or horse to passe ouer the same, which thing John Welsh did before mistrust. Wherefore the night before, he went thither verie closelie, with such few persons as he had chosen for the purpose: and there he caused a number of stakes and hurbels to be made of halson, allers, and withie rods, which he caused to be drawne ouer the riuer by one, whom he had there of purpose which could swim verie well. And this fellow when he had fastened some of the hurbels to a tree in the further side of the water, and then by a rope drew ouer the residue one after another, did so fasten and tie one vnto another, and so cunninglie handled the matter, that when the captains came, they passed ouer the riuer verie well without danger or perill.
And so from thence the said Welsh did guide and bring them by the breake of the daie vnto the earles cabin: but the wood was so full of thickets, and so mirie, that they were faine to go a speares length wide from the cabin to come vnto it. The earle hearing a great noise, and suspecting some extraordinarie and a greater companie to be in place more than his owne, and doubting the wood, ran out of his bed in his shirt, and ran into the riuer fast by his cabin, and there hid himselfe close vnder a banke hard by to his chin, by which meanes he escaped and his wife with him. The souldiors made diligent search for him both by searching of the riuer and of the wood, but could not find him; wherevpon they did put to the swoord so manie as they found there, and carried awaie the goods with them, and so returned to Kil-mallocke.

At this time the seneschall secretlie with all the force which he could make, came vnto the towne of Doughall, & entred into the end of the same towne.
Wherevpon the alarm was raised; and forthwith Caluerleigh being lieutenant to capitaine Boggan, hauing all his souldiors together, of which he had fortie more, went vnto that end of the towne where the seneschall scaled the wals, & there he made a leane, or a little bulwark, and by that meanes saved the towne, and by the seneschall from his purpose, and killed aboue fiftie of his men: and so being disappointed of his purpose he departed awaie. In the end of this moneth of Januarie the earle of De-mond arrived from out of England to Waterford with a new supplie of foure hundred men, whom he divided and committed vnto the seuerall leadings of sir George Bourcher, sir William Stanleie, captaine Edward Berkeley, and capitaine Roberts.
And being now lord generall by his maiesties appointment ouer all Mounster, and hauing obtained an augmentation of two pence by the daie for eu-erie souldior wages, he assembled all the souldiors and euerie capitaine which had anie charge, and toke order with euerie of them for such seruices as were to be done, furnishesth them with vittels, munitions, monie, and all things necessarie and meet for them, requesting euerie one of them to shew themselues like good and valiant souldiors, in the pursuing of the rebels, and vanquishing of the enemies: and such grace and loue he found among the souldiors, that he was no more desirous than they most glad and willing to performe the same. Such a good affection euerie one did beare to this honorable man.

At this time advertisement was giuen vnto his lordship, that the earle of Desmond was incamped in the fastnesse of Harlo wood with a great number of rakebels & rebels. His lordship mustered all his companies, and minding to do some seruice vpon the said rebels, marcheth towards the said fastnesse of Harlo wood. And being come thither, he diui-deth his companies into foure parts, and they entered into foure seuerall places of the wood at one instant: and by that meanes they scotized the wood thoroughout, in killing as manie as they toke, but the residue fled into the mounteins. The rebels being thus narrowlie followed and pursued, they neuer after met together in the like companies, nor assembled themselves in such great numbers: but the most part of them, which were the chieffest followers and greatest friends vnto Desmond, as Fitzmorris of Lerna before named, the seneschall, the lord Barrie, Condon, Donnell mac Anought, & sundrie others, some and some came awaie, and sought for protection. And albeit their manifold and infinit outrages, murthers, bloodsheds and spoiles, had deserued a thousand deaths: yet his lordship considering their repentance, sorowes, and humble submissions, and respecting more his maiesties godlie disposition to mercie than their deserts, did (for the most part) grant vnto euerie of them their requests.
The souldiors after this peece of seruice were dispersed abroad into their seuerall garrisons. And albeit the greater parts of the rebels were some by swoord, and some by protection abated, and much decreased, yet none of them late altogether idle, but did follow the seruice as time and occasion offered. For the earle himselfe, though he were thus vnsceathered of his greatest helps, yet he was one & the same man, a most ranke traitor and rebell: and therefore vpon him bailie were draughts and pursues made, and neuer left, untill in the end he came vnto confusion.

In the moneth of August, in the yeare of Christ one thousand five hundred eighty and three, it was aduertised to the garrisons in Kilmallocke and Cashell, that the erle of Desmond was come againe to harborough himselfe in Harle wood, and had about three score gallowglasse, besides kerne a great number, vpon whom captein Dowdall hauing good espials, made a foynete thither, and being entred into the wood verie earlie laye close all the forenone. For these gallowglasse had bin so daret from time to time, that now like a sort of beere they laye vpon their keepings; and so fearful they were, that they would not carrie in anye one place anye long time, but where they did dreke their meat, thence they would remoue, and eat it in another place, and from thence go vnto another place to lie. In the nights they would watch, in the forenoones they would be vpon the hilles and mounteins, to descrye the countrie, and in the afternone they would scape. The capteine breaking time with them, made staie in the wood accordinglie, and in the afternone he learned by his espials, that they were returned from the mounteins, and were entred into their cabins, where some of them were aslepe, and some of them occupied in dressing of a horse for to eat, for other vittels were scant. The capteine suddenlie entred vpon them, and toke them at such aduantage, that they were all, for the most part, put to the sword: of which, fife and twentie were taken in their cabins. After the dispatch of these gallowglasse, which are counted the best men of warre among the Irish: the residue of the Irish rebels were so dismayd, that a man might without anye great danger passe throughout Spounser.

About a moneth after this, in September, in the yeare one thousand five hundred foure score & three, it hapned that certeine of the lord Roches men, being in Dowall nere to Trusham, were riding about certeine businesse, and met with the erle of Desmond, hauing in his companie two or three horsemen and a priest. The kerns which attended the said lord Roches men, inuironed & compassed them about; but the erle and his men being well horsed, escaped, onelie the priest they toke, by reason of his bad horse, and him the lord Roch sent the next date vnto the lord gouernour, and being examined, he confessed in what great distresse and miserie the erle was, and that for feare he lurked in corners, & would not be seene. And further, that he had his onelie release and was fostered by Gozon mac Swene, a capteine of the gallowglasse, and who was then vnder protection. And by these meanes, the erle (who had not bene heard of since he was garred out of Harle wood) is now discouered. Wherevpon the lord generall commanded a barke to be forthwith vittelled, and to be dispatched into Dingle a Cush: and forthwith commanded capteine Dowdall to repaire thither, and there to lie in garison; which he did forthwith performe. The erle of Desmond when he heard how that he was discouered, and how that vittels and a garison were sent to Dingle a Cush to the working of his wo; he was assured that he should be surelie pursued by capteine Dowdall, who of all other capteines and sir George Bourchier did from time to time gall and most earnestlie pursue him. Wherefore now as for his last helpe, by the helpe and friendship of Gozon mac Swene, & Poile Moough mac Swene his brother, he gathereth a new companie, and maketh himselfe as strong as he can, and getteth himselfe into Desmond, and there standeth vpon his garb. Gozon mac Swene in the meane time entred into Carberie, and taketh a great piece of kine, which he drowd forthwith into Desmond toward the erle, but the foynete was so long, that he late short of the erle that night about three or foure miles.

The men of the countrie, who had thus lost their goods, thre of them with their swords and targets followed the tract a far off, minding to haue stolen a waite their olone kine if by anye means they could, and if opportunitie would so serue; for by force or by intreatie they knew it to be impossible for them to recouer anye thing at all. The foresaid Gozon, when he had lodged himselfe for all night, it was his pleasure to walke abroad in the fields; and suspecting no harme, went alone, hauing onelie one kerne with him (and both without weapon) about ten or twelue score off from his lodging. About which place it hapned the foresaid three men had hidden and couched themselves in a bush, and taking the occasion offered, they went also betwene him and his lodging, and fell vpon him and his kerne, & killed them both; and as sone as they had cut off their heads, they thistled for themselves. Gozons companie, finding their maister lacking, went abroad to seeke him, and in the end found him and his man without heads, lying dead vpon the ground; which cast them into such a maze, as they wist not what to thinke or to do: neither could they imagine nor deuise how this should come to passe: for garison there was none in those parts, and they knew of no person thereabouts whome they could suspect. But this is the iust iudgement of God, who in his iustice looketh vpon the persecuted and wicked, and in mercie beholdeth his seruants. For if this man had liued, it was feared that by his means the erle would haue increased a new force, and haue dighted the lord gouernour and all the garisons to greater troubles. The erle being aduertised of the losse of this his friend, his cheefe and onelie staie, was in a great agonie, and maruellouslie dismayd; and seeing no other remedie, he preparerth the best for himselfe, and taking the aduantage of the time, before the garison should be placed at the Dingle, he made a draught into Kerrie nere Traleigh, minding to take a priest from such as had forsaken him and had receiued their protections. Wherefore in the euening he sent two horsemen with a certeine kerne ouer the strand of Traleigh vnto a castell there, & commanded them to take their priest from thence, which they did, and brought the same a waite with them.

Among those kine thus driten a waite, a poze woman of that countrie lost all those few that she had, and being distressed of that which was the cheefe, and in a maner the onelie release of hir and hir children and household; and not knowing how she could by anye meanes recouer them: she besought hir selfe vpon a brother which she had, dwelling on the other side of the mounteine, in a castell named Drome, which was one of the Pozetos; and to him she runneth in all the hast she could, and declarerth hir estate and case, praieng him to helpe hir, and that he would follow the tract for the recouerie of hir kine. Who when he was aduertised that there were but two horsemen & a few kerne which had driten the priest a waite, he to pleasure his sister toke three other of his brethren, and followed the tract, till he came to Castlemarige, which castell was in the waite. And when he came thither, he went to the castell, and desired the constable (whose name was Chesson, and not long before lieutenant to capteine Berkeleie) that he would spare him some shot and a few of his kerne to helpe him to follow the priest which was driten that waite. The constable and the soldiors were verie glad to pleasure him, and so he had feuen shot and a dozen of kerne which dwelled in an out house fast vnder der the castell, & so they went altogether to Traleigh, they being in number thre and twentie persons; one of these was an Irish man borne, named Kollie, but served all waies under Englishmen, and could speake verie good English. This man, when they came to Traleigh, they appointed & made him their leader or capteine; and Pozetto because he was borne in those parties, and best knew the countrie, they appointed to be their guide: and from thence they folloved the tract untill they came to the side of a mounteine, where there was a glan, and in it a little groue of wood: and the night being come upon them, there they staid and rested themselves for that night. And in the darke night one of them had espied through the trees a fire not farre off, whereupon they drew themselves close together, and caused one of themselves closelie and secretlie to draw towards the fire and to discover what companie was there, and how manie was of them; which man did so. And when he returned backe unto them, he told them that there was an old bad house, and about five or six persons therein: whereupon they all determined and agreed to repaire to that place to know the whole matter. Pozetto was the guide to bring them to the house, and Kollie did set his companie in order and good array, as was most for their service, if need should so require. And when they were come to the house, they found in it but onelie one old man, for the residue were gone. Then Kollie drew his sword and strake the old man, with which blow he had almost cut off one of his arms, and then he strake him againe, and gaue him a great blow on the side of his head; where with the said old man cried out, desiring them to save his life, for he was earle of Desmond, and then Kollie staid his hands: but the erle bled so fast, that he wared verie faint, and could not traueill ante further: whereupon the said Kollie bid and willed him to prepare himselfe to die; and then he strake off the earls head.

The earle of Desmond taken in an old house alone and slaine.

The residue of the companie in this mearie time spoiled and rifled the house, and toke what them liked: and then they all departed and went to Castlemange, and carried the earles head with them, but left the bodie behind; and whether the same were denoured by the wolues or buried by his kerne, it is not certeinlie knowne. As soone as they came to Castlemange, they sent the said earles head unto the lord generall, who forthwith sent the same into England for a present to hir maiestie; which forthwith was put upon a pole, and set on London bridge. When this his death was noised and knowne, there was no more service to be done: for euerie rebell cast awaie his weapon, and sought all the waies they could to humble themselves and to become good subiects: saving one John Bourke, who stood by on his protection, and yet neuertheless he and his companie went to Adare, there to haue taken a prete. But as he passed by the castell, a boie therein discharged his peece upon the said Bourke, & strake him in the head, whereof he died. The common people, who had felt the great smart of this troublesome time, rejoiced and were glad of the death of the erle, being in a good hope that the long troubles should haue an end, and they to be the more at rest. During these continuall troubles in Pounsser, the two lord iustices which late at Dublin were much eased from all martiall affaires elsewhere, and were troubled but with the clamorings, exclamations, and bzaibling of the Irish people, not worth the remembying: saving that a certeine combat was fought and tried before them in the castell of Dublin, betwene two Deonhous, verie neere cosens & kinsmen: the one was named Teig mac Coill Patrike Deonhour appellant; the other was named Con

John Bourke having a protection, made a death, and was killed.

A combat betwene two Deonhous.

mac Cozmack Deonhour defendant. One of these appealed and charged the other for sundrie treasons in the late rebellion, and which could haue no other triall but by combat, which was granted unto them. Whereupon, according to the lawes and orders of England for a combat to be tried, all things were prepared, the date, time, and place appointed; and according to the same, the lord iustices, the iudges, and the counsellors came and sat in the place appointed for the same, euerie man in his degree and calling. And then the court was called, and the appellant or plaintife was brought in before the face of the court, being striped into his shirt, hauing onlie his sword and target (which were the weapons appointed) and when he had done his reuerence and butte to the lord iustices and to the court, he was brought to a stole set in the one of the ends within the lists, and there sat. After him was the defendant brought in, in the like maner and order, and with the like weapons: and when he had done his butte and reuerence to the lord iustices and to the court, he was brought to his chaire placed in the other end of the lists. Then were their actions and pleadings openly read, and then the appellant was demanded whether he would auerre his demand or not: who then he had affirmed that he would, the partie defendant was likewise asked whether he would confesse the action, or stand to the triall of the same: who did answer as did the other, that he would auerre it by the sword.

He manner of the combat.

Upon this their senerall answers, they were senerallie called the one after the other, euerie of them taking a corporall oath that their quarell was true, and that they would iustifie the same both with sword & blood. Thus they being swoone are brought backe againe euerie of them to their senerall places as before. And then when by the sound of a trumpet a signe was giuen unto them when they should enter into the fight; they arose out of their seats, and met each one the other in the middle within the lists, and there with the weapons assigned unto them, they fought: in which fight the appellant did preuaile, and he not onlie did disarme the defendant, but also with the sword of the said defendant did cut off his head, and upon the point of the same sword did present it to the lord iustices, and so with the victorie of his enimie he was acquitted. Thus much I thought good to saie somewhat of much, of the manner of a combat, which together with manie circumstances thereunto belonging is now for want of use almost cleane forgotten, and yet verie necessarie to be knowne. And as for this combat it was so valiantlie done, that a great manie did wish that it had rather fallen upon the whole ser of the Deonhous, than upon these two gentlemen.

The vicount of Balkinglas, being aduertised of the death of the earle of Desmond, which was no small grieue unto him, and he also verie wearie of his trotting and wandering on foot amongst bogs, woods, and desert places (being altogether distressed, and in great miserie, and now destitute of all his friends and acquaintances, and not able to hold head ante longer against hir maiesties force) did imbarke himselfe for Spaine, in hope to haue some releefe and succor, and to procure some aid from the king of Spaine; and by that meanes to be of some abilitie to renew his force and rebellion. But he found in the end verie small comfort. And therefore of a verie melancholie greafe & sorrow of mind, as it is thought, he died, being in verie extreme pouertie and need. the whole land to a peaceable & quiet government, and deliuered the same from all open or knowne rebellion; they calhed and discharged all the garrisons in pounster, onelie two hundred souldiours excepted: they kept it in good quietnesse, untill the arrivall of sir John Perot knight, who was sent over to be lord deputie, and landed at Dublin about the middle of June, one thousand five hundred fourescore and foure, the fir and twentieth yeare of hir maiesties reigne vnto whome they deliuered the sword: who being entered into his office, begun such a course, that of his good beginnings a great hope was conceived of the like to insue. For he was a right worthy seruitor in that land, when he was lord president in pounster: and by whome James Fitzmorris was subdued, and the whole prouince maruellouslie well reformed: whose notable and most noble acts as they doe well deserue, so when the same shall come to his full measure, they shall be registred to his perpetuall fame and immortall honoz. And yet in the meane time, it shall not be offensiue to remember some speciall points of his late seruice, which doe deserue to be remembred: as also for the encouraging of this noble man to continue the good course which he hath begun; which doe halson and giue a hope that he will Adde colophonem, and bring that land to a full and perfect government & regimēt; which Giraldus Cambrensis would not warrant could be done much before domesdaie.

Not long after the arrivall of this man, the Scots after their accustomed maner, for a bien venu or welcome to his lordship, they began a rebellion, and are by in armes readie for the warre. His lordship hauing notice and knowledge thereof, maketh himselfe forthwith in a readinesse to meete with them, and to stop them of their purpose: and therein he so ordered and handled the matter, that the Scots were bounden to seeke peace, to craue pardon, to submit themselves, and to sweare allegiance, faith, and obedience to hir maiestie. Which when they had obtained, then they toke the lands where in they dwelled, of hir highnesse, yielding a yearelie rent, which before they had not bene accustomed nor wont to doe. And by these meanes, if there be any truth in them, the state of that countrie standeth the better assured.

Then when he was from this seruice returned to Dublin, his speciall care, studie, and indenor was to deuise and studie how to reduce and reforme the whole realme and the government, according to the laws of England. Whereupon he would and did vertie often assemble the whole councell, or so manie of them as were there, for their aduise heretin; whose names are these. The archbishop of Dublin lord chancellor, the earle of Dymond lord treasurer, the primate of Armagh, the bishop of Meath, the bishop of Kilmore, sir John Perot lord president of pounster, sir Henrie Mallop treasurer at armes, sir Nicholas Bagnoll knight marshal, Robert Gardiner chiefe iustice of the bench, sir Robert Willon knight chiefe iustice of the common pleas, sir Lucas Willon knight chiefe baron, sir Nicholas White knight master of the rolls, sir Richard Bingham knight chiefe commissioner in Connagh, sir Henrie Colles knight, sir Edward Waterhouse knight, sir Thomas le Strange knight, Edward Wabesbie, Gestele Fenton secretaire, sir Warham Senteleger & sir Valentine Browne knights; but discontinued. By the good aduise, helpe, and councell of these wise and prudent counsellors, he first thought it best to bring the whole land into thire grounds, whereby the laws of England might haue a thorough course and passage. Wherefore, what sir Henrie Stone before had done in a few counties, that he perfomed in the whole realme, and brought the same into such & so manie severall counties, as was thought best and most fit for that purpose. To euerie of which new counties he appointed and assigned severall shiriffes, and all such inferior officers as were most requisite, and to the same incident and appertaining. All and euerie which shires hitherto not registred, nor published in chronicle, together with such as tofore were knowne, I thought it good to set downe by their severall names, and in their prouinces as followeth.

When he had performed this, and established the same by act of parlement, then hir maiesties writs and procelles had a free passage, and were currant through out the whole land, and hir maiestie knowne to be soveraigne lady and quene of the same. When the Irish by little and little gave over their Breton laws, and their Irish usage, and became obedient vnto the English laws, vnto which they referred themselves to be tried, and to haue all their quarels to be decided and determined: whereof at these presents is extant a vertie notable president & example betweene two of the most principall and chiefe personages in the prouince of Vister. The one is he, who nameth himselfe Ouele, and the other is the earle of Tiron, the heire to the great Con Ouele. These two and their ancestors, and all other noble men in that prouince, when so euery antie discord or enimitie did fall out among them, they had no peacemaker but the sword, and by wars and bloodshed was the same decided. Neuertheless, these two noble men leauing to pursue their quarels, as in times past with the sword & in hostile maner, doe refer themselves to the trial of the laws; and each one of them sueth the other at the common laws, and in the chancerie in hir maiesties court at Dublin, and there as dutifull subjects doe abide the triall of their cause. A thing so much the more to be considered, as the parties be of that nobilitie and stoutnesse, and a thing so rare, as heretofore not heard nor knowne. Which course if it haue so happie a progresse and successe, as it hath a good enterance and beginning; no doubt, but that partlie by the lawes, and partlie by the sword, an vniuersall obedience shall through that land be establisshed, the common societie shall be preserved, the whole realme shall flourish and prosper, his maiestie shall be obeyed, the reuenues shall be increased; and in the end, peace shall be vpon Israell. And as this example giueth some manifest good hope thereof, so the same is confirmed and increased by the happie victorie of late in Connagh; where a number of Scots, hauing made an inuasion, were met and encountered withall, by the right worshipfulle Sir Richard Bingham knight, chiefe commissioner of that prouince, and by him they were banquished & ouerthrowne, to the number of fiftene hundred persons; so that verie few or none escaped the sword, to returne home with the newes of their successe; but were either killed or drowned.

Sir Richard Bingham his victorie vpon the Scots.

Thus much hitherto generallie concerning the gouernment of that land of Ireland, since the death of king Henrie the eight, vntill these presents. In the course of which time, manie more notable things haue bene done, worshipfulle to be registred in the chronicles of perpetuall fame and memorie. For the attaining to the knowledge whereof, though John Hooker the writer hereof haue bene a diligent traveller and a searcher for the same; yet he wanted that good successe, as both the historie it selfe requirereth, and he himselfe wissheth. And yet the most part of all the actions in that age consisted most in continuall warres, rebellions, and hostilitie, either against their most sacred kings and queenes, or amongst themselves. But whatsoever tofore hath bene done, none were so tragicall, impious, and vnaturall, as were the last warres of the Geraldines of Desmond, who were not acquainted, nor consenting to these wicked actions, nothing is meant. Whereinto who so listeth to looke, and well to consider, he shall find and see most euident and apparant examples of Gods iustice & iudgement, against such as doe rebell against the Lords anointed; whome the Lord by his expresse word hath commanded to be honozed and obeyed in all humblenesse and dutie: because they are his vicars, substituted, and vicegerents vpon the earth, to defend the good, and to punish the euill; and who so resisteth them, do resist his ordinance, and shall receiue his iudgement: as most manifestlie it doth appeare in this the case of Desmonds rebellion. All which if it should be set downe particularlie, as in course it fell out, it would be verie tedious: but much more lamentable and dolefull to be read.

And therefore leauing the large discourses, it shall suffice to shew and conclude this historie, with the brieue recitall of the most speciall points, in which each man to consider the mightie hand of God against traitors and rebels; and his louing mercie and kindnesse vpon the dutifull and obedient. First therefore James Fitzmoris, the first ringleader in this pageant, and who most vnaturallie had flocked in strangers and forreiners to innade the land, for establishing the antichristian religion, and the depriuing of his maiestie from his imperiall crowne of the realme of Ireland: this man (I saie) was he who yielded the first fruits of this rebellion. For in his idolatrous pilgrimage to the holie crosse, and his traitorous iourneys to practise with all the rebels and inhabitants in Connagh and Ulster. Moine with him, he did commit a robberie; and being pursued for the same, he was slaine by a gentleman, and one of his owne kinsmen Theobald Burke, and his head & quarters set vpon the gates of the towne of Kilmallocke.

Then James of Desmond brother to the earle, hauing done a robberie vpon Sir Corman mac Teige, was likewise taken and caried to Corke, where he was drowned, hanged, and quartered; and his head and quarters set vpon the gates and walls of the citie of Corke. After him, Sir John of Desmond, one other brother to the said earle, who was a speciall champion of the pope, from whom he had receiued manie blessings, bulls, and Agnos dei, which should keepe and preserve him from all harme: yet for all this his holie cote armour, he was met withall by capteine Zouch and capteine Dowdall, and by them he receiued his iust reward of a bloudie traitor, and a friendkiller; being killed and then caried dead to Corke, where his bodie was hanged by the heeles, and his head sent to Dublin, and there set vpon the top of the castle. And in the end, the earle himselfe was also taken, and with the sword the head was divided from the bodie: the one was sent to London, and there set vpon London bridge; and his bodie vncertaine whether it were buried or deuoured by the wild beasts. And thus a noble race and ancient familie, descended from out of the loines of princes, is now for treasons and rebellions bitterlie extinguisht and ouerthrowne; onelie one sonne of the said earles is left, and yet prisoner in the Tower of London. The two doctors, Allen & Sanders, who were the holie fathers legats and nuncios, and in their foolish fantasies dreamed that they had the holie ghost at commandement, and yet most errant traitors against the lords anointed: the one of them lifting by his sword against his sacred maiestie, under the popes banner at Spounster, one thousand five hundred threescore and ninetye, was slaine and killed: the other, after that he had followed the heeles of the Desmonds almost foure yeares, wandering to and fro in the woods & bogs, died most miserable in the wood of Cleneles, in such diseases as famine and penurie vnto him. The Romans and Spaniards, and the strangers which were sent from the pope and king Philip, with all their comforts and companies, verie few left of them to returne home, and to carie newes of their successe; but were all put to the sword. And as for the great companies of sculbiers, galloglasses, kerne, & the common people, who followed this rebellion, the numbers of them are infinit, whose bloods the earth dranke vp, and whose carcasses the foules of the aire and the rauening beasts of the field did consume and deuoure. After this followed an extreme famine: and such as whom the sword did not despoile, the same did consume, and eat out; verie few or none remaining alieue, saving such as dwelled in cities and towne, and such as were fled therinto England: and yet the store in the towne was verie far spent, and they in distresse, albeit nothing like in comparisn to them who liued at large. For they were not onelie drinen to eat houses, bogs, and dead carions; but also did deuoure the carcasses of dead men, whereof there be sundrie examples: namelie one in the countie of Corke, where when a malefactor was executed to death, and his bodie left vpon the gallows, certaine poore people secretlie came, toke him downe, and did eat him. Likewise in the date of Somereweke, or Saint Marie weke, the place which was first seasoned with this rebellion, there happened a ship to be there lost through foule weather, and all the men being drowned, were there cast on land.

The common people, who had a long time lived on limpets, oyster shells, and such shellfish as they could find, and which were now spent; as soon as they saw these dead bodies, they took them up, and most greedily did eat and devour them: and not long after, death and famine did eat and consume them. The land it selfe, which before those wars was populous, well inhabited, and rich in all the good blessings of God, being plentiful of corne, full of cattell, well stored with fish and sundrie other good commodities, is now become wast and barren, yielding no fruits, the pastures no cattell, the fields no corne, the aire no birds, the seas (though full of fish) yet to them yielding nothing. Finally, euerie wate the curse of God was so great, and the land so barren both of man and beast, that whosoever did trauell from the one end vnto the other of all Spounster, euen from Waterford to the head of Smarewacke, which is about six score miles, he should not meet anie man, woman, or child, sauing in towne and cities; nor yet see anie beast, but the verie wolues, the foxes, and other like rauening beasts: manie of them late dead being famished, and the residue gone else where. A heauie, but a iust iudgement of God vpon such a Pharisaicall and stiffnecked people, who by no persuasions, no counsels, and no reasons, would be reclaimed and reduced to serue God in true religion, and to obey their most lawfull prince in dutifull obedience; but made choise of a wicked dole, the god spasm to honor, and of that wicked antichrist of Rome to obey, vnto the bitter euershow of themselves and of their posteritie. This is the godnesse that cometh from that great citie vpon the seven hills, and that mightie Babylon, the mother of all wickednesse & abominations vpon the earth. These be the fruits which come from that holie father, master pope, the sonne of sathan, and the man of sinne, and the enimie vnto the crosse of Christ, whose blood thirstinesse will neuer be quenched, but in the blood of the saints, and the seruants of God; and whose rauening guts be neuer satisfied, but with the death of such as do serue the Lord in all godlines, & who will not be drunken in the cup of his fornications: as it doth appere by the infinit & most horrible massacres, and bloodie persecutions, which he daillie exerciseth throughout all christian lands. Which bicane he can not performe also within the realmes of England & Ireland, what practises hath he made by enchantments, sozceries, witchcrafts, & treasons to bereane his maiestie of his life: What deuises hath he vied to raise vp his owne subjects to rebellions and commotions, to supplant him of his roiall estate and government: What practises hath he vied with forren princes and potentates, to seeke occasions of breaches of peace and raisings of warres: And how craftilie hath he suborned his unholie & traitorous Iesuits, vnder colour of holines, to range from place to place through his maiesties realmes, and to moue and persuade his people from dutifull obedience vnto his highnesse, and to denie his supreme authoritie and government: Finally, how doth he from time to time like a rauening wolfe seeke the denouring of him, and of all his good subjects, which liue in the feare of God, and in the religion established vpon his holie word and gospel: Whereof hath ensued the losse of infinit thousands of people, as therof manie apparant examples are set downe and recorded in the histories of England; but of them all, none more lamentable than is this historie of Ireland, and especially this tragedie of Spounster. In which it doth appere, how that for the maintenance of the popes quarels, the earth hath drunken by the blood, the souls of the aire haue preied, and the beasts of the field haue deuoured the carcases of infinit multitudes & numbers of people. Which if euerie man would well looke into and consider, the vngodlie shall see the great iudgements of God, and his seuerer iustice against all such as shall dishonor his holie name; and against such as shall rebell and resist against his anointed: that thereby they may repent, amend their liues, and be conuerted vnto the Lord, both in true religion towards him, and in all dutifull obedience to his anointed. And the god and goodlie shall see, and thereby consider the great good mercies shewed vpon them, in that he hath and continuallie doth preserve and keepe them from out of the salues of the lion in all safetie, that they should daillie more and more grow from grace to grace, and liue in all holinesse and vertue towards him, and persist in all dutifull obedience vnto his maiestie our soueraigne ladie and quene; whose daies the Lord God continue and prolong to reigne ouer vs to his good will and pleasure: and so shall we his people see good daies, liue in securitie, and the peace of Israel shall be vpon vs.

Cum privilegio Regie Majestatis.

To the Right worshipfull Maister Thomas Secford Esquire and Maister of the Requests, William Harison wisheth all knowledge of God, with dailie increase of his gifts at this present, and in the world to come life everlasting.

Having by your singular curtesie received great help in my description of the riuers & streames of Britaine, and by conference of my trauell with the platforms of those few shires of England which are by your infinite charges already finished (as the rest shall be in time by Gods helpe, for the inestimable benefit of such as inhabit this lland) not a little polished those rough courses of diuers waters not exactly before time described by Leland our countrieman, or any ancient writer, I could not deuise any thing more agreeable with mine abilitie and your good nature (which greatlie fauoureth any thing that is doone for a commoditie vnto many) than to shew some token of my thankfulness for these your manifold kindneses, by the dedication of my simple translation of the description of Scotland at this time vnto your worship.

Indeed the trauell taken heerein is not great, because I tie not my translation vnto his letter, neither the treatise of it selfe such, as taketh vp any huge roome in the volume of this chronicle. But such as it is, and whatsoeuer it is, I yeeld it wholie vnto you, as a testimonie of my good will, which detesteth vtterlie to receiue any benefit, though it be neuer so small, and not to be thankfull for it. Certes my vocation is such, as calleth me to a farre other kind of studie, so that I exercise these things onlie for recreation sake, & to saie the truth, it is much vnfitting for him that professeth Diuinitie, to applie his time any otherwise vnto contemplation of ciuill histories. And this is the cause wherfore I haue chosen rather, on-

lie with the losse of three or foure daies to translate Hector out of the Scotish (a toong verie like vnto ours) than with more expence of time to deuise a new, or follow the Latine copie, which is far more large and copious. How excellentlie if you consider the art, Boetius hath penned it, and the rest of his historie in Latine, the skilfull are not ignorant: but how profitablie and compendiously John Bellenden archdeacon of Murrey his interpreter hath turned him from the Latine into the Scotish toong, there are verie few Englishmen that know, bicause we want the books.

Wherefore sith the learned read him in his owne stile, and his countrimen in their naturall language, why should not we borrow his description, and read the same in English likewise, sith the knowledge therof may redound to the great benefit of so manie as read or heare the same? Accept therefore (right worshipfull) this my simple offer, and although I assure my selfe, your naturall inclination to be such, as that it will take nothing in ill part that is well meant toward you, how rudelic soeuer it be handled in the doing, yet I will not let to craue pardon for my presumption, in that I dare be so bold as to offer such a trifle to you, whom more weightie affaires doo dailie call from things of so small importance.

Almightie God keepe your worship from time to time in his feare, and bleesse you and my good ladie your wife with such increase of his benefits, as may most redound to his glorie, & your own aduantage.

The bounds of Albion with the sundrie commodities thereof, and of the great infirmities that fall vnto the people there for their intemperancie, and final-lie of the religion vsed there in old time.

The first Chapter.

The Ile of Albion containeth in the whole circumference, 2 99. miles, having in length 700, & in breadth 300, as appeareth well by the coast therof that doth lie ouer against France where it is broadest, and from whence it gathereth narrower and narrower, till it come to the utter marches & last bounds of England and Scotland. For betwixt the Gule of Gallowaie that is on the west side ouer against the Irish seas, and saint Ebbes head, that lieth vpon the Germane ocean toward the east, are scarcelie 130 miles, and thenceforth it groweth smaller and smaller till it touch vpon the north seas, where it is not aboue thirtie miles, as I noted befoze in the description of Britaine.

This Ile is replenished with people, horses, and all other kind of cattell and cozne in most abundant maner, except it be in such places where as God of his singular godnesse hath otherwise indued the soile with rich mines of gold, silver, tin, brasse, copper, and quicksilver, which for the most part are so plentifull, that they suffice not onlie for the necessaries of the whole Iland, but also of sundrie regions that are situated round about it, if the inhabitants were skilfull and painefull to deale withall accordinglie. But the abundance of all other things requisite for the vse of man, that is found generallie in our Iland, maketh the people lesse carefull of these commodities, and moze giuen to idleness. For beside the great plentie of those things which heauen and earth do minister, as grasse, cozne and cattell, foules of sundrye kinds, there is such store of fish in all parties of our seas, especiallie towards the north, that the same would suffice to feed and susteine all the people of the Iland, if there were none other commodities to be found within the same.

For the inhabitants of all countries that border vpon vs, as France, Flanders, Zealand, Holland, and a great part of Germanie (especiallie those which lie nere vnto the coast) do faile hither with great numbers of vessels daile to fish vpon our coasts, and buy such as we haue already caught, not onlie for their owne vse, but also for the Lenton prouision of such nations as lie vpon the Leuant seas, where they sell the same at their owne wils, with very speedie utterance. Manie other rich and pretious commodities are to be gotten in the said Ile, whereof the afozenamed nations do make no small account, beside these common things. What shall I saie of our woolles, which are in so high estimation in all lands, because of their necessarie vses, and whereof a great part is so fine and soft, that of it are made the costlie scarlets, pliant gloues, and manie other grained and delicate clothes, of which I thought good to make this mention, because the report thereof is not yet made common and generallie knowne to all men.

Diomphus Alexandrinus saith that the wool of Brit-taine is often spun so fine that it is in manner comparable to the spiders draught.

Certes this I dare boldly affirme, that if the kingdoms of Britaine had such grace giuen them from aboue, as that they might once liue in vnitie, or by any means be brought vnder the subiection of one prince, they should per long seele such a fauour in this amitie, that they would not onlie liue franklie of their own, without any foren purchase of things, but also resist all outward inuasion, with small trauell and lesse damage. For as touching their persons, and likewise their notable wits, apt both for the attaining of learning and knowledge of handicrafts, they are inferiour to no other nation. Therevnto we find them to be couragious and hardie, offering themselves often vnto the uttermost perils with great assurance, so that a man may pronounce nothing to be ouerhard or past their power to per-forme, if they would giue themselves to liue temperatelie, and follow their predecessors in moderation of diet.

Wherefore it is (as I thinke) that almightie God in his prouident disposition of all things, hath ordeined their grounds (otherwise plentifullie indued with all kinds of commodities) to be destitute and void of wine; as foresaieing that the said liquoz, which bringeth greatest benefit vnto other countries, would grow in the end to be most pernicious & noisome to them.

them. For they are giuen to such vnnaturall rauen-ning and greedie desire of forreine things (whilst they contemne or not regard their owne) that they cannot refraine the immoderate vse of wine, and excesse vsed in drincking of the same; insomuch that we may see diuerse to be ouertaken and haunted, not onelie with sundrie kinds of grieuous maladies common to vs and them of the maine, but also manie other which they haue not, neither be anie thing at all acquainted with, as experience daillie teacheth.

Some by long sicknesse and languishing græfes do grow into such deformitie onelie through excessiue feeding, and greedie abuse of wine, that if you knew them when they were children & yong men, you shall hardlie remember them when they be old and aged; and that which more is, in comparison of other that liue more soberlie, you will hardlie thinke them to be borne in the Ile, but rather suppose them to be changelings and monsters, brought out of other countries to gaze and loke vpon: diuerse of them through the continuall vse of wine are molested in their age, with phreneticall pangs and passions. Seldome also shall you see those that are giuen much vnto wine and such welfare, to become parents of manie children, sith their naturall moisture and generatiue force is much abated, if not altogether extinguished by such immoderate diet.

But to returne to our purpose, the Albanes or Britains, as Caesar in his commentaries, and Tacitus in his annales do report, were very religious, after the manner of religion vsed in old time. For in those daies the priests of Britaine named Druides, were expert both in naturall and morall philosophie, and from thence came the first professors of that sect and opinion into France. The principall seat of their priests was in the Ile of Man, which was reputed at that season for the wellspring and fountaine of all learning and knowledge, and after that their priests were once conuerted to the catholike faith, they persevered in the same with great constancie, without anie note of heresie.

The description of the east, west, and middle borders of Scotland, with the most notable townes and flouds thereof.

The second Chapter.

The Picts had sometimes the principall and most fertile part of that countrie, which now is vnder the regiment of the Scots, and after they had continued in the same by the space of 1171 yeares, ioined in maner in perpetuall league with the Scots, and mainteining mutuallie the warres sometimes with the Britains and Romans, and sometimes also tarring with their Scotish neighbours, at the last they fell into extreme hatred one of another, till it was brought to passe by the diuine providence, that the said Picts were ouerthrowne, their name extinguished, and the kingdome united vnto that other of the Scots for euermore. After this time furthermore, although the Scots haue bene verie oftentimes assailed with most dangerous and terrible wars, and oftentimes inuaied by enimies from diuers regions, yet such hath bene the fauour of almightie God towards them, that still they flourish and reteine their estate inviolate.

Whatsoever we haue generallie spoken of Albion, that is chieflie to be vnderstood of the Scots, and farre greater, especiallie among the Scots, as they call them in the high land, as people that haue lesse to do with forreine merchants, and therefore are lesse delicate, and not so much corrupted with strange bloud and alliance. Hereby in like sort it commeth to passe, that they are more hard of constitution of bodie, to beare off the cold blaies, to watch better, and absteine long, wherunto also it ap-peareth that they are bold, nimble, and thereto more skilfull in the warres. As for their faith and promise, they hold it with greatest constancie, as Hector hath set downe. Towards the Almaine sea, I find, that Scotland hath the Mers, sometime the most plentious region of the Picts for their march, which so long as the said people did inhabit it, was called Deera, or Dere; but after their expulsion, it was named Mers, that is to say, the marches or limits of their countrie. In procelle of time also the Scots extended their bounds even vnto the Tweed, which now diuideth Northumberland from the Mers.

On the other side of the countrie towards the west, sundrie small bournes descend from the Cheriot hilles, and other mounteines lieng thereabout into the Solue, diuiding Cumberland from Annan-dale, and so being brought into one channell, they fall together into the Irish ocean, & stand for the bounds of Scotland vpon that halfe of the countrie. The Cheriot hilles are in like sort taken for the middle marches of the region, which with certeine small brookes that fall from the same, do separate both the countries, wherby their limits are knowne. The Mers hath vnder marches at seuerall places (whither it is extended) as sometime the Germane sea, sometime east Louthian, sometime the Tweed, and sometime the Forth, and among manie strong holds and castles, that stand vpon the borders, is the towne and castell of Barwike in time past called Ordolucium, as the inhabitants are called Ordoluci (if Hector be not deceiued.)

The Tweed springeth out from a meane head, and after his augmentation with other small waters that fall into the same, it descendeth with a large course into the Almaine sea. Beyond the Tweed, to the middle march vnder the Cheriot hilles lieth Teuidale, that is to say, the vale of Tiffe: beyond it is Eskdale, or the vale of Eske, of a riuer so called that runneth through the same: ouer against Eske-dale on the other side lieth Cusdale, so named of the riuer Cus that passeth thereby, and falleth into the water of Annand: but Tiff and Eske do run into the Tweed: furthermore, on the west side ouer against the Irish sea, lieth Annandale, wherunto the Annamd water giueth denomination, which marcheth sometimes without the bounds of Middledale, where all the three riuers aforesaid, that is to say, Cus, Annand and Sulway descend together in one bottome into the Irish seas.

In Annandale is a loch or lake named Lochmaben, fife miles in length and foure in bredth, not onlie verie full of fish, but of such kind as few men are acquainted with. Beside this lake also there is a castell of the same name, builded of purpose to re-streine the furious dealing of theues which do great hurt in those quarters. For not onlie in Annandale, but in all the dales or vales afoze rehearsed, are manie strong theues, which often spoile the countrie, and exercise much cruell slaughter vpon such as inhabit there, in anie troublous time. These robbers (because the English do border vpon their drie marches, and are their perpetuall enimies) do often make forceable rodes into the English bounds, for their better maintenance and sustentation, or else they

they suffer paine from them, as men leading in the meane season a poore beggerlie and verie miserable life. In the time of peace also, they are so inbred to theft and rapine, that they cannot leave off to steale at home: and notwithstanding that they be often verie sore handled therefore, yet they thinke it praise-worthie to molest their aduersarie, as they call the tract forth, whereby it cometh to passe, that manie rich and fertile places of Scotland lie wast and void of culture for feare of their inuasion.

Not far from the Sulwaie (a water where great plenty of fish is to be had) are manie quicke-sands, and those so perillous that no man may well go ouer the same, but with great difficultie and danger of his life. This bale of Annand was sometime called Ordouicia, and the people thereof Ordouices, whose ancient barbarousnesse is reported to be such, that in times past they refused not to kill and eate such prisoners as had yielded themselves vnto them. The verie women in like sort would slea their husbands, if at anye time they fled from the field, and returned to their houses, onelie to giue occasion vnto other men to stand to their tacklings at euery such aduventure. On the west borders and also toward the northlieh Fiddesdale, so called of the water of Fiddes. It beginneth with a verie narrow course, and increasing bodie in the middle marches of Scotland, it finally restraineth it selfe againe, till it cometh at the sea, whither it runneth with a swift course, as the Scottish writers doe report. In this bale standeth a towne named Dunfrie, wherein manie fine clothes speciallie whites are made, which are brought by and caried into England, France, Flanders, and Germanie, where they are had in great price and estimation.

The description of Gallowaie; Kile, Carricke, and Cuninghame, with the notable townes, lakes and riuers in the same.

The third Chapter.

ABoue Fiddesdale is Gallowaie (named sometimes Brigantia) the people where of were in times past called Brigantes: this region is diuided by the water of Cree into two parts, whereof that which lieth nearest to Fiddesdale, is called nether Gallowaie, and the other that is aboue the Cree is named vpper Gallowaie. In nether Gallowaie is Kirkcubright, a rich towne and of a good trade in merchandize, and in vpper Gallowaie is Whitherne, in Latine Candida Casa, an abbete dedicated to saint Iohn the bishop, and there lieth his carcase, which is honozed of the people with great superstition and errour. Aboue Whitherne is Wigton towne, and not far from thence is the great lake of Sperton, the one halfe whereof doth freeze by naturall congelation as other poles and plashes doe; but the other is neuer seene to beare anye yce at all, which vnto me doth seeme to be a great wonder. In Gallowaie moreover are two other lakes, the Salset and the Pentramen, of equall length and breadth with the Lochminton; as for Gallowaie it selfe, it yeldeth out a great point, promontorie, or cape (which the Scots call a mule or nuke) into the Irish sea. The common sort name it the moles nuke, and by the rounding of it selfe, it maketh two great lakes, named Kean and Lois, except I be deceiued, one of these lakes or poles is 30, and the other 16, miles of length, and both full of oysters, heerings, congers, cockles, and other like kinds of fish.

Some are of the opinion that Brigantia was the same region of Britaine that is now called Wales, wherein the Britains inhabited manie yeares after their expulsion out of Britaine. But this opinion is false, with the Romans write that Span the Island lieth ouer against Brigantium and midwaie betwene the same and Ireland: for albeit that the bates or bates are now become wider & further distant each from other by the washing and working of the sea, yet the same latitude & elevation of the pole that Ptolomee ascribed to the Brigantes, agreeth well to the height of the pole ouer Gallowaie, which is verie far from Wales, sithens the Ile of Span lieth also 300 miles from thence, and in the sight of Gallowaie. In like sort by the testimonie of sundrie authors both Irish and Spanishe (we asseme that out of Brigantium a citie in Spaine, now named Compostella) there came a newe companie of people into Ireland called Spaniards, and out of Ireland another crew of the same nation with king Fergus into Albion, and in remembrance of the citie Brigance, wherein they inhabited whilist they were in Spaine, they called themselves Brigantes. To this opinion in like sort Cornelius Tacitus doth seeme to leane, who saith, that the Brigantes descended from the Spaniards, which in his time dwelled in the uttermost parts of Britaine, including vnder that name all the Ile of Albion. These regions afore rehearsed, that is to say, Annandale, Fiddesdale, and Gallowaie, beside fine wools and store of cattell, doth also abound with all kinds of graine, wheate onelie excepted.

Aboue Gallowaie is Carricke, sometime a portion of the region of the Silures, of whose name it is not yet certeinlie knowne, whether it was deriued from the famous citie Carricke, whose ruines doe yet remaine, or not. Silurie is diuided into three parts, to wit, Carricke, Kile, and Cuninghame. In the first, as I said, was Carricke the noble citie: and in this countrie are manie strong castels, both by naturall situation and policie of man: herein also are faire kine and oxen, whose flesh is delicate and verie tender to be eaten, the fallow moreouer of their wombs is so moist and sapie that it neuer wareth hard, but relenteth of the stone accord, and becometh like vnto oile. Beyond Carricke is Kile, so called of Coile king of Britaine, sometime slaine in the said region, and therein is a stone, not much aboue 12 miles from the towne of Air, full 30 foot high, and three elns of breadth, called the deafe stone, not without cause: for when a man is on the one side thereof, he shall not heare what is said or done on the other, though there be neuer so great noise made, no not if a canon should be discharged of set purpose; which to me doth seeme impossible, neuertheless the further a man standeth from the same, the better shall he heare, whatsoever the noise be. Next to Kile is Cuninghame the third part of Silurie, whose inhabitants in time past were most noisome to the Romans. In Kile is a pole named Downe, from whence the riuier Downe doth runne through the middelt of that region into the Irish sea. In Cuninghame likewise is a lake called Carnoth, equall in quantitie vnto the Downe, and no lesse famous for the abundance of fish that is daillie found therein; and not farre from the same is the towne called Largs, where Alexander the third king of Scotland of that name, sometime ouercame the Danes and Norwegians, whereby it grew to be famous, and of more reputation among vs.

The description of Scotland.

The situation of Renfrew, Clidestdale, Lennox, Lowmound, Argile, Louchquhaber, Lorne, and Kentire, with all the notable things contained in the same.

The fourth Chapter.

The water of Clide issueth Lennor on the north side from the baronie of Renfrew, and it ariseth out of the same hill in Calidow wood, from whence the Annand falleth, and goeth with a long course into the Irish sea; some call this riuer Gluda, and Cluda; but Tacitus nameth it Clota. Not far also from the fountaines of Clide, ariseth the water of Forth, that runneth on the contrarie side into the Germane ocean. In like sort after the water of Clide hath run for a season toward the north, it gathereth somewhat inward, till it come to the mountaine of Granzeben, & from thence holdeth on with a swift course, till it fall (as I said) into the Irish seas. The countrie where it runneth is named Clidestdale. Betwixt Clide and Lennor lieth the baronie of Renfrew, wherein are two poles named Dubinsouth and Leboth, of which the first is 12 miles in compasse, the other 20, and both verie rich and plentifull of fish. But in Lennor, that lieth next aboute Renfrew toward the ocean (called by Ptolomie Helgonia) is a great mere or lake that hight Lochmond, of 24 miles in length, and eight in breadth, and within this thin or pole are 30 Islands, well replenished with churches and dwelling houses.

And in the same also are three things worthy consideration, whereof the first is, that the pleasant and verie delicat fishes there bred do want fins. The second is, that the water will often swell with huge waues though no wind be stirring, and that in such wise that the best mariners in the countrie dare not adventure to saile thereon. There is also a verie fruitfull and commodious Ile therein, verie necessarie for the pasturage of cattell, which fleteth hither and thither as the wind bloweth. This lake is situate at the foot of the hill called Granzeben, which were sometime the marches or limits betwixt the Scots and Picts, and are extended from Lochlowmund to the mouth of Dee. Certes the Picts had no part of the countrie beyond the Granzeben, nor toward the Irish seas, for this region was inhabited by the Scots. Eight miles from Lochlowmund is the castell of Dumbritteine named sometime Alclud, and here the water of Leuen falleth into the Clide.

Beyond Lochlowmund is Argile, an hillie countrie and full of crags and mounteins, therein also are two lakes, Lochfine & Lochquho, that diuide the region into three parts, that in the middelt being called Inapdale. In Lochfine is more plentie of hering than in anie part of the coast that compasseth the Island, but in Lochquho are such kinds of fish to be vsualle had, as are commonlie bred in fresh waters. There are moreouer in Argile two castels, Glenunquhart and Enconell, & in it are 12 Isles, whose chiefe commoditie resteth rather in pasturage for cattell, than abundance of graine. In Argile furthermore are manie rich mines full of mettall, but the people there haue no skill to find and trie out the same. The constant report also goeth there, how there is a stone of such nature, that if it be hidden in straw for a certaine season, it will kindle of it selfe, and consume the straw to ashes. There are seuen other lakes in Argile, whereof some are thirtie miles in length and breadth, and other lesse.

It was told me once by Doncan Campbell a noble knight, that out of Garloll, one of the poles of Argile, there came a terrible beast, in the peare of Grace 1510, which was of the bignesse of a grethound, and looked like a gander, and issuing out of the water earlie in the morning about midsummer time, did verie easilie and without anie visible force or streining of himselfe ouerthrow huge oaks with his taile, & therevnto killed three men out-right that hunted him with three stroks of his said taile, the rest of them saving themselves in trees thereabouts, whilst the foresaid monster returned to the water. Those that are giuen to the obseruations of rare and vncomon sights, beleue that this beast is neuer sene but against some great trouble & mischiefe to come vpon the realme of Scotland. For it hath bene described also before that time, although not verie often. Lorne abutteth vpon Argile, which was once a part of Argile, and reacheth out into the Irish sea, in manner of a cape or tong, full firtie miles. This point also was called Nouantia, but now it is named Kintire (that is to saie) the head of Lorne, whose vttermost part is not full 16 miles from Ireland. Some authours affirme, that both Argile and Cantire, were called Nouantia in old time, sith Ptolomie maketh no mention of Argile in his cosmographie. In this Lorne is great abundance of barleie, which the Scots call beir. Beyond Lorne is Lochquhaber, heretofore a portion of Murrey land, verie rich in mines of iron and lead, and no lesse beneficiall to the countrie in all kinds of cattell.

There are likewise manie woods, manie lakes, and manie fiers, but two of them are most notable for the plentie of samonis, and other delicate fish, as well of the salt as fresh water, which be there taken, and almost without anie trauell; neither is there anie where else in all the Ile such store. The one of these is named Lochtie, & the other Spanze, but vpon what occasion these names were giuen to them I find as yet no certaintie. The Lochtie riseth not above eight miles from Lochnes, and falleth beneath the same into the Germane ocean, and beside it, there is a rockie crag, running out at length into the sea, named Hardnomoxth. In the mouth of Lochtie likewise was sometime a rich towne named Inuerlochtie, whither the merchants of France & Spaine did make their daillie resort, till at the last it was so defaced by the warres of the Danes, that it neuer was able since the said time to recouer hir pishinate renowne. But whether the negligence of the due repaire of this towne, proceedeth of the sloth of our people, or hatred that some enuious persons do beare to cities and walled townes in our countrie, as yet it is vncertaine. Beyond Lochtie is the castell of Dunstafage, in time past named Euonium: beyond Dunstafage also is the mouth of the water of Spanze, where it falleth (as I heare) into the Germane ocean.

The discourse of Ros, Stranauerne, & Murrey land, with the lakes, riuers, and notable townes in them.

The fifth Chapter.

Byond the water of Spanze lieth Ros, sometime called Lugia, a verie narrow region (God it wote) but running out in great length through the middelt of

of the Island, being enuironed on both sides with the ocean. That portion thereof which lieth nearest to the Irish seas, is verie difficult for such as trauell by the countrie, by reason of the high mounteins, which maketh the countrie more apt for wild beasts than mankind to inhabit: neuertheless waing more fertill on that part which stretcheth toward the German sea, it yeldeth it selfe to culture, and rendzeth some graine. In pasture also it is not altogether vnprofitable, with there is good grasse and verie batable for their heards: for the ballies there, being watered with sundrie pleasant streames, doe yeld a sweet and verie sauozie grasse, wherewith all sorts of cattell are verie much delighted. In Kos are sundrie lakes, but Lochbun is the greatest. There are also manie fresh rivers, fraught with excellent fish, and finally a notable firth or safe haven called Cromart, wherunto diuers in time of necessitie doe resort, to auoid the danger of shipwacke, that otherwise would assuredly annoy them. The Scottish men call it Weill of shipmen. In this region moreover is the towne called Thane, where the bones of Dutho an holy man (as they say) doe rest, & are had in greater estimation among the superstitious sort (as sometime ouer the whole Island) than the holie gospel of God and merits of his sonne, whereby we are onelie saued. Two ancient houses are likewise maintained in one vale of the Kos, whose formes resemble so manie belles, but to what end as yet I doe not find. Pert vnto the said Kos lieth the Stranauerne, the coasts whereof abutting for a while vpon the Deucalidon sea, doe afterward turne againe toward the Almain seas, hauing partlie the Deucalidon coast, and partlie Cathnesse vpon the north side, Southerland on the east, Kosla on the south, and Deucalidon againe vpon the west. There are three great crags or points lieng on the uttermost side of Stranauerne, that is to saie, the Hole, Holobun (the greatest of the three) and Dobu niste, which because they shoo farre off into the sea, doe make two great firths and lakes, each of them being severallie distinguished from other.

Pert vnto Cathnesse lieth Southerland, a profitable region both for graine and all kinds of prouision, but chiefe for the nourishment of bestiall, wherunto it chiefele inclineth, as doe the other two last before rehearsed. On the further side also of this, lieth Murrey land, sometime called Vararis, although the marches thereof are changed from that they were of old. For whereas in time past all the region lieng betwene Spaine and Pesse to the Irish sea, was named Murrey, now it is knowne to be wille beyond the water of Spaine & Balloche, & reacheth on vntill it come to the Irish sea. Betwixt Kos and Murrey land, is a great bay, and likewise a descent of sundrie waters: for therinto fall the Pesse, Parden, Findorne, Los and Spaine, whereof this latter runneth with so fierce & violent a streame, that the force of the sea at the flood struing to enter into the same, is put back, & may not resist the inuincible fall, and beates backe the water that descendeth into the ocean. The Pesse issueth out of a lake of the same name (which is not passing 8 miles from the said plash, from whence the Lochie runneth) & thence goeth into the Irish seas: and this propertie it hath, that neither the streame, neither the lake it selfe will yeld to be frozen in the verie deepe of winter. Such also is the force thereof, that if anie yce or anie frozen substance be cast therein; it will by and by relent and dissolve againe to water, whereby it becommeth verie profitable for such cattell as are benumbed with cold. In the mouth of the Pesse, standeth a towne called Inuernelle, where sometime was great abundance of herring taken, but now they be gone by the secret working of God. The common people put the fault in the rich & men of higher calling, who enuieng the commoditie of the poore inhabitants, will often seme to bereue them of this emolument, by force and slaughter. Wherupon (as they say) it commeth to passe, that the increase of swines decayeth, and verie small store is taken there by manie yeares after such iniurie offered.

But to proceed: beside Lochnesse, which is 24 miles of length, and foure in breadth, by reason of the great woods there standing, is great store of sauage beasts, as harts, wild horses, roes, and such like. There are likewise martins, beuers, fores & wezels, whose skins and cafes are sold vnto strangers at huge and exorbitant prices. In Murrey land also is not alonely great plenty of wheat, barlie, otes, and such like graine, beside nuts and apples, but likewise of all kinds of fish, and especiallie of samon. The people thereof in like sort doe vse a strange manner of fishing: for they make a long woele of twicker, narrow necked, and wide mouthed, with such cunning, that when the tide commeth, the fish shoot themselves into the same, and forthwith are so inclosed, that whilst the tide lasteth he cannot get out, nor after the water is gone escape the hands of the fishers. In this region moreover is a lake named Spiney, wherein is exceeding plenty of swans.

The cause of their increase in this place is ascribed to a certaine herbe, which groweth there in great abundance, and whose seed is verie pleasant vnto the said foule in the eating, wherefore they call it Swangits: and hereunto such is the nature of the same, that where it is once sowne or planted, it will neuer be destroyed, as may be proued by experience. For albeit that this lake be five miles in length, and was sometime within the remembrance of man verie well stored with samon and other fish, yet after that this herbe began to multiplie vpon the same, it became so shallow, that one may now wade through the greatest part thereof, by meanes whereof all the great fishes there be vtterlie consumed. In this portion furthermore, is the church of Pette, where the bones of little John remaine in great estimation. Certes his carcase hath bene 14 foot long, his members well proportioned according to his stature, and not fullie six yeeres before this booke was written (by Boetius) he saw his hanch bone, which seemed so great as the whole thigh of a man, and he did thrust his arme into the hollownesse thereof, whereby it appeareth what mightie people grew vp in our region before they were overcome with glattonte and excess. In this quarter finally is the towne called Elgin, not farre from the mouth of Spaine, and therein is a cathedrall church furnished with canons: there are thereto sundrie rich and verie wealthie abbeies in Murrey, as Killos of the order of the Cisterciars, and Bluscardie of the Cluniaks.

This swan no Scot but an Englishman, fled into Ireland, and then into Scotland

Of Boene, Anze, Buchquhane, Mar, Mernis, Fiffe, and Angus, with the lakes, floods, abbies, townes, and other notable things contained in the same.

The sixth Chapter.

Next vnto the Murrey lieth Boene, and Anze, two fertill and plentifull regions, which extend their bounds euen vnto the seas. They are both verie notable indowed with batable pastures, and by reason thereof are verie full of

of cattell, they yeld mozeouer excellent coze, and by meanes of their large woods and forrests not without great stoe of wild beasts of sundrie kinds and natures. Peere also vnto the Douerne water, which is a riuier maruellouslie stoez with fish, standeth a towne named Bamse, and vnder these two regions aforesaid lieth Buchquhane, a verie batable soile for all kinds of cattell, but especiallie of sheepe, whose wolle excēdeth that of the like beast of all other countries thereabouts for whitenesse and fineness. The riuers that are in this countrie do in like maner abound with samons, so that there is no one of them void of this commoditie, except the Kattra onellie, wherein it is not heard that anie hath bene scene: herein also standeth the castell of Slanis, in which the high constable of Scotland dwelleth, and nere vnto the same is a marvellous caue: for the water that dropeth into the same, in a short processe of time becommeth an hard white stone, and except they had bene off remoued heretofore, the caue it selfe had bene filled by with the same manie peeres agone.

This region is void of rats, and such is the nature thereof, that if anie be brought thither from other places, they are found to die immediatlie: finally it is most marvellous of all, that as otes do grow there in manie places of themselves without culture and tillage; so if a man come thither of set purpose to mow downe the same, he shall find nothing els but emptie huls and straw: but if he chance vpon the sudden and without premeditation of the thing to cut downe anie (a matter impossible in my mind) he shall find them so good and full as anie are elsewhere, to be gathered and led home. Certes it appeareth hereby, that this is nothing else but an illusion, wherewith the wicked feends do captivate and blind the senses of the superstitious sort; for that it should be so by nature, it is a thing altogether impossible. Pert vnto this lieth the great region of Par, which is verie plentifull of cattell, and extendeth 60 miles in length, from the Almaine seas to Wozzenoch. In this is the citie of Aberdeen, wherein is a bishops see, and noble vniuersitie, sometime founded by William Elphinston bishop there. This citie lieth betwixt two rich riuers, the Done and the Dee, wherein is the greatest stoe of samons that is to be found againe within the compasse of Albion, and likewise the greatest and longest if you respect their quantitie.

Pert vnto Par, we haue Pernts toward the sea, a verie fat soile, full of pasture, and abundantlie replenished with euerie sort of cattell. In this portion standeth Dunnoter the marshall of Scotlands house, and likewise the towne of Foridon, in which the bones of Palladius do rest, who is taken generally for the apostle of our nation. The water of Esk is bound vnto this region, which is otherwise called Fortheske, a verie dangerous chanell, and wherein mighte haue perished for default of a bydge, as they haue attempted to passe and repasse ouer the same. Angus bordereth vpon the Pernts, it was sometime part of Wozzenoch, and now watered with three notable riuers, as the Fortheske already mentioned, and maruellouslie replenished with samons, likewise the Southeske; and finally the Tait, the noblest water in all Scotland, and remembred by the Romane writers vnder the name of Tan.

In Angus also is an high mountaine or promontorie, called the Red bzaes, which lieth out far off into the Almaine seas. The Tait also riseth farre beyond the mounteins of Cranzen out of loch Tait, which is a pole of 24 miles of length, and 10 of breadth, wherein are not onelie diuers Islands, with castles in them, but the water of the lake it selfe (being most fine and subtile) is notablie replenished with great stoe of fish, and therefore verie commodious for such as dwell about it. It falleth into the Almaine sea beside Dundee, a towne called in old time Alecum, wherein I was bozne, and in which the people trauell verie painfullie about weauing and making of cloth. There are in Angus also manie other cities and rich abbeies, as Mountros, Bzechin, and Forfaire, beside so manie castles as lieth not in me to number. This likewise is not to be passed ouer with silence, that whereas Forfaire was in times past a notable citie, strengthened with two roiall castles, as the ruines do yet declare, now it is brought vnto little more than a countrie village, replenished with simple cotages. Manie lakes & poles are also in Angus, and those well fraught with fish. There is also in this countrie one place called the vale of Eske, whose sheepe haue such white, fine, and excellent wolle, as the like vnto it is hardlie to be found againe within the whole Island.

After we be ouer the Tait, we come vnto Fife, sometime a part of Ottoline. In this region groweth all maner of graine so plentifulle as elsewhere in anie part of Albion; and where no coze is, there is no lesse foison of cattell. There are blacke stones also digged out of the ground, which are verie good for firing, and such is their intollerable heat, when they are kindled, that they resolute and melt iron, and therefore are verie profitable for smiths, and such artificers as deale with other mettals; neither are they found anie where else (that I do know of) but betwene the Tait and the Tine within the whole Island. Salt is likewise made within this region in great quantitie of sea water, which they boile according to their maner. There are furthermore sundrie citis in the same, of which S. Andrews is the chiefe, wherein is both the see of an archbishop and a famous vniuersitie. There are mozeouer sundrie lakes, as loch Torre and loch Lenin, and in this later are diuerse Isles, and in one of them also the church of S. Phillane, a Scottish saint, of no small name and reputation.

Fife is diuided of Lowthian by the riuier of Forth that runneth a large & broad channell into the ocean seas. Certes it is a water verie plentifull indued with cockles, dillers, mussels, scales, pellocks, mereswime, whales, and great foison of white fish; and among manie other fles that are to be found in this Forth, that of spae is of greatest fame, because Adair and his fellows were killed in the same. In the middell of this Ile rising up a fontaine of fresh and cleare water, from an high rocke, which is not a little to be maruailed at, considering the quantitie and situation of the Ile. Beside this also is a wonderfull crag, rising within the sea, where vnto is so strait and narrow a passage, that a ship shall hardlie come out of it by a siluer bote, and there to but at one place. This rocke (called the Abbe-castell) is twofold; and therein are manie taneis verie profitable for defence, made heretofore by great labor and industrie of men.

Certes, there is nothing in this rocke that is not full of admiration and wonder: therein also is great stoe of soland geese (not unlike to those which Plinie calleth water eagles, or as we saie) sea herons, and no where else but in this Ile and this rocke. At their first coming, which is in the spring of the yeare, they gather such great plenty of dikes and bagges together for the building of their nests, that the same do satiffie the keeper of the castell, for the paytelie maintenance of his felowall, without anie other provision. These fowles do feed their yong with the most delicat fish that they can come by. For though they haue already preyed vpon anie one, and haue it fast in their beake or talons, yet if they happen as they flie toward the land to espie a better, they let the first fall againe into the sea, and pursue the later with great and eager swiftnesse, vntill they take hold thereof.

Sometimes their preie is taken from them by the keepers of the castell, as also their sticks from time to time for the aforesaid vse; but they making small or rather no resistance, doe turne againe forthwith, for more wood or fish (as their losse requireth) not ceasing till they haue builded their nests with the one, and nourished vp their young with the other, so that what by the timber of their nests, the beguiling them of their preie, and stealing awaye of their young, they bring yerele no small commoditie vnto the owner of the castell. Within the bowels of these grese there is a kind of grease to be had of singular force in medicine, and stealing likewise the skin from their bodies with the fat, they make an oile verie profitable for the gout and manie other diseases in the hanches and groines of mankind. In this crag more, there groweth an hearbe verie pleasant and delicious for salads, but if it be taken by and planted elswhere, it either groweth not at all, or bitterlie giueth out the vertues therewith it was earst indued.

There was sometime a stone found here in this rocke much like to a water sponge or pumice, hollow on the one side, and of such a nature, that if anie salt water had bene poured thereinto, and suffered to run through, it would forthwith lose the naturall saltnesse, and become fresh and verie pleasant vnto the mouth and tast. We heare in these daies that this stone is to be seene in Fass castell, whither it was brought after it had passed manie hands for the triall of this matter. In this firch also is the Ile Almon, wherein is an abbey. There are likewise diuers other Ilands, and those are verie full of conies; and in the said firch are sundrie fishes oftentimes seene of monstrous shape, with colours hanging ouer their heads like vnto monks, and in the rest resembling the bodie of man. They shew themselves likewise aboue the water to the nauill, howbeit they neuer appeare but against some great pestilence of men, or murren of cattell; wherefore their onelie sight doth breed great terror vnto the Scottish nation, who are verie great obseruers of vncomly signes & tokens.

The description of Louthian, Striueling, Menteth, Calidon wood, Bougewall, Gareoth, with the notable cities, castels, and foulds thereof.

The seuenth Chapter.

At the south of the Forth lieth Louthian, so called of Lothe or Loth, one of the kings of the Picts, it was sometime named Picland; but now it is parcell of the Scottish kingdome, & therefore for bountie of soile is not inferiour to anie region of Scotland. In Louthian are manie abbeies, castels and townes, as Hadinton, Dunbar, Forthbertwic and Leith: but Edinburgh passeth them all, as well in policie of regiment as in forme of building and wisdom, and riches of the inhabitants: therein also is the castell of Spaldens, remembred by the most renowned authors, & also the kings chiefe palace, the which tr-pleth the renowne of the foresaid citie. Not farre from thence moreouer is a certeine oillie spring, which riseth out of the ground in such abundance, that the moze is caried from thence, the moze is re-frozed: and the people are persuaded hereof, that it is verie medicinable against all cankers and skalls.

Not farre from the mouth of Forth is the castell of Dunbar, which by naturall situation and industrie of man, is now become one of the chiefe holds in Albion. It was sometime the principall house appertaining to the earles of March: and there hard by is a towne of the same name, wherein is a rich abbey or chedledge of canons founded by those earles. Pert vnto Louthian lieth Spers, whereof I haue spoken already, but we will now go by higher into the land. Pertest vnto Spers therefore lieth Twedale, and aboue it is Twedale: next vnto Twedale is Druisdale, Malcospdale, Doulgassedale, and Cliddisdale, and all these are such names as the riuers haue that run along their bottoms. The principall towne of Cliddisdale is Glasco the archbishops see, wherein is a notable church erected in the honor of saint Gorgow, and builded with great magnificence. In Glasco also is a noble vniuersitie, where the liberrall arts and sciences are verie re-soundie taught.

In this region moreouer is a verie rich mine of gold, and another of azure, the commoditie of which later is reaped with small trauell. There are sometimes found diuers pretious stones also, as rubies and diamonds. Certes this mine was disclosed in the time of James the fourth, who would no doubt haue brought it to full perfection, if he had longer liued, whereas now little profit redoundeth thereby to the commonwealth, because it is either bitterlie neglected, or not very much regarded. Forth of Glasco lieth Spenteth, and Striueling shire, bordering vpon Argile and Lennox. In Striueling shire is the towne of Striueling, and aboue it is the castell of Striueling, which was sometime called the dolorous mountaine. At this towne also began the great Calidon wood, which ran through Spenteth and Stratherne, to Atholl and Lochquhaber, as Ptolome writeth in his first table.

In this wood were sometime white buls with thackit heares and curled manes like fierce lions, otherwise they were like vnto the tame, neuertheless so wild and sauage, that they would neuer be made familiar, nor tast of any hearbe or grasse that mans hand had once touched, after manie daies. Being taken also by the industrie of man (which was very hard to doe) they would refuse all sustentance, & starue themselves to death. As soone as any did inuade them, they would rush vpon him with great violence, and beare him to the earth; as for dogs, nets, or any kind of weapon they feared not, neither cared for any manner of engine.

It is said that Robert Bruce after his coronation did hunt one of these buls in the foresaid wood, being accompanied but with a small traine, in which boiage he escaped narrowlie with his life. For after the beast felt himselfe sore wounded by the hunters, he rushed vpon the king, who hauing now no weapon left in his hand therewith to defend himselfe, he had suerlie perished if rescue had not come: howbeit in this distresse one came running vnto him, who overthrew the bull by plaine force, and held him down till the hunters came that killed him outright. For this balliant act also the king indued the aforesaid partie with great possessions, and his lineage is to this daie called of the Turnebulls, because he over-turned the beast, and saued the kings life, by such great prowesse and manhood. Certes the flesh of these beasts were reputed in old time as a most delicate food, and onlie meate for the nobilitie, notwithstanding that it be verie full of finetis and gristles, whereat some delicat feeders doe often take offense. In times past also they were bred in many places of the Calidon, but now they be all consumed by the gluttonie of the inhabitants, so that none of them are left, but onlie in Comerland.

On the east side of Menteith lieth Stratherne, & bordereth also vpon Fife. Through the ballies likewise of this region runneth the water of Crn, that falleth into Tay. This is mozeouer worthie to be noted, that not foure miles from the confluence of Crn and Tay, there is a stone of small quantitie, and yet of great wonder, for in what place soeuer it be laid, it will not be removed from thence by manuell practice, art, or engine, & yet one man may so moue it as an hundred. On the other side of Tay beyond Angus and Cotwray lieth Strermond, a region plentifullie indued both with grasse and corne. Not farre from Strermond is Athole, wherein are manie noble ballies and riuers full of fish, as pikes, lamperns, &c. The soile there also is so bountifull, that it yeldeth corne in maner without any tillage. There is likewise therein a soile called Lud, whose felde are so plentiful, that (if they be well tilled and dressed) they will yeld great store of barlie without any sowing of seed. Wholbeit, as this is in that part of the region often verified, so in other there is a contrarious disposition to be found in the earth, which turneth wheat some into god and perfect rie, the like wherof I heare to be not far from Luke, & in the countries thereabouts.

West of Buchquhane and Borne lieth Wosge, well and Garcoth, very plentiful soiles both for grasse and corne. In Garcoth also is an hill called Doundore, that is to saie, the golden mounteine: for the shepe that feed thereon are yellow, and their teeth of the same hew, resembling burnished gold. Their flesh mozeouer is red as it were tinged with saffron, and so is their wooll much after the same manner. There is furthermore in the same region, an heape of stones lieng togither in maner of a crown which yeld a sound when one of them is stricken as if it were a bell. Some are of the opinion, that one idoll temple or other stood heretofore in that place, while the Scottish nation was addicted to the worshipping of diuels. Many other regions are in Scotland, as Wabaldane, Strabran, and Badzenoth, with diuers small territories and fouds, howbeit they are not so notable as those which we haue already touched, and therefore I thinke it but follie to deale any further with them.

Of the great plentie of hares, red deer, and other wilde beasts in Scotland, of the strange properties of sundrie Scottish dogs, and of the nature of samon.

The eight Chapter.

Having made this speciall description of the realme of Scotland, now will I touch such things as concerne the same in generall. First of all therefore in the fields and wild places of the country there is great plentie of hares, red deer, fallow deer, roes, wild hares, wolues and fores. These hares are not gotten but by great flight and policie: for in the winter season the inhabitants turne certeine tame hares & mares among them, wherewith they grow in the end to be so familiar, that afterward they go with them to and fro, and finally home into their maisters yards, where they be taken and some broken to their hands. The wolues are most fierce and noisome to the herds and flocks in all parts of Scotland, saving in one parcell of Angus, called Glennoys dale, where these beasts doe no manner of hurt vnto the domesticall cattell, but prey onlie vpon the wild.

Fores doe much mischefe generallie in all lands, but chiefly in the mountaines, where they be verie hardlie hunted, howbeit art hath devised a meane to prevent their malice, and to preserve their patria. Certes there is almost no house that doth not for certeine daies cherish by a yong fox, which the Scots doe call a Lodde, and then killing the same, they mince the flesh thereof amongst such meat, as they giue vnto their fowles and other little bests, and by this means so many foules and cattell as eate hereof are preserved from danger of the fox, almost by twy moneths after, so that they may wander whither they will, for the fores as it were winding or smelling the flesh of their fellows yet in their crops will in no wise meddle with them, but elshe, and knowe such a one, although it were among an hundred of other.

In Scotland also are dogs of maruelous condition; for beside the common nature and vniuersall properties of dogs of all other countries, there are three sorts with vs, which are not seene elswhere in any quarter of the worlde. The first is an hound of great swiftnesse, hardinesse, and strength, fierce and cruell vpon all wilde beasts, and eger against thieues that offer their maisters any violence. The second is a racy or hound verie exquisite in following the foot, (which we call dhalwing) whether it be of man or beast, yea he will pursue any manner of foule, and find out whatsoeuer fish is cast vp, or lurketh among the rocks, by that excellent sense of smelling wherewith he is indued. The third sort is no greater than that of raches, in colour for the most part red, with blacke spots, or else blacke and full of red marks. These are so skilfull that they will pursue a thiefe, or these stolen goods in most precise maner, and finding the trespasser, with great assurance they will make a raife vpon him. If it be so that he haue taken the water for his safegard, he shrinketh not to follow him, and entering and issuing at the same places where the partie went in and out, he neuer ceaseth to range till he haue noted his footing, & be come to the place wherein the thiefe is shrowded. The dogs of this kind are called sleuthhounds. Certes this report would seeme meere incredible, except it were daily had in experience vpon the borders of England and Scotland, where pillage is good purchase in differentlie on both sides. There is a law also among the borderers in time of peace, that whoso denieth entrance or sute of a sleuthhound in pursuit made after felons and stolen goods, shall be holden as accessory vnto the theft, or taken for the selfe thiefe.

Of foules, such (I meane) as live by prey, there are sundrie sorts in Scotland, as eagles, falcons, goshawkes, sparrowhawkes, marlions, and such like: but of water foules there is so great store, that the report thereof may seeme to exceed all credit. There are other kinds of birds also in this countrie, the like of which is nowhere else to be seene, as the capercailze or wild harte greater in bodie than the rauen, and liuing onlie by the rinds and barks of the pine trees. We haue in like maner manie more cocks and hens, the which abstaining from corne, doe feed vpon nought else, but the leaues of Cyttus, which the Scots doe commonlie call spadder. These

These flos are verie delicate in eating. The third sort is reddish blacke of colour, in quantitie comparable to the pheasant, and no lesse delicious in taste and savor at the table, our countrie men call them wild cocks, and their chiefe sustenance is by wheat.

Beside these, we haue also another soule in Pers more strange and vncouth than all these afore mentioned, called a gusard, fullie so great as a swan, but in colour of feathers and tast of flesh, little differing from a partridge, howbeit these birds are not verie common, neither to be seene in all places, such also is their qualittie, that if they perceiue their eggs to haue bene touched in their absence by mans hand (which lie commonlie on the bare earth) they forsake those nests, and laie in other places. All other our soules are common to vs and other nations. Saman is more plentiful in Scotland than in anie other region of the world, and because the nature of this fish is strange, I will set downe so much as I doe know hereof at this present time as followeth.

The samon in harvest time cometh by into the small riuers, where the water is most shallow, and there the male and female rubbing their wombe one against another, they shed their spawne, which forthwith they couer with sand and grauell and so depart away. From henceforth they are gant and slender, and in appearance so leane that they appeare nought else but skin and bone, and therefore worthilie said to be growne out of use and season. It is said also that if they touch anie of their fall fellowes, during the time of this their leanness, the same side which they touched will likewise become leane, whereby it cometh to passe, that a samon is oft seene to be fat on the one side of the chine, and leane on the other. But to proceed, the aforesaid spawne and milt being hidden in the sand (as you haue heard) in the next spring doth yeld great number of little frye, but so nesh and tender for a long time, that till they come to be so great as a mans finger (if you catch anie of them) you shall perceiue them to melt, and their substance to dissolue and fade euen as it were gellie, or as yce laid forth against the sun. From henceforth they go to the sea, where within the space of 20 daies they grow to a marvellous greatnesse, and then returning againe toward the place of their generation, they shew a notable spectacle not vnworthie to be considered.

Certes in Scotland there are manie linnies or poles, which being in some places among the rocks verie shallow about, are yet deepe beneath, with the fall of the water, and thereto the samon not able to pearce through the channell, either for swiftnesse of the course, or depth of the descent of such water as cometh against him, he goeth so neere vnto the side of the rocke or dam, if I may so call it, as he may, and there aduentureth to leape ouer and vp into the lin, if he leape well at the first he obtaieth his desire, if not, he attaieth the second or third time, till he returne now vnto his countrie: a great fish able to swim against the streame, that before was a little bod, and maugre his resistance, caried with the violent course of the water into the maine ocean. Such as assaye often to leape, and cannot get ouer, do byrse themselves and become measelled: others that happen to fall vpon drie land, a thing often seene, are taken by the people (that watch their times) in caldrons of hot water, which they set vpon the shallow & drie plots with fire vnder them, in hope to catch the fattest, & such as by reason of their weight do oftentimes leape short. Certes the tast of these is reputed to be most delicate, and therefore their price is commonlie greater than of the rest. It is inhibited in Scotland to take any samon from the 8 of September, vntill the 15 of Nouember. Finally there is no man that knoweth readilie whereon this fish liueth, for neuer was anie thing yet found in their bellies, other than a thicke slimie humoz.

Of the sundrie kinds of muskles and cockles in Scotland, and of pearles gotten in the same: of the vncouth and strange fish there to be seene, and of the nature of the herbe Citilus, commonly called Hadder.

The ninth Chapter.

Here it resteth that I shew the nature of muskles and cockles, wherof we haue manie and sundrie kinds among vs: of these also some are small, and yet if they be eaten fresh, are not without a naturall delicacie in tast. Others are greater and not unlike in forme and quantitie to those that haue the purple: and albeit that they are bitterlie void therof, yet is their meat and substance right pleasant in the eating. There are of another sort which are longer and greater than either of these, called Horse muskles, to be had in Dee and Done, and in these are the pearles ingendered. Certes they loue to be resident in the deepest and clearest waters that are void of mud and filth, and such is their estimation among the deintiest kinds of food, that they were not vnworthilie called of old time, widowes luffes. Their shelles also is as it were wrought euen from the verie tops, and thereto full of spots, where in (as in yeld of gaine) they farre exceed all other. These earlie in the morning, in the gentle, cleare, and calme aire, lift vp their vpper shelles and mouethes a little aboue the water, and there receiue of the fine and pleasant breath or dew of heauen, & afterwards according to the measure and quantitie of this vitall force receiued, they first conceiue, then swell, and finally produce the pearle.

They are so sensible and quicke of hearing, that although you standing on the braie or banke aboue them, doe speake neuer so softly, or throw neuer so small a stone into the water, yet they will deserue you, and settle againe to the bottome, without returne for that time. Doubtlesse they haue as it were a naturall carefulnesse of their owne commoditie, as not ignorant, how great estimation we mortall men make of the same amongst vs, and therefore so soone as the fishermen doe catch them, they bind their shelles together, for otherwise they would open and shed their pearles of purpose, for which they know themselves to be pursued. Their manner of apprehension is this, first foure or fve persons go into the riuer together, by vnto the shoulders, and there stand in a compasse one by another with poles in their hands whereby they rest more suerlie, with they fix them in the ground, and staie with one hand vpon them: then casting their eyes downe to the bottome of the water, they espie where they lie by their shining and cleerenesse, and with their toes take them by (for the depth of the water will not suffer them to scape for them) & glue them to such as stand next them.

The pearls that are so gotten in Scotland, are not of small value, they are verie orient & bright, light and round, and sometimes of the quantitie of the naille of ones little finger, as I haue had and seene by mine owne experience. Almost such another muskle found on the coast of Spaine, the shels whereof are gathered by such as go in pilgrimage to saint James, and brought into Scotland, but they are without without pearls, because they live in salt water, which is an enemy to the margarite : but Cardane also denyeth it. In all the sea coasts also of Scotland are cockles and mussels of the same forme, but without this commoditie. Many vncouth and strange shapcs of fish likewise are seene there, whereof some are armed with shels, some with hard skales, and others round as a ball skinned like an yxon or hedg hog, hauing but one cundit both for purgation of their excrementes, and reception of their sustenance. To shew euery kind of fish that is in Scotland, it were but a vaine trauell, sith the same are knowne almost in euery region.

In like sort, we haue such plentie of fish vpon our seuerall coasts, that although milians and infinite numbers of them be taken on the one daie, yet on the next their losse will be so supplied with new store, that nothing shall be missing by reason of the yesterfang: so bountifull is God in these his benefits vnto vs. Furthermore, there is another gift bestowed vpon vs by the singular prouidence of God. For the greater dearth & penurie of flesh and corne is scene in Scotland, the greater store of fish is taken vpon our shores. In like sort, in the deserts and wild places of this realme, there groweth an hearbe of it selfe called Hadder or Hather verie delicat, as Columella lib. 9. cap. 4. saith, for goats & all kind of cattell to feed vpon, and likewise for diuerse foules, but bees especiallie. This herbe in June yeldeth a purple floure. Sweet as honie, whereof the Picts in time past did make a pleasant drinke, and verie wholesome for the bodie: but forsomuch as the manner of making hereof is perished in the hauocke made of the Picts, when the Scots subdued their countrie, it lieth not in me to set downe the order of it, neither sheweth they euer the learning hereof to any but to their owne nation. Finallie there is no part of Scotland so barren and vnpopitable, but it produceth either iron or some other kind of mettall, as may be proued easilie throughout all the Isles that are annexed to the same.

Of the Isles of Scotland, and such notable things as are to be found in them.

The tenth Chapter.

Being fallen at the last into mention of our Isles, I will adressed my selfe to describe the same; in manner and forme as followeth. At the Irish sea, betwixt Ireland and Scotland are fortie and three Isles, whereof some are thirtie miles long, diuers twelue, and others more or lesse. These are called by some writers Eubonia, and by other Hebrides. But the principall of them all is that of Man, which lieth ouer against Galloway, & was somtime the principall seat of the Druides, as Cornelius Tacitus, Cæsar in his commentaries, and other Roman writers doe testifie at large. North from the Ile of Man lieth Arran, otherwise named Botha after S: Wandons time; who dwelled there in a little cottage; which (as all other the like were in those daies) was called Botha.
From Arran we go to Hellaw and Rothelaw, which later is so named of the Scot, which brought the Scots first out of Ireland into Britaine. Not far from this Ile is Ailsay, where there is such store of soland geese as they said before to be in Was. Beyond Ailsay lie manie other distinguished by their se-werall names, but full of mines, as of iron, tin, lead, & sundrie other mettals. But the most notable Ile be longing to Scotland is Fla, that lieth beyond the promontorie of Prouant cliffe (in Sect. the tange of Noxie) within sight of Lochquahabze. Certes it is a rich parcell, thirtie miles in length, and full of corne and mettall, if the people were cunningg to find and trim the same.

Not farre from thence is Cumbra, and Gula, sub tie so large as Fla, both for length and breadth. In Gula is a faire spring two miles from the sea, from whence runneth a little brooke or strippet, whereof you shall read more in the description of Britaine, lib. 1. cap. 8. Neere unto it is Zona, otherwise called Columkill, in which is an abbie, wherein the kings of Scotland were commonlie buried from the time of Fergus the second, unto Dalcolme Cammo, of whoe created the monastierie of Dunfermlin, where since that time the most part of our kings haue bene of custome interred. Passing forward toward the northnorthwest seas, euer againsts Roffe is an Ile named Lewis, 60 miles in length, in this Ile is but one fish riuer, & it is said that if a woman wade through the same at the spring of the yeere, there shall no famon be seene there for a twelue month after, whereas otherwise that fish is knowne to abound there in verie great plentie. Beyond Lewis lie the Sky and the Hona, in the later whereof, it is incredible to saie what of scale, of pellocke and porpasse is to be seene, which are nothing abashed at the sight of any man. The last and bittermost Ile is named Heththa, where the eleuation of the pole is 63 degrees, and since the latitude of Man, is but 57.

I conclude, that from the Ile of Man the first Ile of Albion, to Wirtha the last Ile hercof are 377 miles, after 62 miles and an halfe to each degre, as Ptolomie hath set downe. It is named Wirtha, which in Irish soundeth so much as a shepe in English, for herein that kind of cattell aboundeth, each one being greater than any bucke, their hoznes longer and thicker than of the bugle, and thereto they haue side tailes that reach vnto the earth. It is enuironed ouer euerie part with rockie or rockie crags, whereby few vessels may land there but at one place, where the working of the sea is oftentimes so terrible & rough, that no man dare adventure thither without danger of his life. They that go thither therefore, doe watch their times when the sea is calme and still. In the moneth of June also, a priest commeth vnto them out of Lewis, and ministrerth the sacrament of baptism to all the chyldren that haue bene borne there since that moneth in the yeare precedent: which being done, and a certeine number of masses said, he receiuerth tithes of all their commodities, and then returneth home againe.

In the Ile of Lewis are two churches or chapels, whereof one is dedicated to saint Peter, another to saint Clement. The same is, that so soone as the fire goeth out in this Ile, the man that is holden of most cleane and innocent life, goeth to the altar with great solemnitie, and there lateth a wispe of straw, which being done they fall all to praier, in the midst whereof fire commeth downe from heauen and kindleth or setteth the same on fire. Beyond this is yet another Ile, but void of people and all other liuing creatures, sauing a certeine kind of beasts like vnto shepe, whose nature and forme I haue already toucht in the description of Brittain, and therefore omit it here for hast and breuittie sake. Betweene these Isles also is a right dangerous passage, with the sea by working of opposite streames hath engendred a gulf, which sometimes taketh in an incomprehensible deale of water, and sometimes calleteth it forth againe, by meanes whereof many ships that that by rage of wind and weather are inforced to come that waite, are either swallowed by the waues, or throtone against the rocks to their utter danger and ruine. The greatest rage of this confluence is at a place called Cozebucke, where it will either sinke, or at the least wise draw any ship vnto it, though it be a full mile distant from the same.

Of the nature of the Claik geese, and sundrie maners of their procreation, and of the Ile of Thule.

The eleuenth Chapter.

NOW it is come to hand that I intreat of those geese which are ingendred by the sea, whose procreation hath hitherto been thought to haue bene made vpon trees. But the opinion is false, and yet with their generation is strange indeed, I haue not a little travelled, and with no small diligence in deuoured to search out the truth hereof, whereby I learne that their ingendure is rather to be referred to the sea, than any thing els, if my coniecture be oughts: for although that they are in sundrie wise produced, yet I find the same to be performed continuallie in the sea, and not elswhere, as shall appere hereafter. All trees cast into that element in procelle of time become wormeaten, and in the holes thereof are the said wormes to be found, though verie little and small (in comparison to that they be after ward) to be perceived at the first. In the beginning, these worms do shew their heads and feet, and last of all their plumes & wings. Finally when they are come to the iust measure and quantitie of geese, they lie in the aire as other foules do.

This was notable proued in the yeare of Grace 1490, in sight of many people, beside the castell of Pedego, whither the bodie of a great tree was brought by working of the sea. This tree being taken, it was carried to the lord of the soile, who some after caused it to be slit in sunder with a saw: which being done, it is incredible to see, what a multitude of wormes came out of their holes. Of these also some appeared as if they had bene but new shapen, others had head, feet and wings, but no feathers, the rest were formed into perfect foules. At last when the people had gazed thereon by the space of an whole daie, they carried it to saint Andrewes church beside Leith, where the said blocke remains still to be seene. Within two yeeres after there hapned such another tree to come into the fieth of Tay beside Dundee, wormeaten and full of yong geese after the same manner: the third was seene in the haven of Leith beside Edenburgh; and also within a few yeeres, in like sort a ship named the Christopher, after she had lien three yeeres at anchor in one of these Isles, was brought to Leith, where because her timber was found to be rotten she was taken in sunder, and in her keele were found infinite holes as if they had bene eaten with wormes, or bored with a winkle, and each one of them filled with such creatures as I haue said before.

Here if any man will alledge that the Christopher was builded of such timber onlie as groweth in these Isles, and that all roots and trees there growing, are of such nature as in their corruption do turne into these foules, I will disprove his assertion by one notable example theines before mine eyes. Master Alexander Galloway parson of Birkell, was with vs in these Isles, & giuing his mind with attentive diligence to search out a full resolution with vs of these obscure and hidden matters, it hapned on a time that he toke by a branch of Alga, called in Scottish, Seat-angle, which hanged full of muskle shels from the root euen to the verie top. Being also desirous to see what was in them, he grew to be more astonished than before: for when he had opened one or two of them, he saw no fish but a foule perfectie shapen, fullie answering to the capacite of the shell.

Finally, knowing that I was verie inquisitive of these and the like rare nouelties, he came hither with the said herbe & shewed it vnto me, who found no lesse by experience than I before reported. By these and many other reasons and examples I cannot beleue that these Claiks (or Barnacles as I call them) are produced either by the qualities of the trees or the roots thereof, but onelie by the nature of the sea, which is the verie cause and productrix of so manie wonderfull creatures. Furthermore, because the rude and ignorant people saw oftentimes the fruits that fell from trees, which stood neuer in the sea, conuerted within short time into geese, they beleued that these geese grew vpon trees, hanging by their nebs as apples and other fruit do by their stalks, but their opinion is bitterlie to be reiected. For so soone as these apples or fruit fall from the tree into the sea, they grow first to be wormeaten, and in procelle of time to be conuerted into geese.

Thus haue I spoken sufficientlie of the Isles of the Hebrides adiacent vnto the realme of Scotland, and therewithall would shut vp my discourse of the same, were it not that I haue somewhat to say also of Thule, not unknowne vnto the Romans, as may appere by Tacitus, who telleth how the Romane nauie by the commandement of Agricola, was sent to view the coasts of the whole Island of Brittain, and at their returne reported how they had seene the Thule, with other Islands lieng about the same. Ptoleme writeth that the Ile of Thule is one of the Shetland Isles, which lie nere vnto Norway, and beyond the Orchades; but this cannot be proued so by late experience: for Thule is manie miles distant from Shetland. Some say that Thule is the same which we call Island: other write that it is the last Ile of the ocean sea, and so is Island, which lieth in the cold frostie sea, beyond the Arctike circle toward the north pole. The people of Island because no corne groweth among them, liue onelie by fish, which they drie and powder so small as meale both come backe from the mill, afterward they mix it with water, and worke it vp for bread.

Of the description of Orkeney, and Shetland, with sundrie other small Isles, and of the maners and conditions of the people dwelling in the same.

The twelfe Chapter.

BEYOND the Isles of Scotland lie those of Orkeney, partlie toward the north-west, and partlie toward the Almain seas. The principall Ile of these is called Pomona, wherein is a bishoppe, and two strong castles. In these groweth no wheat, they are in like sort void of wood, howbeit all other graine groweth there verie plentifully, they be without all venomous beasts also, neither can such as are brought thither liue anye while.

while, more than in Ireland, which susteineth no creature that is aduersarie to mankind.ouer and besides this, there are no frogs: as for eeles they are selborne found and to be seene in the Orkades. Having thus fallen into the mention of Ireland, I thinke it good among diuers other rare gifts of nature, to remember one thing that I haue proued by experience to be done there (although the tractation of Ireland and his commodities apperteine not to this place) which farre passeth all that euer I haue read in booke.

Certes there is a loch, lin, or poole there, nere vnto the which by manie miles, there groweth neither herbe nor tree; howbeit such is the qualitie of this water, that if a stake be pitched in the same, the nature thereof doth within one yeres space alter and change exceedinglie, for that part thereof which standeth in the ground is conuerted into hard stone, the same that is inuironed with water turneth into tough iron, onelie that portion which is aboue the said element reteining his former wooddie substance, whereby it is often seene how in one and the same bodie, these distinct substances are found, that is to say, stone, iron, and wood, which farre exceedeth all credit. But to returne againe to our Orkades, whereof things of little or no lesse importance are to be reherfed, for sith there is great abundance of barley thereof they make the strongest ale that is to be found in Albion, and thereto knowne, that they are the greatest drinkers of anie men in the world; yet was there neuer drunken or man disguised with drinke seene there, neither anie soole, or person otherwise bereft of his wits through frensie or madness. There is herevnto small vse of physicke: for mankind liueth there most commonlie vnto extreme age in sound and perfect health, whose bodies also are of strong constitution and verie white of colour.

The ewes that are to be found in these Islands haue for the most part two or three lambs a peece at euerie eaning, and therewithall they haue in this countrie such plentie of foules both wild and tame, as the like number againe is not to be found in Britaine. Their horses are litle greater than the French asses, but in their labour they exceed all other. What should I speake of the plentie of fish there to be had, which passeth all credit: among which there is one sort greater than anie horse, of a marvellous and incredible sluggish desire to sleepe. This fish when they prouideth to sleepe, fasteneth his huge teeth vpon some crag that lieth aboue the water, and then slumbzeth or falleth into a most sound rest, which the seafaring men espiong, they forthwith cast anchor, and then letting downe their ship-boats, they conueie themselves to the fish, and bore a great hole through his taile, wherevnto they put one end of a cable, and so make it sure; the other end is fastened to a great anchor, which is let fall of purpose into the sea, and this is their enterprize attempted per long to be achieved. For after this wound, it is not long per the fish awaketh, who feeling himselfe to be hurt, leapeeth at once into the sea, thinking to hide and shrowd his in the deepes: but being staied by the weight of the anchor, and inuoluing in vaine to breake the cable, he laboureth so vehementlie, that at the last he windeth his selfe out of his skin (for the which he is commonlie taken) and some after also turneth vpon his bellie, yielding himselfe vnto the waues, and his bodie to the mariners, who make an excellent oile of his grease, and passing strong cables of his hide or skin. Certes such is the force of rope made of the skin of this fish, that they will hold at a plunge no lesse than the Spanish sparto. Herein also they exceed the same, in that they will continue verie long without fretting asunder.

An hundred miles beyond the Orkades are the Shetland Isles, whose chiefe commodities stand onelie by fish which is dried in the sun. There are brought also into Scotland out of these Islands great store of shepes felles, ore hides, goates skinnies, and calves of martirnes dried in the sunne. And in the same maner the merchants of Holland, Zealand and Germanie, fetch them pærelle by barter and exchange for other common and necessarie wares, with the people of that nation, who for maners and conditions resemble much the Orkanois. The same in like sort that is said of the Orkanois, concerning drunkenness and frensie, is verified on them, as is also their length of life, although not in so rare maner: sith these in stead of strong ale, content themselves with water, and verie slender diet. Beyond the Shetlands there are diuerse other Islands of like condition, but without corne and all maner of flesh to feed vpon. These drie their fish in the sunne, and when they are through stiffe, they grind them to small powder, which they worke vp with water into loaves, and so vse the same in lieu of other bread. Their firing consisteth of the bones of such fishes as they take, and yet they content themselves in such maner with this their poze kind of liuelode, that they thinke their estate most happie in respect of such as inhabit in the maine.

Certes there is no quarrelling amongst these for wealth or gaine, but each one prouideth such store of fish in summer which he taketh himselfe, as shall find his familie, or keepe his house in winter. They are void of all ambitious mood, and neuer troubled with ciuill or forein warres, as men that deeme firme peace and quietnesse, with mutuall loue and amitie, to be the chiefe felicitie to be sought for in this life, and to remaine herein, each one to his power doth shew his whole indouor. This finaltie is to be added vnto their commendation, that they are simple, plaine, void of craft, and all maner of serpentine subtiltie, which endeth commonlie with mischief, and reigneth in the maine. Once in the yere there cometh a priest vnto them from Orkeney, (of which diocesse they are) who ministrerth vnto them the sacrament of baptisme, and after a certaine time (hauling taken vp in the meane time his tithes in fish, which is their sole increase, and verie trulle paid) he returneth home againe the same way that he came.

If anie gifts of nature are to be numbered as parcels of worlde riches and renowne, they are not without these also: for the people of these Isles are lustie, faire, strong of bodie, and high of stature, so that nature hath not failed to indue them with these things, and that in most excellent maner. What should I say of their health, which is and may be preferred aboue all treasure, as they well know that are oppressed with long and greivous infirmities: For here among these men, you shall verie selborne heare of sicknesses, so attach anie, until extreme age come that killeth them altogether, and this is that exceeding benigne naturallie appropriated vnto their carcases. As for their quietnesse of mind, it is at times such as is constant, and changeable, and therefore incomparable vnto any riches or huge masse of worlde lie treasure.

Herevnto furthermore, if it be true riches (as it is in deed) for eue one not to covet other mens goods, but to content himselfe with that which is his owne, and not to stand in need of anie thing, can anie man be found in anie other region more rich and contented than the Shetland men and these Islanders: For nallie, if those be the true honors, and recurrent vnties which the obsequious world with great incerttie and void of all starrtie, doth shew vnto his god parents, and wherevntoall the drift is now marvellouslie lie resolute and desire themselves: And that these are also not wanting in these regions, can we easily say that these men do lacke any thing, or shall we not rather asseme with great assurance, that they rather stand in need of nothing that any mortal man can lustie wish or desire?

But if there be any man that will accuse me of untruth in the recitall of these things, as one that lieth lowd and by authoritie of a people dwelling far off, for so much as I my selfe was neuer in those lands, he shall vnderstand that I learned all these things of the reuerend father Edward bishop of the Orkades, with whom one of these Islanders dwelled, who not onelie made a like rehearsall of these things with his owne mouth, but also verified the same in his owne person, for his height far passed the common stature of men, thereto he was excellentlie well featured in his lims, so white of skin ouer all, that he might contend in beantie with any ladie of the land, and finally so white and strong of bodie, that no man in all those quarters durst run or wrestle with him. Hereby also we may see, how far they are deceiued which iudge them to be barbarous, and miserable creatures, that inhabit far from the tropike lines, for there are no people more happye than those that dwell in these quarters, as I haue proued already.

Furthermore, among the rocks and crags of these Isles groweth the delectable amber, called E-lestrum, Chrysolitrum, or (as Dioscorides saith) Pterygophoron, indued with so vehement an attractive force, that being chased it draweth straw, flor, and other like light matter vnto it. This gum is ingendred of the sea froth, which is thowen vp by continuall percussion of crags and rocks against the sea walls, and through perpetuall working of the waues groweth in time to become tough as glue, till it fall at the last from the rocke againe into the sea. Such as haue often viewed and marked the generation of this gum, whilest it hangeth on the rocke, asseme it to be like a froth and bubble of water without all massie sadnesse, because that as yet it is not sufficientlie hardened by the working of the element. Sometimes the Seetangle is found inuironed also withall, because it is driuen hither and thither by the working of the waues, and so long as it fleets to and fro in this manner, so long is it apt to cleaue to any thing that it toucheth.

Two yeares before I wrote this booke, there came a great lumpe of amber into Buchquhane, in quantitie so big as any house, which the heardmen that kept their cattell nere hand caught vp, and not knowing in deed what it was, they caried it home, and threw a portion thereof into the fire: finally, perceiving a sweet and delectable sauer to proceed from the same, they ran by & by to the priest of the towne where they dwelled, telling him how they had found a peece of stuffe which would serue verie well in stead of frankincense, wherewith to perfume his saints or rather Idols in the church. These men supposed that sir John had bene more cunning than themselves, but contrarie to their expectation, it fell out that he was no lesse vnskillfull & void of knotologie than they; and therefore refusing the whole lumpe, he took but a small portion thereof, and returned the rest vnto them, whereby it came to little profite and lesse gaine among the common sort, who suffered it to perishe by reason of their vnskillfulnesse. Certes when they broke it in peeces, it resembled in color vnto the purest gold, & shined as if it had bene the laie or flame of a candle. Herein also the proverbe was proued true, that the low recks not of valye. But to come as I vnderstand of the matter, I used such diligence, that one portion thereof was brought to me at Aberdeen. And thus much of the Hebrides, Orkades, and Shetland Isles subiect vnto the Scottish regiment.

I might (no doubt) haue made rehearsall of diuers other strange things touching the nothing in this behalfe: but I haue made chosse onelie of the most rare and excellent, and so would finish this description, were it not that one thing hath staied me right pleasant to be remembred, as an vncomly & strange incident, wherof maister James Ogilbie ambassadour from James our king (among other) vnto the king of France, hath certified me, and wherof he had experience of late, at such time as he was constrained by tempest of weather to get to land in Norwaye. Thus standeth the case, being dytuen (as I said) vpon the shore of Norwaye, he and his companie saw a kind of people ranging vp & downe in the mounteins there, much like vnto those which diuers pictures giue forth for wild men, hearte and eglic to behold. In the end being aduertised that they were sauage and wild beasts; yet neuerthelesse deable enemies to mankind: they vnderstood therevnto, that although in the day time they abhorred and feared the sight of man, yet in the night they would by great companies invade the small villages & countrie townes, killing and fleeing so manie as they found, or where no dogs were kept to put by their rage and furie.

Certes such is their nature, that they stand in great feare of dogs, at whose barking and sight they flie and run away with no small hast and terror, wherfore the inhabitants are inforced to cherishe great numbers of the said beasts, thereby to keepe off those wild men that otherwise would annoy them. They are moreover of such strength, that sometimes they pull vp young trees by the roots to fight withall among themselves. The ambassadours seeing these vncomly creatures, were not a little affrighted, and therefore to be sure from all inuasion, procured a strong garrd to watch all night about them, with great fiers to giue light ouer all that quarter, till on the morrow that they toke the sea, and so departed thence. Finally, the Norwegians shewed them, that there was another people not far off, which liued all the summer time in the sea like fish, & fed of such as they did catch, but in the winter half (because the water is cold) they pished vpon such wild beasts as fed on the mounteins, which coming downe from the snowie hills to graze in the vallies, they killed with darts and weapons, and caried vnto their cates. In this exercise also they tie little boyds to their feet, which beate them vp from sinking into the snow, and so with a trasse in their hands they make the better shift to clime vp and come downe from the crags & mounteins, whereof in that region there is verie great plentie and abundance.

Of the maners of the Scots in these daies, and their comparison with the behaviour of the old, and such as liued long since with their ancestors.

The xiiij. Chapter.

As much as diuers noble men haue desired me to shew apert the old maners of the Scots touched in my historie, to the end it may be knowne how far our nation in these present daies are different in their maners and behauiour.

behaviour from those of our forefathers, and hereunto although I assure my selfe already that the revealing of these things will procure unto me the hatred of sundrie worthy or renowned personages (of which few will yield to heare their doings touched or their errors reproved) yet because I owe such dutie and service unto those that have made this request unto me, and least I should seeme ingrate not to hearken unto them in this behalfe; I have condescended to the performance of their desires, and so much the rather, for that they alledge how it will be verie profitable unto all the readers, but especially such as are not immoderately given over unto their owne affections, nor so wholly drowned in their owne sensualitie and pleasures, but upon consideration of wholesome admonition will be verie willing to leaue whatsoever offendeth in them.

First of all therefore, I will declare what vices have bene among our elders both in time of warre and peace, and by what wisdom and industrie they have prevailed so long time against such and so many mightie adversaries, as first the Britains, then the Saxons, next of all the Danes which have entered into this Island with huge armies to spoile and subdue the same. Furthermore, I will set downe with so much brevitie as I can, how the falling by little and little from the frugalitie and customs of their forefathers, their vertue and force also began in like order to decaye. And finally how in these daies either by the clemencie of our neighbours, or by their delicate negligence rather than by our owne provellence, we live in securitie, and thereby as it were overwhelmed and wrapped up in all avarice and excess, whereinto our want of exercise and martiall provellence doth marvellously impell us.

Certes I beleve that by this meanes such as are of the more couragious sort (& yet retaining a savour of the temperancie of their elders) will reioice to heare their manhood & great provellence commended in this wise, as others of the contrarie sort (in servile manner addicted to gather goods, and spend their times in idle excess and riot) seeing their errors justlie reprehended, and the dishonour gotten thereby openly revealed, will the rather adressed themselves to reformation of their estate, thereby to recover the ancient renowne of their forefathers, in answering to their provellence, than prove a reproch unto their successors, through their lewd behaviours never to be forgiven. This I protest before all men, that whatsoever I shall speake of the evil maners of our times, I do not meane it unto all, but those onely whome blind self-love, covetousnes, intemperancie, excess and abuse of all Gods good gifts have so touched, that they deserve much more to be reprehended than I will vouchsafe to attempt in this my lateward treatise. Therefore if anie man shall thinke himselfe to be rubbed on the gall by me, I counsell him that he conceale not his infirmities, by seeking revenge on other men, but rather endeavour to procure the remedie in first acknowledging his misdoings, which is the one and better halfe of his cure.

Our elders although they were right vertuous both in warre abroad, and at home in peace, were yet neverthelesse in conversation & behaviour verie temperate, which is the fountaine & originall of all vertues. In feede they were competent, in meate and drinke sober, and contented with such food as was ready at hand and prepared with little cost. Their bread consisted of such stuff as grew most readily on the ground without all manner of sowing and bolting, whereby to please the palate; but baked up as it came from the mill with out anie such curiositie, which is a great abasing of the force thereof unto our daile nourishment. The first whereon they chiefly fed, was either such as they got by hunting, wherein they took great delight, and which increased not a little their strength and nimblenesse, or else such tame catell as they bred up at home, whereof beefe was accounted the principall, as it is yet in our daies, though after another maner and far discrepant from the use and custome of other countries. The stirkes or young beastes ungelded, whether kill young for beale, or geld, to the end that they may serve afterwarde for tillage in earing up of the ground, but the cowcalkes and heifers are never killed till they be with calfe, for then are they fattest and most delicious to the mouth. The common meat of our elders was fish, howbeit not onlie or so much for the plentie thereof, as for that our lands late often wast and untilld, because of the great warres which they commonlie had in hand. They brake also their fast earlie in the morning with some slender repast, and so continued without anie other diet untill supper time, in which they had but one dish, whereby it came to passe, that their stomachs were never overcharged, nor their bones desirous of rest through the fulnesse of their bellies. At such time as they determined of set purpose to be merie, they used a kind of Aquavite void of all spice, and onelie consisting of such hearbs & roots as grew in their owne gardens, otherwise their common drinke was ale: but in time of warre, when they were enforced to lie in campe, they contented themselves with water as rediest for their turnes. Each souldier also had so much meale as might serve him for a daie which he made up in cakes, and baked on the coles, as the Romans sometimes used to do, and the emperor Caracalla himselfe (as Herodian hath remembred.) Seldome did they eate anie flesh in their tents, except they got it from their adversaries; such as they had likewise was eaten halfe raw, because they supposed the twice thereof so used to nourish verie abundantly. But fish was much more plentifull amongst them, especially when they wanted their usuall prey, or could not attaine unto them.

They brought furthermore from their houses to the field with them, a vessell of butter, chese, meale, milke, and vineger tempered together as a shot-anchore against extreme hanger, on which they would feed and sucke out the moisture, when other provision could not be gotten. In like maner, whensoever they had entered into league and amitie with their enemies, they would not live in such securitie, that thereby they would suffer their bodies & forces to degenerat, but they did keepe themselves in their former activitie and nimblenesse of lims, either with continuall hunting (a game greatly esteemed amongst our ancestors) or with running from the hilles unto the vallies, or from the vallies unto the hilles, or with wrestling, and such kinds of pastime whereby they were never idle. Their heads were alwaies shaven after the maner of the ancient Spaniards, with a little tuft of heare onelie left on their foreparts, and never covered, except when they were troubled with sicknesse, by which means it came to passe, that few of our nation in old time was faine to be bald and hearelesse. They went also barefooted, or if they had anie shoes, they dyed them first in the water per they did put them on, especially in winter when sharpest weather shewed it selfe, to the end that the soles of their feet (which were well hardened in summer with heat and in winter with cold) might be more strong and able to susteine great labour and daile travell.

Their apparrell was not made for beautie and pompe, but as should seme best to cover their bodies, and and serue their appointed vices, their hosen were shapen also of linnen or woollen, which neuer came higher than their knees, their breeches were for the most part of henrye, clothes also they had for winter made of course woll, but in the summer time they ware of the finest that could be gotten. They slept moreouer either vpon the bare stowe or pallets of straw, teaching their children euen from their infancy to eschew ease, and practise the like hardnesse; and sith it was a cause of suspicion of the mothers fidelitie toward hir husband, to seeke a strange nurse for hir children (although hir milke failed) each woman would take intolerable paines to bring vp and nourish hir owne children. They thought them surthermore not to be kindlie fostered, except they were so well nourished after their births with the milke of their breasts, as they were before they were borne with the blood of their owne bellies, nay they feared least they should degenerat and grow out of kind, except they gaue them sucke themselves, and eschewed strange milke, therefore in labour and painfulnesse they were equall, & neither sex regarded the heat in summer or cold in winter, but travelled barefooted, and in time of warres the men had their carriages and victuals trusted behind them on their horses, or else vpon their owne shoulders without refusall of anie labour intioined vnto them by their captains.

If it hapened them at anie time to be vanquished, they fled with such speed to the mounteins, that no horse might ouertake them, and verie oft escaped. The violence that was done to anie one of them, was reputed common to all, & such was their deadly fude conceived in these cases, that vntill they had requited the like with more extremitie, they would neuer be quiet nor let go their displeasure. The noblest and most courageous gentleman would sonest desire to be placed in the fore ward, where his vassalage or seruice & manhood should readiest be scene, and such was the friendship of the nobilitie amongst themselves, that whilst they contended which of them should be most faithfull and friendlie to other, they would oft fall out, and quarell one with another. Sometimes it hapened that their capitaine was beset with extreme perill, or peraduenture some other of the nobilitie, in which cases they that were of his band would suddenlie rush in through the thickest of their enemies vnto him, and deliuer him, or else if they could not so do, they would altogether lose their liues with him, thinking it a perpetuall note of reproch to ouerlue their leader.

The graves and sepulchers of our noble men had commonlie so manie obelisks and spires pitched about them, as the deceased had killed enemies before time in the field. If anie souldier had bene found in the field without his sint and timber box, or had walked or gone vp and downe with his sword at his side, and not naked in his hand, for then vsed they light armour for the most part, he was terrible scourged: but he that sold or morgaged his weapon, was forthwith cut from his companie, and banished as an erile; he that fled or went from the battell without leave of his capitaine, was slaine wheresoeuer he was met afterward, without anie iudgement or sentence, and all his goods confiscated to the prince. Their light armour in those daies consisted of the lance, the bow, the long sword which hanged at the side of the owner, and thereto a backler, but afterward heavier armour came into generall vsage.

In these daies also the women of our countie were of no lesse courage than the men, for all stout maidens & viues (if they were not with child) marched as well in the field as did the men, and so some as the armie did set forward, they slue the first living creature that they found, in whose blood they not onelie bathed their swords, but also tasted thereof with their mouthes, with no lesse religion and assurance conceived, than if they had alreadie bene sure of some notable and fortunate victorie. When they saw their owne blood run from them in the sight, they wared neuer a whit astonished with the matter, but rather doubling their courages, with more egernesse they assailed their enemies. This also is to be noted of them, that they neuer sought anie victorie by treason, falshood, or sleight, as thinking it a great reproch to win the field any otherwise than by merre manhood, prowesse and plaine dealing.

When they went forth vnto the wars, each one went with the king of his owne cost (except the hired souldiours) which custome is yet in vse. If any were troubled with the falling euill, or leprosie, or fallen frantike, or otherwise was out of his wits, they were diligentlie sought out: and least those diseases should passe further by infectious generation vnto their issue & posteritie, they gelded the men. But the women were secluded to some od place far off from the companie of men, where if the afterward hapened to be gotten with child, both she and the infant were run through with the lance. Gluttons and raueners, drunkards, and egregious deuourers of victuals were punished also by death, first being permitted to deuoure so much as they listed, and then drowned in one fresh riuer or other.

Furthermore, as iustice in time of war was commonlie giuen to perke, so in daies of peace our contriemen that offended, were oft seuerelie punished and with inconuenient rigor. For they well considered that after their people should returne & come home againe from the warres, they would be giuen to so many enormities, that the same their excesses should haplie be restrained but by extreme seueritie: such also was their nature, that so some as they knew themselves guiltie of any offense committed against the estate or commonwealth, their first attempt was to set discord amongst the peeres and princes of the realme, neuertheless when they are gentlie intreated, and with courteous moderation, they are found to be verie tractable and pliant vnto reason: in priuate bargains & contracts they are so willing to giue euerie man his own, that they will yeeld the more. And so farre is it growne into a custome euen in these our daies, that except there be some surpluse above the bare covenant, they will breake off and not go forwards with the bargain.

They vsed at the first the rites and maners of the Egyptians from whence they came, and in all their priuate affaires they vsed not to write with common letters, as other nations did; but rather with cyphers and figures of creatures made in manner of letters, as their epitaphes vpon their tombs and sepulchers remaining amongst vs do hitherto declare. Nevertheless in our times this hieroglyphicall manner of writing (I wot not by what means) is perished and lost, and yet they haue certaine letters proper vnto themselves, which were sometime in common vse: but among such as retaine the ancient speech, they haue their aspirations, diphongs, and pronunciation better than any other. The common sort are not in vse withall, but onlie they which inhabit in the higher part of the countie, and sith they haue their language more eloquent and apt than others, they are called poets, they make also poets with great solemnitie and honour, being borne out therein by the authoritie of the prince. Besides the skill also of many other arts and sciences, whose rules and methods are are turned into the said language, are giuen by tradition from their elders, they chiefe excell in physike, wherein they go far beyond manie other, who learning of them the natures and qualities of such hearbs as grow in those quarters, doe heale all manner of diseases euen by their onelie application.

Certes there is no region in the whole world so barren & vnfruitfull, through distance from the sun, but by the prouidence of God all manner of necessities for the sustentation of mankind dwelling there are to be had therein, if the inhabitants were such as had any skill how to vse the same in order. Neuertheless our elders, which dwelled continuallie vpon the marches of England, learned the Saxon tongue through continuall trade of merchandize and hazard of the wars long since, whereby it came to passe that we neglected our owne language, & our owne manners, and thereto both our ancient order in writing and speaking is vtterlie left among vs, that inhabitants nere vnto them; whereas contrariwise those that dwell in the mountaine retein skill their ancient speech and letters, and almost all their old rites, whereby in time past their forefathers haue bene accustomed. One thing hereof also may euidentlie be seene (for an example) in their boats which they call carrocks, for being made of osiers and couered with bull hides, they vse to passe and repasse with them ouer their riuers and waters in catching of samons, and when they haue done, they beare them on their backs vnto what place soeuer it pleaseth them.

But we will now leaue the maners of our ancient friends, and intreat of our later countrymen. In proceesse of time therefore, and chiefe about the daies of Spalcolme Cammo, our maners began greatlie to change and alter. For when our neighbors the Britons began, after they were subdued by the Romans, to warre idle and slothfull, and thereby enuie the Saxons, we began to haue alliance (by prouinitie of the Romans) with Englishmen, speciallie after the subuersion of the Picts, and through our daile trades and conuersation with them, to learne also their maners, and therewithall their language, as I haue said already. Whereby shortly after it came also to passe, that the temperance and vertue of our ancestors grew to be iudged worthe of small estimation amongst vs, notwithstanding that a certaine idle desire of our former renowne did still remaine within vs.

Furthermore as men not walking in the right path, we began to follow also the vaine shadow of the Germane honor and titles of nobilitie, and boasting of the same after the English manner, it fell out per long, that whereas he in times past was accounted onlie honorable, which excelled other men not in riches and possessions, but in prowesse and manhood, now he would be taken most glorious that went laden with most titles, wherof it came to passe, that some were named dukes, some earles, some lords, some barons, in which vaine pusses they fired all their felicitie. Before time the noble men of Scotland were of one condition, & called by the name of Thanes, so much in Latine as Quaestores regij, gatherers of the kings duties, in English: and this denomination was giuen vnto them after their desert and merit.

But how far we in these present daies are swayed from the vertues and temperance of our elders, I beleue there is no man so eloquent, nor indued with such difference, as that he is able sufficientlie to expresse. For whereas they gaue their minds to doolytinesse, we applie our selues to drunkenness: they had plentie with sufficientie, we haue inordinate excess with superfluitie: they were temperate, we effeminate: and so is the case now altered with vs, that he which can deuoure and drinke most, is the noblest man and most honest companion, and therefore hath no pare if he can once find the veine, though with his great trauell to puruey himself of the plentifullest number of new fine and delicate dishes, and best prouoke his stomach to receiue the greatest quantitie of them, though he neuer make due digestion of it.

Being thus drowned in our delicate gluttonie, it is a world to see, how we stuffe our selues both daile and night, neuer ceasing to ingorge & polve in, till our bellies be so full that we must needs depart. Certes it is not supposed meet that we should now content our selues with breakfast and supper onlie, as our elders haue done before vs, nor inough that we haue added our dinners vnto their aforesaid meales, but we must haue thereto our beuerages and rare suppers, so that small time is spared wherein to occupie our selues in any godlie exercise, with almost the whole daile and night doo scarcelie suffice for the filling of our panches. We haue also our merchants, whose charge is not to looke out, and bring home such things as necessarilie pertaine to the maintenance of our liues, but vnto the furniture of our kitchen, and these search all the secret corners of our forests for venison, of the aire for foules, and of the sea for fish, for wine also they trauell not only into France, whose wines doo now grow into contempt, but also into Spaine, Italie and Greece: nay Africke is not void of our factors, no nor Asia, and onelie for fine and delicate wines if they might be had for monie.

In like sort they gad ouer all the world for sweet and pleasant spices, and drugs (prouokers vnto all lust and licentiousnesse of behaviour) as men that aduenture their onis liues to bring home poison and destruction vnto their countrymen, as if the mind were not already sufficientlie breest of his image of the diuinitie, but must yet more be clogged and ouerladen with such a franked case, therewith all to be extinguished outright, which already dwelleth or is buried rather in such an vglie sepulchre. The bodie likewise being oppressed with such a heape of superfluous food, although otherwise it be indued with an excellent nature, cannot be able to execute his office, nor keepe him selfe byright, but must needs yeld as ouercome, and to be torne in peces and rent with sundrie maladies.

Hereof also it cometh to passe, that our countrymen travelling into the colder regions are now a daies contrarie to their former vfrage taken sometime with feuers, whereby their inward parts doo burne and parch as it were with continuall fier, the onelie cause whereof we may ascribe vnto those hot spices and drugs which are brought vnto vs from the hot countries. Others of them are so swollen and growne full of humors, that they are often taken suddenly, and die of vehement apoplexies, and although here and there one or two recover for a little while, yet are they but dead people, centuing againe, leading the rest of their liues like shadows, and walking about as if they were buried already.

Our youth also following these unhappie steps of their parents, giue themselves whole to lust and licentiousnesse, hauing all vertue and knowledge in contempt, and eschewing the same as a pestilence and subuersion of their pleasures, wherunto they applie themselves as vnto the most excellent trade. But sithens they are now inured, and as it were haunted with these vices, when time doth come of seruice and that our countrie shall stand in need of manhood, these will become so effeminate, that they must now ride on horsebacke as clad in heauie armor, for on foot they cannot go by reason of their fatness, ness which choaketh by their vitall forces, neither be able to perforce anie thing at all in comparison of the soueraigne manhood and prowesse of their elders. So some also as they returne home, because their possessions are not otherwise able to nourish them by in pleasure and pampering of their matwes, they must fall to couetous and greedie practises, thereby to enrich themselves, or else proue strong theues, or finally solvers of dissention and discorde among the noble men, thereby to preie some commoditie.

Certes these and other vices following them necessarilie, proceede generallie from none other fountaine than voluptuous life and intemperancie, the which if we would restraine, there is no region vnder the sunne that would proue more wholesome, lesse subiect to pestilence, nor more commodious and profitable for the sustentation of hir people. Certes I despaire not of the redresse of these things, but still hope that in short time these corrupt maners of my countrymen will be turned into better frame. We are not yet become impudent, neither altogether haue cast off vnhamefastnesse, sith that in a great manie some remainder of our ancient sobernesse and manhood doth yet appeare, and thereto newnesse of life with feruent deuotion increaseth euerie day, through the working of the zeale of our christian religion in vs.

This also will I adde, without offense vnto other nations, that there was neuer people more steadfast to my knowledge in the christian faith, nor more constant in their faithfull promises, than the Scots haue bene since their first beginning: and for a conclusion I will say more, not onelie for their praise, but also in exhorting them vnto perseuerance, that as our people now liuing doe passe their ancestozs in sumptuous and curious attyre, so they are more neat and fine in their houses, better giuen to learning, and much more magnificent in building and decking of their churches. God grant them also to returne to their former frugalitie, and that with speed, Amen.

Whitherto haue I translated Hectors description of Scotland out of the Scottish into the English tong, being not a little aided therein by the Latine, from whence sometime the translator swarveth not a little, as I haue done also from him, now and then following the Latine, and now and then gathering such sense out of both, as most did stand with my purposed breuitie. Now will I set downe the description of an ancient Pict, as I haue gathered it out of Herodian and other, and then I will giue ouer not onelie to write more at this present, but for ever hereafter of anie historிக்க matters, sith I see that this honest kind of recreation is denied me, and all time spent about the same in these daies vtterly condemned, as baine and sauouring of negligence, and heathenish impietie.

The description of an ancient Pict.

The 14 Chapter.

The Pict (saith Herodian) hath generallie no vse in apparel, howbeit the nobler sort of them doe wrap their heads and wombs in hops of iron, which they take for great vaunerie, esteeming this kind of attire, in such as weare the same, to be a token of wealth and riches, and so great an ornament, as if they had worne gold or any costlie iewels. Beside this, and the hauing of their necker lip, they painted ouer their bodies with the images of all kinds of beastes, so that he was the gaitest man that had his skin most disguised in this maner.

Certes none of them regarded to increas anie apparel, because they esteemed it a great glorie to haue these paintings sene. In warres they were void, and desirous to shed blood, contenting themselves (in stead of other armoz) with a short lance, and narrow target or buckler, their swordes were tied to their naked sides with a thong, and as for iacke, shirt of male, or helmet, they made no regard of them, because they would trouble them in swimming, or otherwise at a pinch, when they should be compelled to waide.

Dion writing generallie of the whole countrie, describeth it with Herodian into the Calidons & Meats, saying that the said countrie is verie sauage, their cities void of walles, and fields without townes: they liue moreouer (saith he) by hunting and preie, and oftentimes with the fruit of their trees: and albeit that they haue exceeding plentie of fish, yet they eat not of it. They liue naked in tents, and without shoes on their feet, their iuices are common, and children generallie looked vnto: they haue moreouer a populous regiment, and are verie readie to scale: they fight in wagons, and haue little light and swift horses, which run also verie swiftly, & stand at their feet with like steadfastnesse. In the nether end of their lances they haue hollow bullets of brasse, in each is a little peece or two of iron, which ratteth when they shake it, and maketh a strange noise where manie of them are together. They haue also narrow daggers, but cheslie they can susteine hunger and cold best of all men, and likewise soze labour: and if it happen them to hunger and haue no meat at hand, they will sit in the marishes by to the chins by manie daies together. In the woods they fed on roots or barkes of trees, and they haue a kind of meat among them, whereof if they take but so much as a beane, they neither hunger nor thirst in a long time after. And thus much of the Meats (which were the nearest vs) and the Calidons that dwelled beyond the wall, and both in their prouince called Maxima Cesariensis, whereof let this suffice.

To the Right Honorable the Lord Robert Dudley, Earle of Leicester, Baron of Denbigh, Knight of the most noble order of the Garter, Maister of the Queenes Maiesties horffe, and one of hir Highnesse priuie Councell.

I may seeme (Right Honorable) a great presumption in mee, to haue taken in hand the collection of this Scotish historie, and other of diuers regions, considering so many sufficient men as liue in these daies, farre more able to performe the same. But where at the motion of a speciall friend, I undertooke to deale therein, more vpon trust of his promised aid than of mine owne abilitie, it pleased GOD to call him to his mercie before the worke could be fullie brought to an end: but yet to answer the expectation of his friends, and trust which he had committed to them and me in this behalfe, I haue doone my good will to accomplish part of that, which in his life time was intended, although not to my wished desire, by reason of such wants as had beene supplied if he had liued to haue seene it published himselfe.

It resteth (right noble Earle) that it may please your Honor to accept my dooings in good part, to whom I offer this parcell of my trauels in this historie of Scotland, in regard of the honor due to your noble father, for his incomparable valure well knowne and approoued, as well within that realme as else-where in seruice of two kings of most famous memorie, Henrie the eight & Edward the sixt, sounding so greatlie to his renowme, as the same cannot passe in silence, whilest any remembrance of those two most peerelesse princes shall remaine in written histories. I therefore most humblie beseech your Honor, to beare with my boldnesse in presenting ting you with someane a gift, proceeding from one, although unknown to your Lordship, yet not without experience of your bountifull goodnesse extended towards those, to whome I reckon my selfe most beholden. As what is he within this realme almost of anie degree, which findeth not himselfe bounden to your Honor, either in his owne causes or his friends? For such is your inclination to pleasure all men, as the same may seeme a peculiar vertue planted in your noble heart, moving you so much to delight therein, as no time is thought by your Honor better spent, than that which you employ in dooing good to others.

But least I should enter into so large a discourse, as might be framed of this and other your excellent vertues (a matter far exceeding my simple knowledge) I will cease to speake further thereof, sith the same is spread ouer all, as well this as other regions: for no where doo want great numbers of such as haue abundantlie tasted of your exceeding courtesies. In making you owner therefore of this abstract of the Scottish histories, I most humbly beseech your Honor, if anie thing be amisse, to impute the same to the imperfection and defect of better instructions, and with your benigne and favorable interpretation to haue me therein excused. Such as it is, I addresse it to your good Lordship with so dutifull a mind as may be imagined, beseeching God to preserue your Honor with plentifull increase of wisdom, vertue, and all wishfull prosperitie.

Your Honors most humble to be

THE HISTORIE OF Scotland.

The Scottish men, according to the manner of other nations, esteeming it a glorie to fetch their beginning of great anciencie, say that their originall descent cam fro the Grecks and Aegyptians; for there was (as the old Scottish historiographers haue left in writing) a certeine noble man among the Grecks, named Cathelus, the sonne of Cecrops, who builded the citie of Athens: or as some other would, he was the sonne of Argus Pealus, the fourth king of the Argiues. This Cathelus plaieng in his youth manie wild and vnrolie parts in the countrie of Macedonia and Achaia, was diuers times sharplie rebuked by his father and other of his friends: so that in fine disdainng their correction and wholsome admonitions, he was banished by his father: after which he got together a number of strong and lustie yong men, such as had vsed the like trade of lining, and with them fled ouer into Aegypt; and comming thither in the 33 yeare of Pharaos Dns as then king of that countrie, was receiued of him in most glad some wise, for that his seruice (as was thought) might stand in great stead in those warres, which the Aegyptians held at that time with the Aethiopiens that had invaded the realme of Aegypt, euen vnto Memphis. This Cathelus, to be short, went forth with his bands against the same Aethiopiens, vnder Moses the capteine generall of the armie, chosen thereto by diuine oracle (as Iosephus writeth) which Moses obtained the victorie, and conquered Saba by force being the chiefest and principall citie which stood in the Ile Aferoe.

For such tokens of valfancie and worthie prowesse as Cathelus shewed, both in this countrie, and in other places, he grew also into such estimation with Pharaos, that he gaue him his daughter in mariage. But Moses was rather enuid than honored for his doing, because the Aegyptians doubted least the Israelites should increase to such a puissant multitude, that in the end they might vsurpe and challenge the gouernance of the whole realme, and bring it by rebelling into their owne hands: wherefore diuers informations were made to the king against him, so that when he once perceiued himselfe to be in danger of the lawe, and looked for no mercie at their hands, he fled from thence out of the countrie, & gat him into the land of Adian. Vnto Cathelus and his people there was given a citie called Thebes [Aegyptiaca] being taken from the Israelites. Here you must vnderstand, that Pharaos daughter, which Cathelus thus married, was called Scota, of whome such as came of the posteritie of that nation were afterwards, and are at this present day called Scotti, that is to say Scottishmen, and the land where they inhabit Scottia, that is to say, Scotland.

Cathelus thus being advanced by such honorable marriage, liued all the daies of his father in law Pharaos Dns, in great honor. But after his deceasse, and in the third generation, an other king named Pharaos Chencres succeeded in his throne, who oppressed the people of Israel then abiding in Aegypt, with more bondage than euer his father or grandfather had done before him. Neither was there hope of anie redress, till Moses returned by Gods appointment from amongst the Adianites (where he had remained in exile) into Aegypt, and there declared vnto this Pharaos, Gods commandement, touching the deliuerance of his people.

But forsomuch as his words were regarded neither with the king, nor with his subiects, that land was plagued in most horrible manner, and moreover it was signified vnto such as sought to know what was meant by way of oracles, that forer and more grieuous plagues should after follow, if remedie were not found the soner. Cathelus therefore being certified hereof, and giuing credit to the oracles aforesaid, determined out of hand to forsake the countrie, and seeke him a new place of abode in some other parties of the world. Wherefore he caused a number of ships to be rigged, and all necessarie purueance to be provided, and when the same was once readie, and all things set in order, he toke with him his wife and childzen, and a great multitude of people both Grekes and Aegyptians, whom he imbarked in those ships, and hoisting vp sailes, departed out of the mouth of the riuer Nilus, in the yeare of the worlds creation 2453, when he had dwelled in Aegypt 39 yeares and more. Being thus departed, after some trouble in the voyage, they arrived first on the coasts of Punidia, which is one of the regions of Affrike, now called Barbarie: but being put backe from thence by the stout resistance of the inhabitants, they toke the seas againe, and landed in a part of Spaine, which long after was called Lusitania.

There be that haue written how it should be cleped port Cathelus of this Cathelus, and certeine yeares after Lusitania, and effsones againe in a manner to haue got the former name, being somewhat corruptly called Portingale. But who is able in a matter of such anciencie to auouch anie thing for truth?

A description of the seat.

Gathelus with his companie being thus come to land, sought abroad in the countrie for victuals, and such other necessarie things as they wanted (for their long being on the seas had waisted all their purueiance:) whose arrival being once knowne in the countrie, the people assembled together, and fiercely incountring with the strangers, after sharpe and cruell fight, in the end the Spaniards were put to the worst and chased out of the field. This victorie put Gathelus and his folks in hope of good successe to haue there a place for them to inhabit in, and so to end their long wandering in strange and vncertaine places. And to the intent they might bring their purpose the more easilie to passe, they found means by way of communication to ioine in friendship with the Spaniards, and obtaining of them a plot where they might build a place for to inhabit in; shortly after they began the foundation of a cittie nere to the banks of the riuer called of ancient time Spundus, and afterwards Brachara.

It chanced after this, that the Spaniards (perceiving these strangers to increase further in puissance than, as they thought, stood well with their securitie) sought diuerse occasions to fall at debate with them, and to make warres vpon them: but when they vnderstood that Gathelus was as readie to defend, as they were to invade, they oftentimes fell to a communication, & persuaded with Gathelus, that it should be best for him and his people, for the auoiding of variance, to remove vnto the northside of Spaine, lying vpon the coasts of the Cantabrian seas, now called Galitia (where he should find much void ground, by reason of the small number of inhabitants) adding that if they would so do, they would aid them to the uttermost against all such as should attempt to disquiet their indouours in anie manner of wise. This offer Gathelus gladly accepted, and causing publike sacrifice to be celebrated in honor of the gods, he departed with all his people into Galitia, and there concluding a league with the inhabitants, builded a cittie which he named Brigantia, but after it was named Spouium, and now Compostella.

Here Gathelus being intituled by the name of a king, deuised and ordeined lawes for his people to liue by, that the cittie might not onelie be fenced with strong walles, but also with good and holisome statutes and ordinances, the chiefest fortifications that may be for all citties and countries. And because he would not onelie haue his said people to liue vnder one law, but also to be knowne and called by one name, he gaue commandment that they should be all called Scottishmen (as before is said) of his wife Scota. In continuance of time, this nation grew to a wonderfull multitude, so that the Spaniards doubting the worst, determined to seeke remedie in time, and here vpon purposing utterly to destroye them, got them againe to armour, and with their whole puissance comming vpon the Scottishmen gaue them a fore battell, though in the end they were put to flight, the victorie remaining with the Scottishmen, albeit not without great bloodshed on either part, as the Scottish historie saith. At length a necessarie peace was agræd vpon betwixt both parties, the conditions wherof were these: that aswell Scottishmen as Spaniards should liue after their owne lawes, and neither of them to invade other.

Gathelus hauing peace thus with his neighbors, sat vpon his marble stone in Brigantia, where he gaue lawes, and ministred iustice vnto his people, thereby to mainteine them in wealth and quietnesse. This stone was in fashion like a seat or chaire, hauing such a fatall destinie, as the Scots say, following it, that wheresoeuer it should be found, there should the Scottishmen reigne and haue the supreme gouernance. Hereof it came to passe, that first in Spaine, after in Ireland, and then in Scotland, the kings which ruled ouer the Scottishmen, received the crowne sitting vpon that stone, vntill the time of Robert the first king of Scotland. The inscription also of the stone, though ingrauen long time after, as should appeare, was this:

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocumq; locatum Inuenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.

Which may be thus translated:

Except old fawes doo faile, and wifards wits be blind, The Scots in place must reigne, where they this stone shall find.

But to returne where I left touching Gathelus. When he perceived that his people multiplied in such wise, as the countrie which was appointed him by the last agræment, was not able to susteine them, he was loth to breake the peace which he had established with the Spaniards, by seeking to enlarge the bounds of his dominion with breach of covenant: and therefore vnderstanding that there was an Island lying north ouer against Spaine, wherein were but few inhabitants, he caused all such ships as he was able to make, to be brought together into an haven nere vnto Brigantia, and commanding a great armie of his owne people and subiects to be assembled, he appointed his two sonnes whome he had by his wife Scota, the one named Hiberus, and the other Himecus, to conueie them ouer into that Island, which afterwards they named Hibernia, after Hiberns, but now it is commonlie called Ireland.

At their first arrivall there, they came into the haven of Dundalk, where getting on land, they first incamped themselves nere the shore, and then sent forth certeine of their folks to search if they could learne what people inhabited in the countrie, by whome at their returne, and by such as they had happened vpon and brought with them, they vnderstood how there was no great number of inhabitants in that Ile, and that they which dwelled there were verie simple, such I meane as liued onelie by milke and herbs, with other the like things as the earth by nature brought forth of hir owne accord, without mans helpe or vse of anie tillage. Here vpon Hiber with his brother Himecus, went not about with force, but by gentlenesse to win those people, minding to ioine them in friendship so with their Scottishmen, that both the people might be made as one. Neither was this hard to be done, sithens the inhabitants (perceiving the Scottishmen not to go about to harme them) came flocking in whole about them, submitting themselves into their hands with gladnesse.

When things were once set here in a stay, and that orders were given how the land should be converted vnto tillage, and manured for the better bringing forth of such things as serue for mans sustentance, Hiber (leaving his brother in charge with the gouernance of all those which were appointed to abide there in Ireland) with the most part of the ships and residue of the companie, sailed backe into Spaine, where finding his father Gathelus dead, he succeeded in his place of gouernement, to the great reioysing of all the people there.

This Hiber was a man of great courage, and more giuen to the wars than his father before him, so that where his father contenting himselfe with the bounds and limits of the countrie assigned him by composition, sought no further (as is said) to enlarge the

the same: Hiber ceased not to conquer cities and townes nere adjoining to the borders of his subiects, by reason whereof his fame spred ouer all those parties: and in the end constrained his enemies to seke for peace, which he willingly granted: so that a league being concluded betwixt the Scots and Spaniards, the same took such good successe, that within certeine yeeres after, both the nations, that by marriage and other contracts, which they exercised together, became one. The succession also of kings continued after Hiber's decesse in his posteritie a long season; amongst the which, Metellus, Hermoneus, Ptolemeus, Hiberus, and Simon Brechus were of most worthie fame, as is recorded by such as haue written the histories of that nation more at large.

In the meane while that these things were thus a doing in Spaine, Himecus being left, as is before remembred, in Ireland, to haue the gouernance there, ruled both the people of Scottishmen, and the former inhabitants, with as much indifferencie as was possible: yet could he not ioine them so in one; but that after his decesse either of them would haue severall rulers of their owne nation to gouerne them: by reason whereof, falling eiesones at discord amongst themselves, there ensued sharpe and cruell warres betwixt them, which being ended sometime by truce (when both parties hapilie were throughlie wearied) they renewed notwithstanding their malicious strife againe, so loone as they had once recovered their decayed strengths, so that the one seeking the others destruction, they continued in great inquietnes for a long time. These Scottishmen being thus troubled in Ireland, finallie adressed an ambassage unto Metellus, who as then reigned amongst the Scottish men in Spaine, requirring him of aid and succor against their enemies, who went about with toth and naile to expell all the Scottish nation out of Ireland, which they were like enough to bring to passe, if in time there were not speedie remedie through his aid provided for the contrarie.

Metellus hearing these newes, as a man moued with a naturall zeale toward all the Scottish linage, gaue care to their request, supposing it should be his part to defend his kinsfolke from all wrong and iniuries: immediatlie therefore he sent his three sons, Hermoneus, Ptolemeus, and Hiberus, with a chosen power of warriours ouer into Ireland, where vanquishing the enemies with fierce and cruell battles, they set the Scottishmen in sure and quiet possession of all their lands and liuings. This done Ptolemeus and Hiberus remained there to rule and inhabit the countrie. But Hermoneus, who was the eldest brother, returned backe againe to Spaine, there to succed his father when time should serue thereto.

After this the Scottish estate continued many yeeres in good quiet in Ireland, the people still increasing in wealth and puissance, till prosperitie the mother of contention, stirred vp grudge and parcialities amongst them, which shortly would haue decayed the force of the Scottish nation, if the ancient lords had not provided redresse in time, which was to perswade the people to haue a king of their owne, who being partaker with none of them in their factions, might haue the absolute gouernance of the whole, so that by common consent they sent into Spaine for one Simon Brech, whose name was right famous amongst them in that season, both as well for that he was lineallie descended of the blood royal, as also for that he had shewed many proofes of his noble valiance in sundrie affaires and businesse. This Simon being glad of these tidings, sailed quicklie into Ireland, and brought thither with him amongst other princelie jewels and regall monuments, the fatall stone of marble, wherein he caused himselfe to be crowned, in token of his full possession and establishment ouer that kingdome.

Brechus being thus crown'd, was the first king that reigned ouer the Scots in Ireland, who began his reigne there, in the yere from the creation of the world 3270, which time by maister Harlons account is after the flood 1616, from the first building of Rome 55, after the entrie of Brutus into Britaine 870, and before the incarnation of our sauiour 697. And hauing ruled his subiects with great iustice by the space of fortie yeeres or thereabout, he died, after whose decesse succeeded Fandufus, who had issue Ethion, and he begat Claucus, which Claucus begat Poitafilus, the father of Rothsay: all of them reigned successiuelie ouer the Scottishmen in Ireland, as in the description of that land more plainelie may appere.

This Rothsay (perceiuing the Scottish nation increased to a greater multitude in Ireland than the countrie was well able to susteine) transported ouer certeine numbers of them into the Isles ancientlie called Ebonides, afterwards Hebrides, but now by the Scots, the westerne Isles, because they lie on the west halfe of Scotland: and there they placed them to inhabit. He named also that Ile which he first began to possesse Rothsay, after his owne name. Which translation of these Scottishmen into those Isles was 133 yeeres after the coronation of Brechus.

This Rothsay had not bene long in those Isles, but that hearing of his fathers decesse, he returned into Ireland to succed in his place. Where the Scottishmen perceiuing the fertilitie of the Isles, and how the same serued well for the breeding of cattell, became so desirous to inhabit there, that they went ouer thither daillie in great numbers, with their wiues, children, and whole families, so that within a short time they multiplied in such wise, that the Isles were not large enough to find them sustenance, by reason whereof diuers companies of them got them ouer into the maine land of the north part of this our Britaine, called as then Albion, where they first inhabited a waste and desert portion thereof, lieng toward the west, ouer against the foreremembred Isles, by them already inhabited, Anno 3383. That part where they first began to settle themselves, they named Argathelia, after the name of their first capitaine and guide Cathelus, but the inhabitants at this day call it Arguile.

At their first comming, because they perceiued they could not liue without lawes and ciuill gouernment, they feuered themselves into tribes, or as it were into hundreds, or wapentakes, euerie of the same hauing a speciall gouernor to see their lawes minisred, and iustice mainteined: which gouernors were had in such reuerence, that they were as much afraid to sweare by the name of any one of them, as they were by the gods. In this state they continued many a yere, increasing in processe of time unto a mightie nation, and liued in good rest without trouble of warres or inuasion made vpon them by any forren enemy. In this meane time also, the Picts, which were a certeine people of Germanie, as most writers doe agree, came and set foot also in another part of Britaine, which now is comprehended likewise within Scotland.

Some saie that they came forth of the hether part of Scythia, and other there be which hold opinion, that they descended of the people named in old time Agathys, which inhabited in a part of Sarmatia, and were called Picts, because they vsed to paint and colour their faces, or (as some suppose) for that they used gate apparell of diuers and sundrie colours; but the same writers generallie confesse, that they first came into Germanie or hither Scythia (that is to meane Denmarke) many yeeres before they entred into Britaine. Truth it is that they first came out of Germanie, into the Isles of Orkney, and there inhabiting for a season, seried ouer into Cathnesse, whereof it came to passe, that the streit there at this present is called Pictland firth: and so in continuance of time increasing in number, they passed further into the land, and got possession of Rosse, Murrayland, Sperrine, and Angule, and after that, entering into Fife and Louthian, they dyuie such Britains from thence as inhabited there before, which were but a simple kind of people, as those that applied nothing but onelie nourishing and breeding of cattell.

These Picts, as by conference of times may appere, entred first into Scotland, about the yeare after the creation of the world 3633, and being once arriued, they began to erect and build certeine forts, wherein they might defend themselves, if any force of enimies should chance to put them to such thists; but perceiving they could not continue any time without wiues to mainteine their stocke and progenie by bringing forth issue, they thought it expedient to require of the Scottishmen some number of women to marrie with, that thereby a sure alliance might be had betwixt both nations, & that if need required, they might the better defend them from their common enimies the Britains, whom they knew would be loth to see the increase of either Scots or Picts, as those that were strangers to them, and to surpers upon their confines.

This request was granted, and a full league ratified betwixt the Scottishmen and Picts, with covenants, that neither of them should take to blame any pece of that which the other held, but content themselves with their owne marches. And further, he that attempted to wrong the one, should be accounted an enimie to both: and against whom they should be readie to ioin their powers in either others defense. Also it was accorded, that if at anie time it were doubtfull who ought to succeed in the gouernement of the Pictish kingdome, some one descended of those Scottish women should be admitted to the throne.

This alliance was euen at the first mistikied of the Britains, who doubted, that if these two nations should once be ioined inseparablie together, they might in time to come increase to greater puissance than should stand well with the surtie of their estate. Therefore studieng how to prevent that danger, they thought the readiest meane to destroye both those nations was (if they might bring it to passe) to set them first together by the eares amongst themselves, that afterwards when their powers were by such means fore abated, they might the more easilie subdue them at their pleasures. This deuise the Britains kept secret for a time, till occasion serued to worke their intent. In which meane while the assinitie betwixt the Scots and Picts increased to the wealth of both nations, and for the issue sake great loue and friendship was mainteined among them. The Picts applied themselves to tilling the ground, and building of fortresses: the Scots set all their delight in hunting and fouling, bling about the same to go armed in iacks and light ieffernes with bow and arrowes, no otherwise than if it had bene in open warre: for in this exercise they placed all the hope of the defense of their possessions, lands and liberties.

At length, the Britains perceiuing happlie some grudge or enuie to be entred amongst them, they sent soleimne ambassadoers vnto the Picts, declaring that it were more honorable for them to ioin in league with the Britains, than with the Scots: which Britains were knowne to be famous, both in peace and war, and inhabited a countrie most fruitful and replenished with all commodities necessarie hauing therein rich mines of diuers kinds of metall, where the Scots being a rude nation, wild and savage, inhabited a barren countrie, full of rough and fruitlesse mounteins, delighting thereto in nothing but in the slaughter of men and beastes. And herevnto they added that (which most moued the Picts) how it was foretold them by prophetes, that the Scots through treason should utterlie in time to come extinguisht and destroye all the Pictish blood. Which persuasions induiced the Picts at the last, to make a league with the Britains, who promised their aid at all times, in whatsoeuer enterprise the Picts should take in hand against the Scots, and as often as occasion should require.

This league thus being confirmed with the Britains, encouraged the Picts so, that they sought daile how to picke quarels, and fall out with the Scottishmen: whereupon making proclamation that no Scottishman should enter into their borders, vpon paine of death: some such as they took within the same, they cruellie slue; other they ransomed at excessive summes: whereupon the Scots being kindled with iust displeasure, on the other side requited them with the like, euer as they caught any of the said Picts by hap or otherwise amongst them, or in their walks.

The one nation seeking thus to be reuenged of the other, there ensued open war betwixt them: whereupon the Scottishmen, to the end they might be the better able to mainteine their quarell, sent ouer their ambassadoers vnto their kinsmen in Ireland, requiring them of aid in that present danger, as hauing now not onelie warres with the Picts, but also with the Britains, who minded nothing but the utter destruction of them and their linage, except speedie remedie were found. And for that they saw it needfull to haue one onelie head and gouernor, they made sate also to haue some capteine of honoz with them into Albion, vnto whom as to their king they would submit themselves. In that season amongst the Pictish Scottishmen, there reigned a king named Fergusus, who inclining to the petition of the Pictish Scots, caused an huge armie forthwith to be leuiued, and there to be appointed his owne sonne Fergusus to be generall of the same, a worthy young gentleman, and an expert warrioz: whome he sent ouer with his puissant companie, in such speed as was possible. He had also with him the marble stone, that he might conceiue the better hope to reigne there as a king, because he went forth vnto such a dangerous warre.

Such also as went with him in this tourtie, had their wiues, their children, and all their substance with them, as the maner of the nation then was, when they went forth into any forren countrie. Now it came to passe that this Fergusus was no sooner come into Albion amongst the Scottishmen there, but that in a parlement called and assembled in Argile for the purpose, they first consulted after what sort they might mainteine themselves against their enimies, and what order for gouernment should be obserued amongst them. Where finally for auoiding of such inconueniences, as might rise through manie gouernors, they decreed to chuse onlie one, whome in all things, as their king & head, they would from thenceforth follow and obeye.

chaste of hope was also brought with him: they concluded by whole consent to commit that charge vnto him, and so to the great reioysing of the people, he was placed vpon his marble stone, and crowned king, being the first of the Scottish nation that euer ruled in Albion as absolute gouernor, who began his reigne in the yeare after the creation of the world 3640, which is (as Harison saith in his chronologie) before the incarnation of our sauour 327, after the building of Rome 420, and after the entring of Brutus into Britaine 790.

The kingdome of the Scottishmen being thus begun in Albion, Fergus took vpon him to rule as king, making provision on all sides to resist his enemies: who whilest these things were a doing in Argile, had assembled their powers: vnto whom also the Britains had ioined themselves, and were now entred into the Scottish borders. Fergus hauing herof knowledge, speedilie got together his people, and came with banners displayed to encounter his enemies. In king Fergus banner, there was a red lion portraied rampant, with his taile folded towards his backe, as though he did beat the same, which is the maner of them when they be moued to displeasure. Fergus was the first that bare this cognisance in Albion, which euer since hath bene borne by those kings that haue successiuelie reigned after him there.

Both the armies were now come within sight of other, and readie to haue giuen the onset, when there went a murmuring amongst the Picts, that their companions the Britains were gotten to a hill a little beside them, minding to see the end of the battell before they did stir, and then if occasion serued (as their hope was it should) they purposed to fall vpon both parties, as well Picts as Scots, and so to destroye them both, the vanquishers together with the vanquished, as they found them out of arae in following the chase. The like report was brought vnto Fergus by one that fled to his side from the enemies campe, touching this treason of the Britains, conspiring the exterminion of both the people.

By reason whereof, either part being put in feare of that which might issue through the malicious purpose of the Britains, they kept their tents certene daies together, without making any hast to battell. And in the meane while Fergus sent a messenger vnto the king of the Picts, requiring him to come to a communication before they should fight, for that he had to informe him of such matters as pertained no lesse to the safeguard and preservation of the Picts, than of his owne people the Scots. The king of the Picts willinglie gaue eare to this message, and so a little beside both the armies standing in battell arae, the two kings accompanied with a few of their nobles met together, where in the end the danger in which they both stood, being plainelie disclosed and throughlie weied, they condescended to haue a further treatie of peace, which the king of the Picts alleged he might not conclude without the publike consent of his subiects; and therefore he appointed on the daie following to returne to the same place againe, there to giue a resolute answer, after he had vnderstood the minds of his lords and commons in the same.

Herevpon therefore returning to his campe, he called his counsell afoze him, declaring the substance of the communication which had bene betwixt king Fergus and him, which was in effect tending to this end. First considering the present troubles of the Britains, there was nothing more expedient than a peace to be agreed vpon, as well for the commoditie of the Picts as Scots, if they would yield withall to auoid the imminent perill of their better ruine and common destruction intinded by the Britains.

Herevpon also he required their aduise what they thought good to be done; declaring that according as they counselled him, he would worke therein. This matter being thus proposed, as there were diuerse heads, so were there sundrie opinions. Some iudged that in no case they could enter friendship againe with the Scots, who had so cruellie slaine and murdered a great number of the Pictish nation; and had shewed such tokens of a brauillie furious nature, that there was no hope to continue long in amitie with such a raging kind of people: and hereto they held that it was not vnknowne how the prophesie went, that the Scots should in the end destroye all the Pictish progenie. So that it were wisdom to keepe their power vnder, so long as was possible, and not to increase the same by ioining with them in friendship.

Other were of a contrarie mind, esteeming that in no wise the Scottish mens friendship ought to be refused, vnlesse they would determine to seke new dwellings in some other foraine parties; sith the Britains would not faile, but vpon occasion take what vantage they could to expell them both, as well Scots as Picts, out of the countries now by them possessed. And as for that, which was alledged touching the prophesie, if the gods had so determined, then might no policie of man preuent it: and if there were no such thing appointed by the same gods, what follie then were it to cast such dreadfull doubts where no cause was? Duer and besides this, they had taken them wiues of the Scottish nation, and thereby ingrafted their seed (the hope of their posteritie) in that stocke, which is the nearest meane and forceablest occasion to nourish friendship amongst people, that is or may be deuised; therefore it should not be onelie profitable but necessarie also to haue peace with the Scots, to renew againe with them the former league, to the perpetuall strengthening and aduancement of both the nations.

Whilest the Picts were thus in debating the matter, their wiues also being present there in the armie, came in amongst them with their children, and in most lamentable wise besought their husbands to haue pitie vpon them, in their so sorrowfull case, and not to suffer their hands to be defiled with vnnaturall murder, sith it were lesse discomfort to them with their sillie little ones to die anie kind of death whatsoeuer it were, rather than to behold their husbands with their fathers, their brethren, and their kinsfolke ioine together in battell, and there to kill one another without all mercie and compassion. The nobles and gentlemen of the Picts hearing the cries of these women, and being now somewhat moued to pitie, consented at last to haue peace with the Scottish men, and to renew againe the old league that was heretofore betwene them: and for mutuall iniuries heretofore committed, that there should be a mutuall recompense, according as might stand with equitie and reason. So that where the Britains had bene the chiefe procurers of all that mischief and discord betwixt them, in hope thereby to destroy both the parties, they should now be reputed from henceforth as common enemies to them both. As for all other articles & conditions of agreement, it was ordeined that their king should doe therein as vnto him might seeme good.

In the morning therefore, as was appointed, the king of Picts meeting with king Fergus, declared what his subiects were agreed vpon; and further opening his mind touching the establishment of the peace, thought it conuenient to haue a day of meeting betwixt them to ratifie the same. Wherewith Fergus Fergusse as- sembled a great power of Scottish- men.

Fergusse being well contented & glad that through his motion a peace should thus ensue, a day was appointed betwixt them and kept accordingly, so that comming together, the ancient league was in all points renewed, with some conditions added thereto, available (as was thought) for the stronger confirmation thereof. Before this, and after the first meeting betwixt the Scots and Picts, I meane so soone as the Britains had understanding of this agree- ment, they had no lust to tarie longer in the field, but raising their power, they departed their waies home wards, doubting least the said agree- ment might turne smallie to their gaine. The Picts and Scottishmen also after they had thus fullie rati- fied the peace and league betwixt them, brake vp their camps, euerie man repairing to the place of his abode.

The king also of the Britains named Coill (so- journiing in that season nere about Forke) being informed of this sudden renouation of the league be- twixt the Scottishmen and Picts, was nothing less full of the newes: for he doubted least in time to come their confederacie might be occasion of their further increasing in puissance, and after that some new occasion of his trouble. Wherefore studieng by what waies and means he might best prouide reme- die for such inconueniencies as might insue, he at- tempted nothing openlie for the space of two years, but onelie watched his time, to the end that if he might in that season chance (thorough the insolent courage of either nation) to espie anie occasion ser- uiceable for his time, he might set vpon and be a plague vnto them both.

At length also he caused his subiects (such I meane as bordered nere to the marches of both the people) to fetch pices and booties out of the Pictish confines. So that when the Picts sent thither with request to haue restitution made, it was by and by answered, that the Scots had done such trespasses (being a people inured vnto such feats by nature, and not the Britains, who were nothing guiltie in that kind of matter; and thus would the Britains do in like sort when they had robbed the Scots, so that with such in- iurious dissimulation, as well Scots as Picts be- ing not a little offended, they entred soone after in- to the British confines, robbing & spoiling the same, as their custome is, with all maner of crueltie. When Coill of Britaine had notice of these doings, he took greivous indignation thereat, and there- vpon determined to proue whether he might with open warres atchieue his purpose, which he could not bring to passe by his former cloaked practise. And herewith assembling an armie, he entred into the Scottish borders lieng towards the Irish seas, wa- sting & spoiling with fire and sword whatsoeuer he found in his waies, till he came euen to the riuer of Dunc, where incamping himselfe vpon the banks thereof, he sent forth companies of his souldiers to despoile the countrie, and to bring in all such pris- oners as they should lay hands vpon.

But in the meane time, and so soone as Fergusse heard of the approach of the Britains, he caused all the people in the countrie to get them with their goods & cattels vnto the mounteins, except such as were able to beare armour: whome he appointed to attend vpon him, to defend the countrie as occasion serued. Whereof Coill hauing knowledge brought by an espiall, he sent forth about five thousand nimble men, and such as had bene vsed to cline craggie hills, to go before and win the passages, purposiing the next day to follow himselfe with the whole armie. But the Scottishmen and Picts being now assembled together, and certified hereof also by their spies, they first fell in consultation what they were best to do; and in the end agreed that the same night they should set vpon the British campe: Fer- gusse with his Scottishmen on the one side, and the king of the Picts on the other; so that in the dead of the night the Scottishmen killing the watch, were entered into the British campe, yet Coill had know- ledge of anie such thing.

Whereby it came to passe that whilst the Britains (awaked with the noise) drew vnto that part where the alarme rose, to beat backe the Scots; the Picts comming ouer the riuer of Dunc, by a certeine blind fowd, assailed them on the backs, to the great confusion of the whole armie, by reason whereof the Britains (seeing none other remedie but to saue themselves by flight) turned their backs and fled, in which turmoile they were trodden downe and fell by heaps one vpon another, and were not able to helpe themselves, nor yet to make shift to auoid the hands of their aduersaries. In this businesse also Coill himselfe chanced to be oppressed amongst the rest, so that he was found dead in the search of such as were slaine, and after solemne buried according to his estate in Troinuant, leauing the kingdome vnto his sonne Sisellus, who with his mother Per- tia gouerned the same together by the space of ma- nie yeares.

Such Britains also as escaped out of their enemies hands, got them together in the next morning, & per- ceining what losse they had sustained not onlie by the death of their prince, but also in the slaughter of a great part of their whole armie, sent an herald vnto the Scots and Picts to require a peace: which though the most part of the people were not in will to haue consented vnto, yet persuaded in the end by their princes, they were contented to yeld there- to: so that a generall peace was concluded, and speedilie published betwixt them.

Immediatlie herevpon, the Picts with their part of the spoile gotten at this iournie, departed to their homes, and Fergusse returned into Argile; where studieng dailie for the quiet aduancement of the Scottish commonwealth, he called a parlement of his nobles, and first declaring to the assemblie how much bound they were to the gods for giuing them this victorie over so puissant enemies as the Bri- tains were, he exhorted them to liue in frie-ndlie concord amongst themselves, and to abstaine from violatling the leagues now concluded, as well with the Britains as before hand with the Picts.

Also for the auoiding of enuious contention, and for the better assurance of euerie mans estate, he iudged it necessarie to haue a partition made of all the lands belonging vnto the Scottish dominion. For before they occupied the whole as in commune, without knowing to whome this peece or that did be- long. Which politike aduise of Fergusse, the Scottish- men praised most highlie, promising not onelie to follow his counsell herein in all that he should wish, but also in all that he should otherwise command.

Wherevpon shortly after there were chosen by his aduise seuen ancient personages, men of god- confience and great experience, which were appoin- ted to be surueyors of the whole countrie, and to di- uide the same as nere as they could into a set num- ber of equall portions (but with this consideration, that according as the fruitfulnessse or barrennessse of the soile required, so they should enlarge or diminish the circuit of their bounds.) When they had viewed the countrie, and according to their commission se- uered forth the same into parts, they returned into Argile, where Fergusse then sojourned, and there in his presence, the names of all his noble men that were reputed as gouernors were put in lots, euerie of them to haue such part of the realme for his owne, Coill was slaine and his whole armie discomfited, whome Hector Boe- thich, their countrie of Coill took name.

By this meanes each of them being placed as his chance fell, they inhabited their quarters with such people as they had the leading of, so that afterwards the countries took their names of those the first gouernors: which names for the more part (being a little changed) remaine amongst them euen unto this day. Fergus hauing thus without occasion of enuie diuided his countrie amongst his nobles and subiects, studied further more to deuise lawes for the maintenance of common quiet amongst them. And therefore amongst other ordinances he made statutes against murder, robbrie, burning of houses, and especiallie against theft.
